NILES' NATIONAL REGISTER.

FIFTH SERIES. No. 1.—VOL. VI.]

WASHINGTON CITY, MARCH 2, 1839.

[VOL. LVI.—WHOLE No. 1,431.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED, EVERY SATURDAY, BY WILLIAM OGDEN NILES, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR, AT $3 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

§ We have been compelled to omit many things said and done in both houses of congress during the present week; but the record will be brought up in our next, after which we will commence the publication of the leading speeches and reports, many of which are of great interest just now, and useful for reference.

§ We have crowded our pages with a variety of interesting articles relating to the movements upon the northeastern frontier, including the bill from the committee on foreign relations, giving to the president of the United States additional powers for the defence of the country in case it should be invaded by a foreign power. The report which accompanied the bill, shall have a place in our next.

The debate upon this question is still going on with much animation in both houses, and indicates but one opinion as to the propriety of placing the country in a condition to repel an attempt on the part of Great Britain to enforce, by arms, her claim to exclusive jurisdiction over the disputed territory, and a bill to that effect will be passed with great unanimity. But from all we see and hear, we are confident that the question will be settled in the amicable spirit indicated in the agreement between the president of the United States and the British minister. The large body of British troops assembled in New Brunswick and Canada, estimated at 15,000, has, however, created a different impression in the minds of some persons, who think that the British government is resolved to vex an issue for which she is so well prepared; and is rather disposed to avenge the alleged supineness of this government in restraining our citizens from invading the Canadas. This is a short-sighted view of the subject, for nothing can be more certain than that in case of a rupture between the two countries, the Canadas would throw off their allegiance and act with the United States against Great Britain as against a common enemy; and she might thus lose more territory than she would gain if her demands upon our northeastern border were complied with in their greatest latitude. There are, besides, a hundred reasons connected with her policy and the relations existing between the two countries, which forbid the idea of a collision, unless under circumstances of great aggravation; as for instance, a persistence in the ground of exclusive jurisdiction set up by the lieutenant-governor of New Brunswick. The question would then become one which might involve the national honor, about which there should be no hesitation or compromise; and with the fixed opinion of the people of the United States, that the territory in question rightfully belongs to us, all would unite with determined zeal to repel the invaders.

THE NEWS AND THE MARKETS. The New York Courier of Tuesday, says:

The advices from England relative to flour and cotton, received by the steam ship Liverpool, [see page 4.] to the 6th inst. have been generally regarded as unfavorable, particularly to the former article, and had the effect of suspending any further operations. Holders of cotton, however, are firm at the previous asking prices, from which they show no disposition to recede. The price of flour is also nominally the same—though we understand that western could have been purchased to-day at $3.87, and Georgetown at $3.50a5.62 1-2, a decline of 12 1-2 cents per barrel on Saturday's prices. The quotations for American flour at Liverpool on the 6th inst. was 40a42s per 198 lbs.—the latter price only obtained for small parcels.

The steam ship Great Western went to sea this afternoon at half past one o'clock, having been detained until that hour, in order to admit of the letters by the Liverpool being answered by this opportunity. The Western takes out an unusually large number of letters, no less a sum than $1,450 having been taken for postage at the Merchants' Exchange reading rooms alone.

MR. PRICE. We find the following letter from this gentleman, said to be genuine, in a New York paper. The National Intelligencer is authorized to say it was not addressed to his son.

Copy.
London, Dec. 26, 1838.

My dear —

By the arrival of the packet Independence, I have the New York papers of the 7th inst., abounding with the most scandalous conjectures, in respect to my visit to this country.

The circumstances inducing it were wholly of a private nature, and would not on pain of the most insupportable obloquy, seem to require a bill of particulars.

But I deem it to be my duty to state to you, that the charge of my being a defaulter in office is wholly unfounded. That in the last five years, millions of government claims have been deposited with me for collection, and that upon the adjustment of my claims upon government for their prosecution and collection, the balance will be adjudged to be against the government.

It has been too much the fashion of the times, to condemn public agents, upon ex parte statements.

At least two memorable cases in the union are recorded of district attorneys of the United States held up to public execration as defaulters, who after investigation of the charges against them, were signally rewarded with a public expression of their fellow citizens.

It is not exactly fair to proceed trial by condemnation, and I can only for the present assure you, that if my just claims are allowed, the government will have as little cause as, I think, individuals ever had of complaining of my administration of the office I have recently resigned.

I am, dear sir,
Yours,

FROM FLORIDA. The "Globe," of last night contains the following:

We have just seen a gentleman who left Tallahassee on the 21st ultimo, from whom we learn that murders by the Indians are of every day occurrence in that neighborhood. Between the 17th and 21st, during this gentleman's stay at Tallahassee, fifteen citizens had been killed by the Indians. The Seminoles have introduced dogs into their warfare. Our informant, who is familiar with the military events in Florida, tells us he saw, himself, the corpse of a militiaman, one of a small party, which had been dispersed by the Indians, who had been hunted down by dogs, and held at bay until the Indians approached an shot him.

The gentleman to whom we allude, and who has had the best opportunity of judging, gives it as his opinion, that no mode of expelling the Indians from Florida will be so efficacious as that of the military occupation bill which has passed the senate; and this, he says, is the general opinion of the people of Florida, as well as of the officers employed in the military service there.

FROM BUENOS AYRES AND MONTEVIDEO. By the arrival at Philadelphia of the brig Madonna, capt. Wise, from Buenos Ayres and Montevideo, the editors of the United States Gazette have, through the Exchange, files from the latter city to December 22.

The Montevideo papers are much occupied with the official documents of the general in chief, who seems to have his hands full in correcting the proceedings of the courts of justice, the halls of education, and the theatres; for the latter he has appointed certain censors and directors. Meanwhile, all seems unsettled in the politics of those delightful regions, and a victory that promises quiet, seems to lead only to a contest for spoils.

We notice that the general in chief, in Montevideo, interfered to suspend the sentence of a court, pronounced against a man and his son. They were to be banished. The motives for mercy were the former good conduct of the man and the public services of his wife.

The political information from the other side of the continent, appears to be no later than has been previously published.

A letter to the editor of the Gazette states that Fructuosa Riveira entered the city of Montevideo on the 11th of March, with about 1,000 armed men, and took possession of the place peacefully.

The French blockade of Buenos Ayres continues with rigor. Passenger packets only are allowed by the French admiral to run from Montevideo to Buenos Ayres. Rosas still holds out, and has sent by the last British packet a minister plenipotentiary (Mr. Moseno) to England, to endeavor to induce that government to interfere in his behalf. American commerce is flourishing at Montevideo, no less than 17 vessels being in port on the 23d of December; but produce was very scarce, and had risen some 15 a 20 per centum within the last ten days—vessels will be detained some time for their cargoes.

The U. S. ship Fairfield and brig Dolphin were at Montevideo on the 23d of December. A "brush," as it is termed, took place between the commander of the Dolphin and the commander of the French fleet, which is thus stated:

"Lieutenant Purviance informed the commander of the French brig then blockading the port, that the American vessel Fleet must be allowed to depart. The French commander insisted that he would capture her; but it was subsequently agreed that the Fleet should be conveyed to Montevideo by the Dolphin, and if the French admiral there should think the Fleet a prize, she should be given up. This was done, and the French admiral disclaimed any control over the F."

NORTHEASTERN FRONTIER. Gen. Scott arrived in this city, from his duties on the Canada frontier, on Saturday last, and left it on Thursday on his way to the northeastern frontier, charged with instructions from the executive relative to the existing difficulties.

The New York Commercial of Tuesday evening, contains the following interesting abstract of the intelligence received since the advices inserted on pages 5 and 6, were received:

After publishing the answer of gov. Fairfield to sir John Harvey's first communication, it proceeds to notice the reply of sir John Harvey to the demand for the release of Mr. McIntyre, dated the 19th. It is courteous, but firm. Sir John informs governor Fairfield that after examination of Mr. McIntyre, the attorney general was of opinion that his offence was rather against the law of nations than against the laws of the province; that it was a state affair, and therefore to be decided upon by the government of Great Britain, to which the case would be referred.

In the meantime sir John has ordered the release of Mr. McIntyre, on parole that he would present himself before the government of New Brunswick whenever required to do so.

Sir John then says: "That if it be the desire of the state of Maine that the friendly relations subsisting between Great Britain and the United States shall not be disturbed, it is indispensable that the armed force from that state now understood to be within the territory in dispute, be immediately withdrawn, as otherwise I have no alternative but to take military occupation of that territory, with a view to protect her majesty's subjects and to support the civil authorities in apprehending all persons claiming to exercise jurisdiction within it.

2d. That it is my duty to require that all persons, subjects of her majesty, who may have been arrested in the commission of acts of trespass within the disputed territory, be given up to the tribunals of the government, there to be proceeded against according to law.

3d. That in the event of the rumor which has just reached me relative to the arrest, detention, and interruption of James McLaughlin, esq., the warden of the disputed territory, being correct, that that officer be enlarged and the grounds of his detention explained.

And concludes by saying:

"With regard to trespasses upon the lands of the disputed territory, I beg leave to assure you that the extent to which these trespasses appear to have been carried, as brought to my knowledge by recent occurrences, will lead me to adopt without any delay the strongest and most effectual measures which may be in my power, for putting a stop to and preventing the recurrence of such trespasses."

Upon receipt of this letter, governor Fairfield ordered the release of Mr. McLaughlin, the warden, also upon parole to surrender himself to the authorities of Maine, whenever required to do so.

Then we have a letter from Geo. F. Street, esq., solicitor general of New Brunswick, to Mr. Jarvis, provisional land-agent, dated at the mouth of the Aroostook river, February 17, expressing, by order of sir John Harvey, his great surprise at the presence of an armed force in the disputed territory, "so called," attempting to exercise jurisdiction there, and seizing upon British subjects, without having given any notice to the authorities of the province, of the causes which led to this act of aggression.

He then gives notice that unless the armed force is immediately withdrawn, and the prisoners are discharged, every person of the aggressing party that can be laid hold of will be made prisoner, sir John Harvey having expressly ordered by his sovereign to hold the territory inviolate, &c.; to which end Mr. Street says, a large military force is assembling, part of which has already arrived, &c.

The following passage of the letter we quote verbatim:

"In doing this his excellency is very desirous to avoid any collision between her majesty's troops and any of the citizens of the U. States, that might lead to bloodshed, and if you remove from the territory peaceably and quietly without further opposition, such collision will be avoided—as in that case his excellency will not think it necessary to move the British troops farther; but if you do not, he will in the execution of the commands of the British government find it necessary to take military possession of the territory, in order to defend it from such invasion, and the consequences must be upon your heads, and upon the authority, if any, under which you act."

Next comes the reply of Mr. Jarvis, dated, "Confidence of the St. Croix, township No. 10, state of Maine, Feb. 19." It repudiates the assumption of Mr. Street, that the position occupied by Mr. Jarvis is not in the state of Maine—hopes that the land agent, Mr. McIntyre, will be released—justifies the arrest of the warden—and concludes with the assurance that, being there under orders from the government of his state, he, Mr. Jarvis, should remain there until otherwise directed by the same authority, and should consider the approach of an armed force as an act of hostility.

These papers, it will be seen, give a tolerably complete history of what has been said and done so far. We add such particulars as have any interest.

Messrs. Rogers and McIntyre arrived at Bangor on the 20th. They were received with a shout of gratulation from the assembled multitude, and Mr. Rogers made a little speech, in which he declared his belief that the difficulty would be settled without a resort to blows. Mr. McIntyre upset all the large stories which had been told by sheriff Strickland, about 300 armed men, &c. Said he was arrested by some 15 or 20 fellows from the Tobique settlement; that if Strickland had pushed on they would have given him up without resistance—and, that if he and Mr. McLaughlin had met before there would have been no trouble. He said he had been treated pretty well, &c. At all which Mr. Sheriff Strickland looked particularly foolish, and the gallant military heroes began to think that after all there would be nothing to fight about. Mr. Rogers and Mr. McIntyre then set off for Augusta.

Meantime, on the 19th, governor Fairfield had ordered out 10,343 of the militia, to be ready for an immediate call into active service.

Messrs. Rogers and McIntyre reached Augusta on the 21st, but their arrival does not seem to have cooled down the military fever of gov. Fairfield, for as late as the 23d, we hear of the militia pushing on by hundreds to the Aroostook. The state of matters is pretty well described in the following letter to the Boston Daily Advertiser:

"Bangor, Feb. 23, 1839.

"Our city has to-day presented the appearance of a sacked town, so little has been doing. The remaining troops left early this morning, and carrying with them as they have a very large number of our citizens, our streets has presented a less active character than upon ordinary business occasions. The excitement of the last few days has subsided, and little has been doing. As for news, we have none. Many rumors have been abroad during the day, but none of them can be relied upon as true. 1,700 of Hall's best rifles have arrived, and a very large supply of blankets, which have been sent up.

It is reported, but with how much truth I am unable to say, that 600 British troops had arrived at the mouth of the Aroostook, about 80 miles from our encampment. I should be rather disposed to doubt the correctness of this rumor, though I have it from good authority.

In my yesterday's letter, I remarked that colonel McLaughlin had been released on his parole. In this I was mistaken—he releases to accept any terms short of an unconditional release, and therefore, refusing to pledge himself, he is still in custody."

Three hundred young men of Bangor, embracing the fire department, have organized into a battalion and demanded arms.

The remainder of the division that so promptly rendezvoused at Bangor, fully equipped, on Thursday, left town Friday for the seat of war.

The breast work thrown up by the Maine forces at the juncture of the St. Croix and Aroostook, is 12 feet thick, and mounted by a brass field piece, to be reinforced by several more pieces.

The Boston Times says—

"The eastern mail arrived last evening at 11 o'clock. The latest papers from Portland and Augusta contain nothing new. A rumor prevailed at Bangor on Friday that a skirmish had taken place on the Aroostook, and that Rines had lost fifty men. The rumor, however, was not in the least credited. Passengers in the stage informed us that about 1,800 troops had already assembled on the Aroostook, and that additions were hourly looked for."

Letter from Maine. The Boston papers of Tuesday furnish but little additional from the disputed territory. The rumor of a collision having taken place is not confirmed. The Augusta correspondent of the Boston Atlas, under date of the 24th February, states that no information east of Bangor had been received since the 19th. The writer adds:

"Gen. Hodson left Bangor on Thursday last with one thousand men detailed from his division. A part of the detachment ordered from this division will leave Augusta on Tuesday next. Most of the companies are ordered to assemble here at 9 o'clock to-morrow morning. The adjutant general has ordered the detachment of cavalry of the third division to form a line express from Bangor to the Aroostook and to Houston. E. L. Hanlin, esq., of Bangor, late land agent, superintends the line. I learn the arrangement will be completed to-morrow—after that time we can therefore expect daily accounts from the frontier. The most intense anxiety is felt to hear from Washington, to learn what course the general government will pursue. It is the general opinion of those who know sir John Harvey, that he will attempt to drive our forces from the disputed territory. This, unless I am very much mistaken in the men sent there, he will find no easy matter."

Three deserters are advertised in the Bangor Whig of Saturday, viz: Samuel F. Jones, of Bangor, from the rifle corps, and William B. Moody, and John Fowler, (a Frenchman,) from the infantry; $10 reward are offered for each of them.

Latest news. The correspondent of the Boston Atlas, in a letter, dated at Augusta, Feb. 25, says: "The troops are collecting at the capital. They will march to-morrow or next day. Last evening intelligence reached us that can be relied upon, that our forces under the immediate command of the land agent, pro tem., had advanced from No. 10, about 30 miles towards Fish river. We are in a state of painful anxiety to hear from them again—the moment one drop of blood is shed the people will rush, without waiting for orders, to the scene of action. The public mind is wrought up to a great excitement. The question is, will sir John Harvey back out? Maine cannot and will not. The legislature of Maine has said by their resolves that the honor and interest of our state demand that a sufficient force shall be placed on the Aroostook and St. John, to protect our property and defend our rights. If the general government does not come to the rescue then we must make a strong appeal to the patriotism of old Massachusetts, and that appeal will not be ineffectual on her chivalric sons. Our ship of state has put to sea with a noble cargo; may God bless the voyage.

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY acknowledges the receipt of one hundred and forty dollars, enclosed to him in an anonymous letter, dated the 18th inst. and postmarked at Raleigh, N. C. Feb. 20, 1839, which the writer states the money was improperly detained by him from the treasury, and requests that it may be applied "to the legitimate purposes of the government."

The amount has been deposited to the credit of the treasurer of the United States.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES, Friday, Feb. 22. In pursuance of the rule requiring ten days' previous notice being given of the time of the adjournment, and, also, with a view to enable the bar, at an early period, to have an opportunity of preparing the remaining causes for argument, the court on this day gave notice that the adjournment would take place on Monday, the eleventh day of March; and that arguments would be heard until Saturday, the ninth day of March.

On Wednesday, Feb. 20. Ex parte—In the matter of Duncan N. Hennen. On motion for a mandamus to the judge of the District court United States for East Louisiana, requiring said judge to restore the petitioner to the office of the clerk of said court, Mr. justice Thompson delivered the opinion of the court in this case, overruling the motion, and refusing to grant the mandamus prayed for.

POUND STERLING. The time has come when a tolerable respect for ourselves requires us to adopt the practice of stating English exchange in dollars and cents. Our chamber of commerce have recommended the plan, and in consequence of their recommendation, it has been adopted generally in other cities, but here it lags. We trust the negotiations for the Great Western, will settle the question forever, and put an end to the absurd method heretofore in use, of assuming a false par, nine per cent. below par, and then selling bills at nine per cent. premium; just to correct the selling error, when in fact the result of both operations is just to get at par. We print a table to-day, which will enable our friends to make their calculations very easily. We beg, however, that the price may be stated in dollars, cents, and even parts, not in the long fractions which equal a certain per cent; for that, after all, would get us out of the difficulty. The principal drawers will to-day adhere, as we understand, to the new method.

LATE FROM ENGLAND.

The steam packet ship Liverpool, captain Fayer, arrived at New York from Liverpool at 7 o'clock on Monday morning. Capt. F. left Liverpool at half past 3 o'clock on the afternoon of the 5th, consequently she has made her passage in eight and a half days.

By this arrival, we have received from our friend George Peabody, esq., now in London, copious files of London papers to the 5th of February and Liverpool to the 6th, both inclusive. We make our extracts, however, from the New York Commercial Advertiser.

GREAT BRITAIN.

We hasten to lay before our readers the royal speech at the opening of parliament. As usual it affords little positive indication of the course intended to be pursued, and is in fact remarkable rather for the thing omitted than for the things introduced. We refer to the subject of the corn-laws, some allusion to which was confidently expected. We presume that by the omission we are to understand that lord Melbourne, the head of the cabinet, is opposed to any new legislation on the subject. Lord John Russell, it is said, will introduce a bill, proposing a fixed duty; and so there seems to be a prospect of that difference in the cabinet, of which we stated our anticipation several weeks ago.

The Royal William arrived out at Liverpool on the 3d of February.

From the London Standard of the evening, Feb. 5.

The business of the second session of parliament during the reign of her present majesty, was opened to-day by a speech from the throne.

The doors of the house of lords were opened at 11 o'clock for the admission of peeresses and others who had obtained tickets of admission from the lord great chamberlain to the body of the house and painted gallery; and shortly after that time the equipage of the nobility and gentry began to arrive in rapid succession. No lady was admitted into the body of the house except in full court dress.

The women of the guard, in their splendid uniforms, arrived at the house of lords at 11 o'clock, and took their stations in the lobby leading to the painted chamber.

In St. Margaret's church-yard, Parliament st. and along the line of road through which the royal procession passed, seats and platforms were erected as usual, and considerable interest existed to obtain a view of our youthful sovereign. Her majesty was enthusiastically received by the assembled crowd, throughout the whole progress from Buckingham palace to the house of lords.

Shortly before two o'clock a discharge of cannon announced that her majesty, accompanied by the great officers of state and the household, had left the palace, and was proceeding to the house of lords. The line through which the procession passed was lined with two regiments of the guards.

The queen arrived at the house of lords about two o'clock, which was announced by a discharge of cannon. Shortly afterwards her majesty, attended by the great officers of state, entered the house, and took her seat on the throne. The foreign ambassadors wore the full costumes of the countries they represented.

Her majesty having directed their lordships to be seated,

The lord chancellor directed the usher of the black rod to summon the commons to hear her majesty's speech on the opening of parliament.

In a few minutes the commons appeared at the bar, headed by the speaker. The space below the bar was crowded with members. After silence had been obtained, her majesty in a clear and audible voice read the following most gracious speech:—

The queen's speech.

"My lords and gentlemen."

"I rejoice to meet you again in parliament. I am particularly desirous of recurring to your advice and assistance at a period when many matters of great importance demand your serious and deliberate attention.

"I continue to receive from foreign powers gratifying assurances of their desire to maintain with me the most friendly relations.

"I have concluded with the emperor of Austria a treaty of commerce, which I trust will extend and improve the intercourse between my subjects and those of the emperor.

"I have also concluded a treaty of the same kind with the Sultan, calculated to place the commercial relations between my dominions and the Turkish empire upon a better and more secure footing.

"I have directed copies of these treaties to be laid before you.

"I have been engaged, in concert with Austria, France, Prussia, and Russia, in negotiations, with a view to a final settlement of the differences between Holland and Belgium.

"A definitive treaty of peace, founded upon anterior arrangements which had been acceded to by both parties, has in consequence been proposed to the Dutch and Belgian governments. I have the satisfaction to inform you that the Dutch government has already signified to the conference its acceptance of that treaty, and I trust that a similar announcement from the Belgian government will put an end to that disquietude which the present unsettled state of these affairs has necessarily produced. The unanimity of the five allied powers affords a satisfactory security for the preservation of peace.

"I lament the continuance of the civil war in Spain, which engages my anxious and undiminished attention.

"Differences which have arisen have occasioned the retirement of my minister from the court of Teheran. I indulge, however, the hope of learning that a satisfactory adjustment of these differences will allow of the re-establishment of my relations with Persia upon their former footing of friendship.

"Events connected with the same differences have induced the governor general of India to take measures for protecting British interests in that quarter of the world, and to enter into engagements, the fulfilment of which may render military operations necessary. For this purpose such preparations have been made as may be sufficient to resist aggression from any quarter, and to maintain the integrity of my eastern dominions.

"The reform and amendment of the municipal corporations of Ireland, are essential to the interests of that part of our dominions.

"It is also urgent that you should apply yourselves to the prosecution and completion of those maxims which have been recommended by the ecclesiastical commissioners of England, for the purpose of increasing the efficacy of the established church, and of confining its hold upon the affections of the people.

"The better enforcement of the law and the more speedy and certain administration of justice, are of the first importance to the welfare of this community, and I am assured that you will be anxious to devote yourselves to the examination of the measures which will be submitted to you for the purpose of obtaining these beneficial results.

"Gentlemen of the house of commons: I have directed the annual estimates to be prepared and laid before you.

"Adhering to the principles of economy, which is my desire to enforce in every department of the state, I felt it my duty to recommend that the adequate provision be made for the exigencies of the public service. I fully rely on your loyalty and patriotism to maintain the efficiency of those establishments which are essential to the strength and security of the country.

"My lords and gentlemen:

"It is with great satisfaction that I am enabled to inform you that throughout the whole of my West Indian possessions the period fixed by law for the final and complete emancipation of the negroes, has been anticipated by acts of the colonial legislature, and that the transition from the temporary system of apprenticeship to entire freedom has taken place without any disturbance of public order and tranquility. Any measure which may be necessary in order to give full effect to this great and beneficial change, will, I have no doubt, receive your careful attention.

"I have to acquaint you, with deep concern, that the province of Lower Canada has again been disturbed by insurrection, and that hostile incursions have been made into Upper Canada by certain lawless inhabitants of the United States of North America. These violations of the public peace have been promptly suppressed by the valor of my forces and the loyalty of my Canadian subjects. The United States has called upon the citizens of the union to abstain from proceedings incompatible with the friendly relations which subsist between Great Britain and the U. States.

"I have directed full information upon all these matters to be laid before you; and I recommend the present state of these provinces to your serious consideration. I rely upon you to support my firm determination to maintain the authority of my crown, and I trust that your wisdom will adopt such measures as will secure to those parts of my empire the benefit of internal tranquillity, and the full advantages of their own great national resources.

"I have observed with pain the persevering efforts which have been made in some parts of the country to excite my subjects to disobedience and resistance to the law, and to resuming dangerous and illegal practices. For the contraction of all such designs I depend upon the efficiency of the law, which it will be my duty to enforce, upon the good sense and right disposition of my people, upon their attachment to the principles of justice, and their abhorrence of violence and disorder.

"I confidently commit all these great interests to your wisdom, and I implore Almightly God to assist and prosper your counsels."

The condition of the navy was still discussed with great eagerness in the London papers. A semi-official statement had been published, showing the number of frigates, ships of the line, &c., in commission, or in such a state as to be quickly brought into employment, if necessary; and making out a very favorable case for England, as compared with France and Russia. The particulars of this statement, on the other hand, have been vehemently attacked by the Times and other opposition journals, and by officers of the navy, all contending, that "the wooden-walls of old England" are wretchedly inefficient, and that either Russia or France, with their large and well-appointed marine, might at any moment sweep the coast of England without opposition.

A provincial paper says that sir Robert Peel will support lord John Russell in his advocacy of a modification of the corn-laws.

Letters received in this city state that the Oxford will sail from Liverpool on the 15th March.

The city of Bath was thrown into consternation on the 25th of January, by the tidings, which proved too true, that Mrs. Tugwell, the wife of the senior partner in the Bath bank, had killed herself and two children, in a moment of insanity. She was but 31 years of age, amiable, accomplished, and universally beloved. The details are painfully interesting.

On Thursday she came from her residence, No. 1, Whitcomb-crescent, with her husband and children, into Bath, where, after proceeding to make purchases at various shops, she was seen walking along the bank of the canal, accompanied by her children, as late as three o'clock in the afternoon; she then, it appears, returned home, and desiring the butler to give her a decanter of sherry, took her children into a summer-house in the garden, saying she was going to give them a treat. Having proceeded there, she administered to the whole of the three children, and then took some herself. Fortunately the oldest boy (10 years of age) did not like the taste of the wine, and drank only a small portion, which, as he says, caused him to sleep, and upon awaking he found his mother sitting apparently asleep, with his two brothers, who were twins of 8 years of age, one lying at her feet and the other across her breast.

Finding himself very ill, and having in vain tried to awaken them, he rushed to the door, which he found locked, but at length succeeded in alarming the house, when the servants found their mistress and the children dead. No cause can be assigned for this melancholy act, but the lady must have been for some considerable time meditating upon it, as she had procured several bottles of prussic acid, and taken the precaution to destroy the labels; and in a notation of one of the labels retained, which, from its dirty state, indicated that it had been some time in the house.

The murderer of lord Norbury has not yet been discovered. A number of persons had been arrested on suspicion, but they were all discharged.

A letter from Constantinople in the Times of January 29, states that Mr. McNeill, the British ambassador at the court of Persia, had again found it necessary to break off all communication with the government, and leave the capital for the Turkish frontier. The shah is said to have manifested a spirit of the bitterest hostility to England; and a rupture between the two countries was regarded as inevitable. Many of the British merchants were preparing to leave Persia, in the confident expectation of hostilities. It was reported that the sale of British merchandise had been prohibited.

A memorial has been presented to the queen in connection with the chamber of commerce of St. John's, Newfoundland, praying for the abolition of the house of assembly, on the ground that its members are the nominees of the Catholic clergy.

An iron steamboat, 145 feet long and 25 feet wide, was launched at Dumbarton on the 22d of January. She is intended for South America, and is fitted up for passengers only, of whom she can carry 1,000. When launched, she drew only 18 inches water, and with her machinery and cargo is to draw but three feet.

The duchess-countess of Sutherland died on the 28th of January, in the 74th year of her age. She was countess of Sutherland in her own right, and duchess by marriage.

On the same day died sir William Beechey, the artist, aged 86.

It is stated, in one of the papers that Mr. sergeant Wilde, being applied to by one of the Canadian prisoners for his professional assistance, was prohibited from acting for them by the government.

The publisher of the Times has been sentenced to a fine of £200 for the libel on sir John Conroy. The government has set on foot an investigation to ascertain whether the late rise in the price of wheat, &c. has or has not actually been caused by a deficiency in the crop.

The case of the Canadian prisoners was not yet decided. Our readers will remember that it was under discussion in two courts, the court of queen's bench and the court of exchequer, writs of habeas corpus having been granted in each.

In the court of queen's bench the case was argued in part on the 25th; but on the 30th Mr. Hill, of counsel for the prisoners, informed the court that proceedings were going on in the exchequer, and, with his consent, the chief justice determined to postpone the former consideration until the decision of that court should be made. The argument in the court of exchequer was deferred until the next term.

Liverpool, Feb. 6.

The North America will be a full ship about noon this day, and will shut out about 15 or 20 tons fine goods. At present she has but one cabin passenger.

Extract from a letter from capt. Rathbone, of the packet ship Oxford, dated

Liverpool, Feb. 6, 1839.

The ship has been thoroughly examined and not a timber in her has been broken. We shall put an entire new keel into her, and also two or three extra thick streaks of a sick, about twenty iron standard knees between decks and cabin, also one or two extra hooks or riders at each end of her, so that she will be, if possible, stronger than she was before.

We shall probably get the Pennsylvania's fore and main mast. All her spars are now in the pier head, except her main-mast, which I think will be taken out this day.

We have estimates of the probable cost of the repairs, outfits, &c., of the ship, which will be from £3,500 to £4,000, of which a large portion will come under general average; I therefore think that about three-fourths of the above named sum will fall on the underwriters.

Effects of the late meeting in Tullamore. On the night of the radical meeting at Tullamore, the 22d ult. captain Belton was attacked by five or six ruffians, at the hill of Ballydull, in the parish of Durrrow; they laid in wait for him in a plantation of lord Norbury's, and brutally assaulted him on the head with bludgeons. Three persons are in custody charged with the offence. On the same night the police were attacked in Frankfort, and assaulted by some of the people, who no doubt, had been engaged at the meeting. Some prisoners the police had taken for rioting were rescued.

FRANCE.

The ministry had not been re-organized, and in consequence of the crisis the king had prorogued the chambers, and dissolved the chamber of deputies. The new elections were to be held on the 2d of March.

M. Dupin had interviews with the king, previous to the prorogation, on the subject of forming a new ministry, but they appear to have resulted in nothing.

It is now declared that count Mole and his colleagues will remain in office, their resignations not having been accepted by the king.

BELGIUM AND HOLLAND.

No event has yet taken place, resulting from the accession of France to the agreement of the protocol powers. The news was received in Brussels with considerable excitement, and in the chamber there was talk of war, &c., but France was pushing forward large bodies of troops to the frontier, and the general opinion was that the treaty would be fulfilled, without a cessation of peace.

Correspondence of the Commercial Advertiser.

Liverpool, February 5.

The inquiry for cotton continues moderate, and principally from the trade, who, from the depressed state of trade at Manchester, have no inducement to purchase beyond their immediate wants; and holders being firm, and unwilling to submit to any decline, the market is quiet at former prices.

Corn markets. Liverpool, Tuesday, Feb. 5. We have again to notice a fair importation of foreign wheat, together with a good supply of Irish flour, but of other articles of the trade the imports since this day se'night have been light. Throughout the week the trade generally has continued dull, but there has latterly been less disposition to press sales, and except as regards the lower qualities of foreign and Irish wheat, which were on Friday offering at rather lower terms, the prices of Tuesday have been sustained. Odessa soft wheat has sold at 9s; Marjanopol, at 9s 6d to 10s; French red at 10s and white at 10s 6d. Baltic red at 10s 6d to 10s 9d; Danzig, 11s to 11s 6d; English, from 11s to 12s; and Irish, from 8s to 9s 6d, per 70 lbs.

CASE OF COMMODORE ELLIOTT.

The following are the minority reports from the special committee of the house of representatives, to whom were referred the official papers in the case of commodore Elliott:

REPORT OF MESSRS. NAYLOR AND CHAMBERS.

The undersigned, two of the minority of the special committee to whom was referred the report of the secretary of the navy, containing the charges of passed midshipman Barton against captain Jesse D. Elliott, of the United States navy, and who were appointed, under the resolution of the house of the 14th instant, to inquire into the official conduct of the said Elliott while in command of the squadron in the Mediterranean, and particularly in to the allegations of tyranny and oppression towards the officers of his command, submit the following report:

The undersigned, differing with the majority of the committee as to the propriety of not commencing the investigation at this late stage of the session, and as the report of the majority will be preserved among the records of the house, they feel it due to themselves to place by its side evidence of an equally pertinent character, that, in their opinion, the time allowed by the house for the prosecution of the inquiry was sufficient for the purpose, and that it was the imperative duty of the committee at once to have proceeded with it.

The complaints against captain Jesse D. Elliott are strong and numerous; and the committee all agree that they require investigation. They have been made and circulated in various forms through the country, and so far as they have reached the ears of the undersigned, through letters, personal communications with individuals who, from their situation, are likely to be acquainted with the facts, and from the public prints, may be put down as follows:

He is charged with the most cruel, inhuman and brutal conduct towards passed midshipman Barton, when sick and wounded; causing him to be dragged from his cot, and removed from his vessel, at the most imminent peril of his life, at a time when he was racked with agonizing pain; and that, too, against the earnest remonstrance of his surgeon and the most affecting appeal from the sufferer.

He is charged with ungentlemanly and unofficerlike conduct towards his officers, with oppressing, disgracing, and confining them, without cause and without accusation, and, when so confined and disgraced, with denying to them a trial, and refusing to communicate to them the cause of his displeasure.

He is charged with endeavoring to bolster up his reputation, and to enrich and sustain himself against the charges of his officers, by procuring to be wrung from the hard earned pittance of his crew costly presents of plate.

He is charged with importing in his frigate large numbers of asses, horses, and other animals, as merchandise, with a view to promote his own private gains; and for the sustenance and accommodation of such animals he has deprived his officers and crew of their rightful and necessary quarters, and sacrificed their health, comfort, and safety, besides exposing his ship to the dangers of conflagration, and endangering her, for the time, utterly unfitted for action.

He is charged with taking such course in his command as tended to induce mutiny among the crew, and, when the mutiny broke out, with omitting to take such manly and officerlike measures as were necessary for its suppression.

He is charged with oppressing his officers with vexatious and causeless courts-martial; with violating the constitution of the United States, by receiving presents from foreign powers; and with daily acts of petty tyranny, unofficerlike and ungentlemanly conduct.

He is charged with gathering together ex parte affidavits, letters and papers, to crush such of his officers as complain of his injuries, and lodging them in the navy department against them, thereby deceiving the department and the people, doing gross injustice to the complainants, as well as to his own honor; instead of meeting his accusers, with the front of conscious innocence, before a competent tribunal, and wiping from his name, if possible, the stain which such charges attach to it.

These charges have, some of them, been made to the navy department, and present, as all the committee agree, a case requiring investigation.

The undersigned are of opinion that investigation into alleged abuses and oppressions such as these, is among the highest duties of the representatives of the people. They cannot think, with the majority of the committee, that the early termination of the session should have formed the excuse for the non-performance of this most important duty; but, on the contrary, that the investigation should have been made at all sacrifices of time and ease; justice should have been done as well to the accused as to the accusers; the truth or falsity of these charges ought to have been made manifest, if all the remaining days and nights of the session should have been consumed in the labor. There were no duties paramount to it—the vindication of violated rights is of the very first importance.

In the opinion of the undersigned, the committee might have completed the investigation, and had, also, time for the performance, in the fullest manner, of all their congressional duties. By sitting early in the mornings and late in the evenings, they might have appropriated six or seven hours a day to the purposes of their inquiry, and have been ever present during the sittings of the house—a time which, if the investigation had been proceeded in when the committee first organized, would have been ample for a thorough evisceration of the whole case.

Having thus briefly stated their views of what they conceived to be the duties of the committee, and protesting against being held to a responsibility for the non-performance of that which they believed to be a solemn obligation, due to the navy and the country, and imposed upon the committee by an almost unanimous vote of the house of representatives, they have done all that they proposed to themselves in making this report.

CHARLES NAYLOR,
JOHN CHAMBERS.

Washington, February 19, 1839.

REPORT OF MR. LYON.

The undersigned, a member of the committee appointed under the resolution of the house of the 14th of February, "to inquire into the official conduct of captain Jesse D. Elliott, of the United States navy, while in command of the squadron in the Mediterranean in the years 1837 and 1838, and particularly into the allegations of tyranny and oppression towards the officers under his command," dissented from the majority of the committee, in declining, for the reasons stated in their report and resolutions, to proceed with the investigation, and in asking to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject. The committee having made no progress in the investigation, the undersigned has had no opportunity of ascertaining the precise nature of the complaints made against the conduct of capt. Elliott, and, of course, has no opinion to express thereon, either favorable or unfavorable.

The house of representatives having, by the resolution under which the committee was organized, made it their duty to make the investigation, the undersigned was willing, so far as he was concerned, to proceed in the execution of the order of the house, and to prosecute the same to as early a termination as the importance of the subject, the character of the navy, and the rights of the officer implicated, would authorize.

He considered it due to the house, to the country, and to the officer whose conduct is involved in the inquiry, that complaints such as have been made in debate, and such as seem to be implied by the resolution, should undergo a full and thorough investigation, and, if found to be true, the proper corrective should be applied. If found untrue, it is important that the officer complained of should be relieved from censure.

COMMODORES PORTER AND ELLIOTT.

From the Baltimore Sun of the 27th ult.

We publish below two letters from those distinguished individuals. In a former publication of commodore Porter, it was stated that he and commodore Elliott never were on terms of intimacy or friendship, and these letters, a portion of a former correspondence, are designed to exhibit the parties in the light of free correspondents. Thus much for an explanation. Without expressing an opinion, we give them on the ground of a willingness to do "equal justice." It may be necessary to say they were furnished by a friend of commodore Elliott; the originals are in our possession.

U. S. ship Constitution, off Tunis,
Oct. 20th, 1836.

MY DEAR COMMODORE: I was in hopes to find you here on my arrival, and cannot but express my disappointment, notwithstanding I should have to perform a serious quarantine. I take pleasure in informing you that three of your sons are aboard of the squadron, one of which, little Henry, I will leave here for you, as I am without advices from the government, respecting him, and presuming that will meet your wishes. I find he is a very smart, intelligent boy, but will require something of a taut rein upon him to make a man of him. The others I will order to the vessel that comes to carry you to Constantinople in the spring, so that you may see them, as I suppose they would like to remain out on this station. While at Jerusalem, the missionaries there requested me to speak to Mehmet Ali about enclosing a piece of ground for a cemetery, a copy of their statements I herewith enclose you, which I did during an interview with him, and he assented to it at once, but stated, to avoid difficulty from the other sects, that it would be well to obtain a firman from the sultan, though his assent was the main thing, and I wrote them to apply directly to you on this subject. While passing along the coast of Syria, I could not but notice the necessity of our commercial affairs being on a footing with those of England, France, and Russia, and as I found H. H. so very favorably disposed towards our country, I put the question to him direct. He most willingly granted it, and said that he would want a firman from the sultan, though it was a mere form, as he granted the substance himself. He drew my attention particularly to Mr. Chapeaud, our consul at Beyroot, who, he says establishes agencies and vice-consuls at places where we have no need of one, and thereby deprives him of the right over his own subjects, who are protected by the agencies. H. H. is very anxious to have a consul general at Alexandria, through whom what agencies are necessary on the coast of Syria, be established, so that all the correspondence, &c. that may arise can be conducted with him. I mention these things not with a view to interfere in the least with whatever appertains to your official matters, but merely to inform you how matters stand there just now, and of the state of feeling of H. H. towards our country, and its representatives. He paid me a visit while at Alexandria, and I received and treated him in such a manner that will not soon be forgotten. I have this summer made a very active cruise. After leaving Mahon the last of May, I touched at Toulon, Genoa, Leghorn, Civita Vecchia, Naples, Palermo, Messina, Corin, Milo Napoli, Catania, along the coast of Syria, Tripoli, Beyroot, Sidon, Jaffa, Alexandria, & Tripoli, and now here. I intend from this to go to Mahon, but not for winter quarters, only to prepare my squadron for a cruise, as my intention is to keep actively employed while in command in the Mediterranean. Your letters will find me by addressing them to Gibraltar for the next three months; after that at Marsailles. Wishing you a speedy restoration to good health, I remain

Sincerely and very respectfully,

Your most obedient serv't.

To com. Porter.

Charge d'affaires, Constantinople, (now at Tunis.)

P. S. I should like to show the North Carolina at Constantinople and Odessa in the spring. Write me what you think, and if it can be done.

Tunis, Nov. 17th, 1836.

MY DEAR SIR: You will herewith receive my official reply to those parts of your letter which call for it, and now allow me to express to you my sincere thanks for your considerate kindness in leaving my little boy at Tunis, and intentions with regard to my other sons, whom I shall be rejoiced to see.

I endeavored to get to Tunis to meet you or about the time you were expected to return from the Levant, but in consequence of delays, caused by want of conveyance from Leghorn and Marsailles, this could not take place, nor could I see my son William on account of the sailing of the vessel that brought me here about half an hour before the time appointed for meeting him at the health office, at the latter place.

I hope your cruise in the East has been as pleasant as it must have been interesting, and improving to the officers, who, doubtless, particularly the younger ones, will derive more advantage from active employment at sea than in spending their time uselessly at Mahon.

I find the state of my health greatly improved since my departure from Malta, and have strong hopes that it will be perfectly restored after passing the winter here.

Accept my best wishes for your health and happiness, and believe me to be
Your obedient, humble servant,

DAVID PORTER.

CORRESPONDENCE—PUBLIC LANDS.

At a meeting of the Democratic Whig Association of the 10th ward, held at Columbian hall, on the evening of the 15th February, inst. the following correspondence was read and directed to be published.

New York, January 22, 1839.

SIR: We have the honor of enclosing, by order of the Democratic Whig Association of the tenth ward of the city of New York, a copy of certain resolutions adopted by that body on the 14th instant.

The association considered it not inappropriate at this time, when so strong an effort is making to divert the splendid patrimony of the public lands from its legitimate objects, to awaken general attention to the subject, and to encourage, with a favorable voice, (which it is hoped will be responded to from other popular bodies,) those advocates of equal justice who have steadily resisted the proposed scheme of spoliation. Among those who, on the floor of congress, have fought that good fight, no one has been more persevering or distinguished than yourself. You have surveyed all the various bearings of the question, not with the narrow views of a mere politician calculating local and temporary results, or sacrificing the national interest to those of particular individuals or states, but with the enlightened judgment of a patriotic statesman, providing for the good of the whole, and equally for the present and the future.

It is a subject of lasting regret, in which impartial men of all parties will at no distant day participate, that the bill upon this subject, which you introduced at a former session and which passed through both houses of congress, framed as it was upon principles of enlarged policy and justice to all the states, and carrying with it the commendation and support of persons of politics so very opposite, should have been arrested by the personal prejudices against yourself of the then executive.

Although thus prevented from appearing as a law on our national statute-book, yet the impartial historian will treasure it up, amongst those magnificent and profound conceptions which entitle you, more than any one of our living statesmen, to be considered, emphatically, the originator and father of useful and patriotic measures of legislation. It will be regarded by posterity as another addition to those brilliant acts of your political life, which, ascending always by a happy gradation, show how conscientiously in your case, have been united the gifts (so rarely seen together) of an unsurpassed eloquence, with clearness and profundity of views in legislation and practical action.

Permit us to accompany this act of official duty with the expression of feelings of personal respect.

We are your very obedient servants,

WM. TURNER,

J. TURNER DODGE,

Secretary Democratic Whig Association,

Tenth Ward, New York.

Hon. Henry Clay.

Washington, 9th February, 1839.

Gentlemen—I have duly received your letter, transmitting certain resolutions adopted by the Democratic Whig Association of the tenth ward, in the city of New York, in relation to the public domain; and request you to make the association my profound acknowledgments for the notice with which it has honored my name. I rejoice that the people, in their primary assemblies, and in their proper communities, are directing their attention to this great interest. It was high time that it should receive their earnest consideration. Faithfully administered, the public lands may be made powerfully instrumental in the advancement of the prosperity of the present generation, and of their prosperity for a long succession of ages. But they have been in danger of being swept away by pre-emptions, Indian reservations, graduation bills, and finally cessions of the common property of all the states to the particular states in which it is situated. And most of these projects, urged under the plausible pretext of benefiting the poor settler, have stimulated speculation, and tended to aggrandize the speculator to the prejudice both of the honest emigrant and the people of the United States. I have felt it to be my duty to oppose these projects; and it is a deplorable evidence of the loose morality which prevails in respect to the public property, that I have been denounced and calumniated for my endeavors to protect and preserve it for the benefit of all the states and people of the union.

I share with you, gentlemen, in regret, on account of the failure of the bill to distribute the net proceeds of the public lands, which passed both houses of congress. It was defeated by a high-handed and daring violation of the constitution. If it had gone into operation, there would have been no extraordinary surplus in the treasury, no disturbance of the financial and business concerns of the country by a bungling removal of the deposits, no temptation to those alarming and annual appropriations which have been recently made by the federal government, and I believe no suspension of specie payments by the banks. Now that the public attention is awakened to this great national resource, I trust that the projects to which I have adverted will be checked, and that it will be cherished and preserved for the common benefit of all the people of the United States and their posterity.

I request, gentlemen, your acceptance of my thanks, for the flattering and friendly manner in which you have communicated the resolutions of the Democratic Association of the tenth ward, and of the high consideration with which,

I am, your friend and obedient servant,

H. CLAY.

NORTH-EASTERN BOUNDARY.

The following message from the governor of Maine, was sent to the house by the secretary of state:

To the senate and house of representatives:

Since my last communication to you upon the subject of the trespassers upon the public lands, there has been forwarded to me a proclamation of the governor of the province of New Brunswick, which I deem it my duty to communicate to you, with a statement of my proceedings consequent thereon. By this proclamation, it seems that, while the lieutenant governor disavows any authority from his government for the seizure of the land agent, he yet speaks of the attempt of the civil authorities of this state to drive a band of armed trespassers from our public lands as "an outrage" and an invasion of the territory of the province of New Brunswick, and avows the fact of having ordered "a sufficient military force" to repair to the place where the land agent's party are endeavoring to execute your resolve of the 24th of January, and to repel what he thus regards as an invasion of the province of New Brunswick. Immediately upon the receipt of this extraordinary document, I took measures to hasten the departure of the reinforcement of the land agent's party, understood to have been assembled at Bangor, waiting orders, and numbering between four and five hundred; and also issued an order to major general Isaac Hodgdon, of the 3d division, to detach one thousand men, by draught or otherwise, properly officered and equipped, who were to rendezvous at Bangor, and then proceed, at the earliest possible moment, to the place occupied by the land agent's party, on or near the Aroostook river, there to render such aid as would enable the land agent to carry into effect the resolve of the 24th of January.

I also dispatched a special messenger with a communication to major Kirby, of the United States artillery, commanding at Hancock's barracks, Houlton, informing him of the facts, and asking his co-operation, with the troops under his command, with the forces of this state, in repelling an invasion of our territory, and sustaining our citizens in the lawful and authorized protection they are endeavoring to extend over a portion of the property of the state.

If these proceedings on my part meet the approbation of the legislature, and an appropriation be made for the purpose, I shall feel it to be my duty to proceed forthwith to order a draft from the militia, of at least ten thousand men, who will hold themselves in instant readiness to march to the frontier should circumstances require it.

I have not yet called upon the president of the United States for aid in repelling the invasion of our territory by foreign troops, deeming it proper to postpone that step until the return of colonel Rogers from his special mission to Frederickton, or, at least, until some information shall be received from him, which will probably be as early as the 20th or 21st instant. If, however, you should think otherwise, and that no delay should be allowed for this purpose, an intimation to that effect will be promptly obeyed.

If I have not entirely misconceived the circumstances of the case presented for your consideration, it is one calculated to excite the deepest feelings in the breasts of our citizens, and calls for the most prompt and determined action on the part of this government. What is that case? You were informed that a large number of armed and desperate men from a neighboring province forced themselves into the territory of this state with a fixed purpose of cutting a vast amount of timber, and of resisting, even unto blood, any attempt to arrest them in the prosecution of their unlawful object. Deeming it your duty to make an effort to protect the interests of those who had confided them to your care, you instructed the land agent to proceed to the scene of devastation and plunder with a sufficient force to arrest those who were engaged in it, and to break up their daring and wicked enterprise. While in the act of executing this order, the land agent was seized, transported beyond the bounds of the state, and finally carried upon a sled, like a felon, and under the guard of provincial troops, to the capital of New Brunswick, for trial. Could a greater indignity be offered to any people having a particle of sensibility to its rights and its honor, or to the sacredness of the personal liberty of its citizens? It is true that the lieutenant governor denies that the original seizure was by authority. But at Woodstock the magistrates took cognizance of the affair, sanctioned the proceedings by issuing a warrant, (acting, undoubtedly, under the authority of the proclamation,) and sending the citizens under an ignominious escort, to Fredericton. Really, if there be any citizens, justification for this treatment of our territory, it is not to be found in any code of international honor or comity with which I have been acquainted. Not only this, but it seems that a military force is sent into a part of the territory of this state to expel from it a civil force sent there by this government for the protection of its property. How long are we thus to be trampled upon—our rights and claims denied; our power contemned, and the state degraded! If there ever was a time when the spirit of independence and self-respect should arouse itself, that time is the present. We cannot tamely submit to be driven from our territory while engaged in the civil employment of looking after and protecting our property, without incurring a large measure of ignominy and disgrace.

No palliating circumstances that place where it can be found in even a pretence that the place where it was committed is within the concurrent jurisdiction of the two governments, much less that the British government have had exclusive jurisdiction. Lands even higher up and beyond this, were surveyed and granted by the state of Massachusetts more than thirty years ago. And Massachusetts and Maine have long been in the habit of granting permits to cut timber upon the Aroostook lands without being, to my knowledge, molested from any quarter, to say nothing of the sales and actual occupation of the land itself.

It must be gratifying to all who have a true sense of the honor and interest of the state, to perceive that upon this subject, the din of party warfare is hushed, and that a unanimity has prevailed alike honorable and patriotic. No intemperance to this commendable spirit, I trust, will be suffered. Union and good feeling, no less than prudence and energy, are absolutely necessary in this extraordinary emergency.

JOHN FAIRFIELD.

Council chamber, February 15, 1839.

Since writing the foregoing, I have received a communication from the lieutenant governor of the province of New Brunswick, in which he sets up an alleged agreement that the British government should have exclusive jurisdiction and possession of the disputed territory until the question be settled; and informs us that he is instructed not to suffer any interference with that possession and jurisdiction. He entreats us to withdraw the land agent's party, and adds that he has directed a strong force of "her majesty's troops to be in readiness to support her majesty's authority, and protect her majesty's subjects in the disputed territory, in the event of this request not being immediately complied with."

In regard to all this, I have only to say that there is no reason to doubt the entire correctness of the course we have thus far pursued, and that with the blessings of God, I trust we shall persevere. No such agreement as that alluded to by the lieutenant governor can be recognized by us; and it is an entire misapprehension, to say the least of it, that such an agreement has ever been made. The letter having been written before Mr. McIntire reached Fredericton, no official communication is made as to the course intended to be pursued in regard to him and those arrested with him. I learn, however, indirectly, that they are to be retained.

I am informed that the land agent's party have stationed themselves, for the present, at the termination of the Aroostook road. While there, Mr.

McLaughlin, the provincial land agent, presented himself, and, in the name of her majesty, warned our party to disperse. Mr. McLaughlin and his two assistants were therefore taken into custody, and the agent, with one assistant, immediately sent to Bangor, where they are now detained. Copies of the proclamation and letter of the lieutenant governor of New Brunswick are herewith communicated.

JOHN FAIRFIELD.

After the message had been read, Mr. Allen, of Bangor, offered the following resolve:

STATE OF MAINE.

"Resolve for the protection of the public lands.

"Resolved, That the honor and interest of this state demand that a sufficient military force be forthwith stationed on the Aroostook river, west of the boundary line of the state, as established by the treaty of 1793; and on the river St. John, if found practicable, at such points as may be best adapted to the object, to prevent further depredations on the public lands, and to protect and preserve the timber and other lumber already cut there, by trespassers, and to prevent its removal without the limits of the state."

Mr. Deslender moved to amend by adding the following resolve, which was adopted:

"Resolved, That the sum of eight hundred thousand dollars be, and hereby is, appropriated for the purpose of enabling the executive to carry out the purposes of the foregoing resolve, and the resolve passed January 24, 1839; that the governor be, and hereby is, authorized, with the advice of council, to draw his warrant for the same, from time to time, as it may be needed for that purpose.

The question (on the passage of the resolution to be engrossed) was taken by yeas and nays, and decided unanimously in the affirmative: yeas 150, nays none.

On motion of Mr. Vose, of Augusta, Ordered, That the governor be requested to communicate forthwith to the executive of Massachusetts any information in his possession in relation to trespasses committed on the disputed territory, and to request the co-operation of that state in the measures taken by this state.

This order was unanimously adopted.

Mr. Sheldon, of Gardiner, introduced the following resolve:

"Additional resolve respecting trespasses on the public lands. Resolved, That the governor be requested forthwith to communicate to the president of the United States the measures recently adopted by the state of Maine in relation to trespasses on the public lands of the state, and also copies of the correspondence between the governor of New Brunswick and the executive of Maine in relation to these measures, together with a statement in his possession relative to the subject; and to request the aid of the general government in support of the rights of the state of Maine."

The passage of this resolve to be engrossed was taken by yeas and nays, and decided unanimously in the affirmative; yeas 148, nays none.

John D. McCrate, esq., of Wiscasset, has been sent to Washington as bearer of despatches to the president. He left here this afternoon. The governor has issued orders to the commanding officers of the several divisions to order one thousand men to be drafted in each, to hold themselves in readiness to march at a moment's warning to our north-eastern frontier.

The following is the communication referred to by governor Fairfield.

GOV. HARVEY TO GOV. FAIRFIELD.

Government house,

Fredericton, New Brunswick, Feb. 13, 1839.

SIR: I have just heard, with the utmost surprise and regret, that, without the courtesy of any intimation whatever to this government, an armed force from the state of Maine has entered the territory, the claim to which is in dispute between Great Britain and the United States, and which it has been agreed between the two general governments shall remain in the exclusive possession and jurisdiction of England until that claim be determined.

It has been my duty, on more than one occasion to apprise the executive government of Maine that my instructions do not permit me to suffer any interference with that possession and jurisdiction, until the question of right shall have been finally decided, in discussion between the two general governments.

With the knowledge of these instructions thus explicitly made known, I cannot but repeat the expression of the deep regret which I feel, that, instead of seeking their recall or modification through the presidential government, the state of Maine should thus have forced upon a subordinate officer the alternative of either failing in his duty by abstaining from the fulfilment of the command of his sovereign, or by acting up to them, placing the two countries in a state of border collision, if not the two nations in inveterate and active hostility.

Such, nevertheless, is the position in which I find myself placed by this overt act on the part of the state of Maine—one from which I do not hesitate in entreating your excellency to relieve me, by ordering the immediate recall of a force whose presence within the precincts of the territory as claimed by England it is contrary to my instructions to permit; and it is proper that I should acquaint your excellency that I have directed a strong force of her majesty's troops to be in readiness to support her majesty's authority and to protect her majesty's subjects in the disputed territory, in the event of this request not being immediately complied with.

With regard to any plea for these proceedings on the part of the state of Maine, connected with timber spoliations in that territory, I have to inform your excellency that I have given directions for a boom to be placed across the mouth of the Aroostook, where the seizing officer, protected by a sufficient guard, will be able to prevent the passage of any timber into the St. John in the spring, or to seize it and expose it to public sale for the benefit of the "disputed territory fund."

Similar precautions will be adopted in regard to any timber cut upon the Upper St. John, or the tributary streams falling into it.

Anxiously awaiting your excellency's reply to this communication,

I have the honor to be your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

J. HARVEY.

GOVERNOR EVERETT'S MESSAGE TO THE LEGISLATURE OF MASSACHUSETTS.

Massachusetts legislature, Wednesday, Feb. 20.

The following message was received from the governor:

To the senate and house of representatives:

I transmit to the two houses copies of the several documents received from his excellency the governor of Maine, on the 18th and 19th instant. They relate to the trespasses committed on the public lands, the property of Maine and Massachusetts, by bands of plunderers associated in large bodies, for the purpose of carrying on their operations without interruption. The measures taken by Maine to enable her land agent to put a stop to these depredations, and the purpose of resisting these measures by military force, announced by the lieutenant governor of the province of New Brunswick, will appear from the papers communicated. The course adopted and sanctioned by the local authorities of New Brunswick, has led the legislature of the state of Maine to the adoption of vigorous measures for the protection of the public property, and the defence of the agents employed in removing the depredators.

Among the papers transmitted by governor Fairfield, is a copy of a resolve of the house of representatives of Maine of the 18th instant, requesting the aid of Massachusetts in the measures adopted by Maine, relative to the trespassers on the public lands. The opinions and feelings of Massachusetts on the great questions connected with the north-eastern boundary, have been so often set forth in the public acts of her legislature and executive, that they do not need to be repeated. The land agent of the commonwealth has at all times efficiently cooperated with the land agent of Maine, in all measures for the protection of public property which fall within the scope of the ordinary duties of those officers.

I had the honor in my address to the legislature at the beginning of the session, as on more than one former occasion of the same kind, to call the attention of the two houses to the ruinous extent of the depredations committed on the public lands in that region—the rightful sovereignty and government of the territory belong exclusively to Maine. Massachusetts has no jurisdiction over it, and possesses only an interest in the moiety of the soil. For this reason, no further steps on our part have been taken within the competence of Massachusetts, to maintain her right in the territory which forms the subject of controversy so long protracted, between the governments of the United States and Great Britain. Should a state of things unhappily arise in which the government of the United States shall call upon Massachusetts for her assistance in asserting the rights so long and so injuriously withheld, I am persuaded that the call will receive a prompt response from the legislature and the people.

EDWARD EVERETT.

Council chamber, Feb. 20, 1839.

[We have before us a large number of other interesting documents in relation to this subject, which we are compelled to omit for the want of room. Our readers will, however, find on the first and second pages the latest news of interest in relation to this perplexing question.]

COLLECTION AND DISBURSEMENT OF THE REVENUE.

In the house of representatives, February 6, 1839.

Mr. R. M. T. Hunter, from the select committee to which the subject was referred, made the following report:

The select committee to whom were referred, on the 5th of January, certain resolutions in relation to the mode of collecting and disbursing the public revenue, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

It seems to have been the object of the resolutions referred to this committee, first, to leave the public money in the hands of the public debtor until actually wanted by the government; thus utilizing this portion of the capital of the country to the uses of trade, at the same time that interest is secured to the public as the consideration of its use.

Secondly, to set off periodically the liabilities to and from the government, by fixing certain days, at intervals of three months, for receipts and disbursements, so as to concentrate as many demands to and from the United States as may be practicable at the same time and place.

Thirdly, to diminish the risk of speculation and default on the part of public officers; first, by this exchange of credit, which, so far as it can be effected, accomplishes at the same period the collection and disbursement of the revenue, without affording a temptation to them; and, next, by prohibiting for such transactions, that the money which passes through the hands of the public officers shall be limited in quantity to the actual demands to be made upon them within a period so short as twenty days.

And, fourthly, to introduce greater order and facility in the administration of the treasury department, by fixing these stated periods for receipt and disbursement, so as to enable the secretary to obtain adequate notice, not only of the sum due from the government, and of the time and place of demand, but also of the sums due to the government, and of the time and place of receipt.

These being the objects of the resolutions, the first inquiry suggested to the committee was as to the means, if any, of attaining them.

There can be no difficulty in arranging the receipts so as to cause the sums for customs to flow into the public treasury at fixed quarterly periods. It is supposed that the first section of the bill heretofore reported accomplishes that object without changing the compromise act, or in any manner affecting the great interests concerned in it. The main questions are not only as to the ultimate solvency of the debts thus incurred by the merchants, but as to their punctuality in meeting their engagements in time for the emergencies of the system proposed by these resolutions. That the bonds thus given would be ultimately paid with a very inconsiderable loss to the public, your committee entertain no doubt. The nature of the penalties imposed by existing laws and by the 2d section of this bill, the experience of the government, and the high character of the American merchant, all justify this confidence in his fidelity to his engagements. The act of the 2d of March, 1790, already provides that the obligors who fail to pay their bonds given for duties when due, shall no longer be entitled to credit at the custom house. Superadded to this summary process given against them by the 2d section of this bill, in the event of their failure to pay at the day; and it is hardly to be supposed that the merchant would enter into any engagements under such penalties, which he might not surely expect to meet at the proper time; and more especially when, upon so short a time, as is here supposed, he would so soon be exposed to the entire loss of credit, and perhaps of property. It would rarely happen that a merchant who was able to import the goods would be unable to pay the duties in three months from the time when he certifies that he would not likely hazard his credit and property by exposing himself to the chance of a default, made so notorious and so speedily prosecuted as would be the case under the existing laws and that now proposed. The high value which every merchant places upon his credit forbids such a supposition. Indeed, the experience of our government affords almost demonstrative evidence of the justice of this conclusion. In 1824, William H. Crawford, then secretary of the treasury, made a report exhibiting the entire amount of losses sustained upon the bonds given for customs, from 1789 up to the 31st of December, 1823. From this it appears that, out of $527,450,239 secured by bonds for customs during this entire period, the loss had not exceeded $1,576,626; whilst $758,191 only were considered doubtful; thus demonstrating the sums lost and doubtful not to have been more than forty hundredths of one per cent. upon the amount collected. From 1823 to 1833 the proportion of loss seems to have been greater, as appears from a report made by the secretary of the treasury in the last year; but even with the addition of this period to the former estimate, the loss will be found less than one per cent. If additional evidence of the fidelity of the American merchants to their engagements were to be required, it might be found in the wonderful efforts which they make amid the difficulties of the late crisis to sustain their credit. Of the protested bills returned to them from abroad, which were said to have amounted to £2,000,000 sterling, nearly the whole amount has been paid. A London paper has stated the loss at less than one-fiftieth of one per cent. Looking to these facts, we feel assured that the proposed mode of securing the public funds approximates so nearly to perfect safety, that we should find no difficulty in recommending an entire exchange of credit for cash in collecting the duties, if there were any considerations of convenience or political expediency which peculiarly recommended the former mode. But, in point of fact, the plan now proposed incurs fewer of the objections urged against the credit system of duties than that in present operation. It is true that a small portion of the duties are collected in cash under the present system, but they bear a proportion to the whole amount of not more than 1 to 4, whilst the balance is given to the treasury for six months. Under the plan proposed, the credit will not extend beyond three months and twenty days, (and rarely so long,) before a partial payment at least will be required, together with a re-examination of the security. No case can well arise in which the credit will exceed six months, and then only for the surplus not required at once for the purposes of the government. This periodical supervision of the securities for public money, at short intervals of time, it is believed, will render those securities not only safer than under the present system, but sufficiently so for all practical purposes.

To recommend the proposed system, however, it may be said that a punctual payment of these debts, when due, will be necessary, and that the operation of this machinery contemplates a greater degree of exactness, in this respect, than is usually found in the operations of trade. A close examination of the evidence by which we are given to the probability of this, will go far to remove this suspicion. The repeated evidences ought by our merchants of their fidelity to their engagements, through a long series of years, have been referred to already. These, together with the penalties imposed by this bill for a want of promptitude in redeeming their obligations, seem to justify the expectation of a sufficient degree of punctuality for the purposes of the proposed system.

The successful operation of this system will not require entire punctuality in the merchants, or even a greater degree of it than has been usual in their past dealings with the government. In the report of Mr. Crawford, before referred to, a period of thirty-three years is embraced, during which the greatest loss ever sustained upon the bonds given for duties was incurred in 1819, and was less than 1 1/2 per cent. and here it is to be observed, that the proportion of loss to the income secured by bonds in 1819 and 1823 was more than four times as great as the average proportion during the residue of the thirty-three years embraced by this report. A deficiency so small as this would probably be provided for, in all cases, by the estimate made at the treasury department for the sums to be drawn from the bonds when they are due; but if sometimes the loss should not be covered in this way, the funds arising from the land sales, which, for the present, are not included in the proposed arrangement, would be available to correct these irregularities. But even if the lands were included within the system, there would always be a resource in the surplus ample enough to supply any deficiencies from defaulting debtors. It will be perceived that the true process is a mode of keeping a surplus with entire convenience and without loss either to the government or the community; the debtor retaining the use of the money, and the government drawing the interest. A small surplus has been considered always as necessary for the safe and convenient administration of the treasury department, which occasionally is forced to meet emergencies not easily foreseen. This surplus has scarcely ever been less than two millions, which in a revenue of customs of twenty millions, would leave 10 per cent. of that amount in the shape of a bonded surplus. Now, there is no period in the history of our finances which shows a deficiency of any thing like 10 per cent. in the payments of the merchants upon their bonds. The greatest loss ever sustained in this way, during the period embraced by Mr. Crawford's report, was less than 1 1/2 per cent. and which even in this moderate surplus would cover many times over. The extension of the merchants' bonds, in the late general suspension of specie payments, has not been considered as affording any exception to this rule. It may be doubted whether that measure did not proceed as much from liberality as necessity; and if it was compelled by necessity, that originated not so much from the inability of the merchants to pay their debts, as from their inability to meet a sudden demand for a large amount of specie, in which alone the debts to government could be paid by the existing laws. Under the proposed system they never could be at a loss for the medium in which to pay their dues to government. The drafts drawn in favor of public creditors would be always available for this purpose. The first and second sections of this bill would, therefore, provide (as is believed) for the payment of public dues for customs at quarterly periods, and with sufficient punctuality for the wants of the system.

The next end contemplated by these resolutions is, to produce an offset of the liabilities to and from the government at quarterly periods. To attain this object, sections have been introduced into this bill, which provide that the disbursements of the United States shall be made, as far as practicable, on four quarterly days, occurring at not more than twenty days after those fixed for receipts; that for the purpose, the drafts may be drawn upon the collectors at the next receipt day, which bear an interest within certain limits, and that the payee or assignee of these drafts shall present them at the specified time and place, or else forfeit the interest and the guaranty of the government for the ultimate payment of funds placed in the hands of its agents to discharge the debt due to him. Recourse is given, however, to the creditor upon the official bonds of these agents.

The first inquiry suggested by these provisions is, how far is it practicable to arrange the disbursements at quarterly periods? The expenses for the foreign service, and some of those in the Indian department, could not, perhaps, be drawn within this arrangement; but it might easily be made to comprehend most of the disbursements upon the army, the navy, the civil list, and so much of the public works as is expended by contract. These consist of a great mass of public expenditures; and so far as they could be made by drafts to the public creditor, the collection and disbursement of the revenue would be accomplished by the mere exchange of credits. These drafts would satisfy the public faith to its creditors, because, within the specified limits, the secretary would always impose such an interest as would render them immediately exchangeable for specie; and in any event they would be paid in specie, if held by the creditor, within a period of not more than ninety days, and with an interest to compensate him for the delay. But in point of fact, they would enter into the exchanges of the country. With the provisions that the bonds are to be paid in specie, if not discharged in these drafts, together with the penalties upon a failure to present them speedily, as required, it would become the interest of the banks, the merchants, and the public creditor, to facilitate them out to the intended destination. Drawn, as they must be, at not less than seventy nor more than ten days, there would be ample time to transmit them between the most distant extremities of the union, whilst the provisions before referred to would effectually exclude them as currency, and confine their uses to the simple purposes of offset or exchange. It may, perhaps, be doubted whether, at first, the public creditor, from a want of knowledge of the system, might not fail to present the draft with promptness enough for these purposes of exchange, and might not incur the penalties for this failure as much from ignorance as neglect. Some mistakes of this kind might be made at first, but there would be too many interests concerned in teaching him the true mode of disposing of his drafts to suppose that he would long remain ignorant upon the subject. All errors of this sort might be removed, however, by a short specification on the face of the draft of the penalties imposed upon a neglect to present it as required by law.

This system of exchanges, together with the provision for leaving the surplus in the hands of the public debtors, will leave a very small portion of these bonds to be collected in actual money. The payment of such a sum in specie as required by this bill, cannot produce a sensible effect upon the banks, or give inconvenience to the merchants, by causing periodical ebbs and flows in their demands for capital. During the period between disbursements and receipts, the easy and insensible operations of exchange will furnish them with the means of paying far the greater portion of their bonds by a mere offset of credits to the mutual convenience of themselves and the government.

There remains to be noticed one other difficulty in the practical operation of this exchange of credit,

The drafts disbursed to public creditors, and drawn in anticipation of the revenue, might exceed, in some ports, the proportion of the debts to be paid at those places. But, in such cases, it would always happen, where the disbursements did not exceed the receipts, that there would be a corresponding deficiency in the drafts drawn upon other places of receipt. To adapt this state of things to the equal proportions of the surplus to be left in the different sections, a provision is introduced, which enables the collector to direct any excess of these drafts to a disbursing officer, to be designated by the secretary of the treasury. This officer may always be supplied with the funds to meet these drafts from the offices upon which too little had been drawn at the previous day of disbursement. The department, in all cases, having at least seventy days' notice of the drafts which are outstanding, together with a knowledge of the bonds falling due upon the day when they are to be paid, will probably find no difficulty in preserving both the faith of the government and the policy of this bill.

Another object contemplated by these resolutions is, to remove, as far as possible, the danger of speculation on the part of the public officers. This will certainly be accomplished to a very great extent under the system now proposed. If proper regulations were made, so as to inform the secretary of the treasury as to the bonds which passed into the collector's hands, they could scarcely become the subjects of theft; and to the extent that the disbursements were made in drafts, there would be absolute safety as to the disbursing officers. Nor would there be much danger as to the sum collected in money. This amount would, of necessity, be sent, and passing immediately from the collecting to the disbursing officer, would not remain in the hands of the latter more than twenty days before every cent would be demanded by the public creditor. Defaults in either of these officers would be so quickly detected, that the restraint upon them would be almost perfect. The great temptation to default, arising, generally, out of large sums lying idle for a long time with those who keep them, would, of course, be removed by a system which left no idle money in their hands.

Lastly, it seems to have been designed by these resolutions to promote a more systematic administration of the treasury department, under a new mode of collecting and disbursing the revenue.

It is impossible to estimate beforehand the precise advantages of any increase of system in the conduct of human affairs. But the general advantages of order and discipline in the fiscal administration cannot well be highly appreciated. Perhaps, however, a clearer view of the subject will be given, by a reference to some of the inconveniences under which the treasury department now suffers, and which will be removed by the system now proposed.

At present, the money flows into the collector's hands daily, and without regularity as to amount. The secretary, not always having notice of the time and amount of receipts until they are in hand, has, for the most part, to make his arrangements for removing these funds not before, but after they are received. The consequence is, that large sums often lie idle to all the purposes of trade and government, and serve only, during this time, to offer temptations for speculation to the public officers. According to the best information which your committee can obtain, the average amount thus lying in the hands of the receiving officers and other custodiers of the public moneys, independently of the amount in the custody of the disbursing officers, has been about $1,000,000 at the end of each quarter, for the four years preceding the 1st of January, 1838. So much for the receipts. The evils arising from the want of adequate notice, and a systematic arrangement of the disbursements, are still more striking. The treasury is subject to constant demands, of which it has no notice as to time or amount. The consequence is, that money must be placed with the disbursing officers long enough beforehand, and in amounts sufficiently large to cover all probable demands. The average sum thus left idle in the hands of disbursing officers, has been about $1,000,000 at the end of each quarter. And this, because there are no adequate provisions to arrange these demands, so as to give sufficient notice of them to the head of the department, and to compel their production by the public creditor, at the proper time. Nor is this the only inconvenience arising out of the present state of things. The disbursements are made as the demands for them arise. The receipts come in daily as the bonds fall due, and vary not only from day to day, but from month to month. When the receipts and expenses are nearly equal, there is constant danger, as we are informed by the secretary of the treasury, that enough may not be received in some months of the year to meet the demands upon the government. For, although the aggregate of receipts and disbursements during the year may correspond, yet this is by no means the case from month to month. At present, there are but two modes of meeting the evil; the one, to leave a large surplus on hand to meet these contingencies; and the other, to give the secretary the power to issue treasury notes at his discretion. The system now proposed avoids all of these inconveniences. No balances need remain in the hands of the receiving or disbursing officers. The secretary having notice of the amount and time of receipts, as well as of the amount and time of disbursements, can always make his arrangements beforehand, to remove the public money from the collector as soon as received, and to disburse it either in the very act of receipt, or at not more than twenty days from that time. Speedy accountability will thus be required from the public officers, and an almost instant detection will await them in case of default or fraud. Nor will the inconvenience as to inequality in the receipts and disbursements ever arise to any thing like its present extent. By throwing together the receipts and disbursements for three months in the quarterly settlements, there can scarcely be a serious inequality between the two, when their yearly amounts correspond. Should any such difficulty ever arise, it will readily be corrected by the small surplus left with the public debtor, for which this bill provides, without loss either to trade or to the government. Short settlements, promptness in all concerned in the fiscal administration, and the means of speedy detection in cases of default, may all be secured, as it seems, under the proposed system, with proper treasury regulations. The whole administration of the finances will be brought more under the view and control of the head of the department, and less will be left to the discretion of subordinate officers. The disbursing officer will pass the debts to the treasury books not less than twenty days before they are due; the collector will transmit weekly the entries on the credit side of the account, and the quarterly balance-sheet of the department will exhibit to a very great extent, the entire process of collection and disbursement in a mere exchange of credit. Should these anticipations be realized, it is evident that there would be more of unity, efficiency, and responsibility, in the administration of the treasury department, than we have had under any other system. It is true that this system, like every other, would depend very much for its success upon its proper execution; and inconveniences would certainly arise at its commencement, which further experience would probably rectify.

It will doubtless be remarked, that the resolutions referred to this committee do not comprehend the public lands within the system which they propose. Perhaps it is as well, for several reasons, that they should not include these lands in the first place. Difficulties might arise in the commencement of a system so novel, which would be easily overcome by the available cash funds afforded from the public lands. This would, at least, be highly useful until the system became familiar in practice. Again: the public mind is just now so unsettled in relation to the mode of disposing of these lands, that changes might occur, in relation to them, which would take them without the operation of the system, if it were now adapted to them. Should the present mode of disposing of these lands from the general government to the individual purchaser be retained, it would not only be practicable, but expedient, hereafter to include them within the proposed system. The only practical difficulty in the case would be as to the means of enforcing punctual payment of the bonds given for them when they were due. It is believed that this might be accomplished by making the receipts semi-annual instead of quarterly, and by the provisions hereafter suggested for enforcing the punctual payment of these bonds when due, whether given by the highest bidder at the auctions, or by the purchaser on private entry. This might be secured by providing, first, that so much money should be paid at the execution of the bond as would secure the probable fulfilment of the contract; secondly, that the obligees who failed to pay these bonds when due, should be refused credit thereafter at the land offices; thirdly, that neither patent nor possession should be given until the payment of the money at the receipt day, when it was due; and, fourthly, upon such failure the proper day, that any other person might take the patent for the lands upon paying down immediately the sum due upon the bond.

As it is not proposed to include the public lands just now within the operation of the system, it will be needless to enlarge upon the provisions just sketched in relation to them.

Having reviewed the practical operation of this system, it may be well to examine, for a moment, its political and incidental effects: one of which undoubtedly will be an entire separation of the banks and the general government. The separation must be complete, inasmuch as the government will no longer have the means of rewarding or punishing the banks through the use of its funds and credit, whilst the banks will lose the power of impeding the fiscal operations of the government when these are conducted without their agency. The general government will then be entirely responsible for the success of its fiscal administration, and the banks will be subject to no power but that of the states which created them. So long as these are dependent upon each other in interest, they must either sympathize in action, or a fierce war between the two will be inevitable; and in this the people must be the sufferers. The banks, on the one hand, would be armed with the power of expanding and contracting the currency, and the general government, on the other, would either attack the credit with the people, upon which its existence depends, or array one set of banks against the other, through the use of its funds, that it might conquer by their divisions; the consequence would be, either that the government would acquire the power of the banks, or the banks would obtain that of the government; and the people would be the sufferers in this contest for powers, which ought not to be united in either.

To arm the general government with the power of the banks would be to destroy the balances of the constitution, whilst the reverse of this operation would not be tolerated after it was understood. The only possible mode of preventing the union of these powers is to separate them in action and interest—an event so much to be desired that it ought to be effected even at a pecuniary loss to the people, if that were necessary. But, in point of fact, this is not the case; and the separation now proposed is believed from the objections, whether founded or unfounded, which were raised against it, to be the other modes heretofore suggested for accomplishing this purpose.

In the first place, this system does not horde up large amounts of capital in specie, to lie idle in the hands of the government; on the contrary, it leaves the public funds which are not wanted for immediate disbursement in the hands of the debtors; the government, and not the banks, deriving the interest upon their use.

Secondly, it does not afford the public officers the means of using these funds for private purposes; inasmuch as very little money passes through their hands, and then only for immediate disbursement.

Thirdly, it does not produce an inconvenient run upon the banks for specie, in the payment of public dues. For so large a portion of the collections and disbursements will be accomplished by a mere exchange of credit, that the residue to be received in specie will be too small to be felt by the merchants or banks.

And, fourthly, it does not permit the use of treasury drafts as currency, as the existing laws have been supposed to justify; because it places such conditions upon these drafts as effectually prevent the conversion of government credit into currency, and limits its uses to the purposes of exchange. It merely introduces machinery to facilitate the exercise of the undoubted right of an individual to set off his claim upon the government against a claim of the government upon him; the right of the treasury to draw upon its funds being more limited under the system proposed, than at present with the existing laws. As it is this feature which abstracts the government as a disturber of the currency, and enables it to administer the same without injuring the banks, and is effected by their conduct, it may be well to examine its operation a little more closely.

The pecuniary transactions of society are settled either in currency, or by an exchange of credit. Those upon short notice and of small amount are usually settled in the former mode; whilst heavy transactions, distant either in point of time or space, are most commonly set against each other. To the extent to which this exchange of credit is effected, the demand for currency diminishes in a given amount of business. Indeed, the extent of this species of exchange may almost be considered as a measure of the improvement in commercial communities. It is a general truth, to which, of course, there are exceptions, that the individuals of a society sell as much as they buy. Whenever there is a debt due from an individual, it may safely be assumed that another of equal amount is somewhere due to him. To collect and array these against each other is a most important branch of trade. The facility for doing this will increase as the channels of trade wear deeper from use, and the course of its current can be calculated with more certainly. It is manifest that the limits are wide between which this process may fluctuate; and that the more it is extended the better for trade, inasmuch as it will then require less currency, which is expensive, and in that very circumstance diminish the dangers of a change in the standard of value. If these things be true, it is clear that the same amount of trade in different states or conditions may require different proportions of currency. A community dealing in money only, (if that could be,) would require much more currency for its trade than would be necessary for the same trade in another which dealt in exchanges as well as in currency.

If the government, therefore, were to deal only in money, the currency would ebb and flow with the tide of revenue; whilst, if it were practicable that it dealt only by an offset of its liabilities, the variations of currency and revenue would be independent of each other. The effect of the former system would be, that the government, through its revenue, would affect the currency by one law, whilst the operations of trade would influence it by another; and thus fluctuations in the revenue might often afford a serious disturbance to currency and commerce. There can be no doubt but that the amount of currency in any country ought to be regulated by its trade; and this can never be entirely effected unless the demands of government for currency either sympathize exactly with those of trade, or else cease altogether: the first it is impossible to effect; but the latter may be accomplished, to a very great extent, by an exchange of credit. The very circumstances which increase its disturbing effects, when dealing in currency, fit it for the latter operation. Its credit is good; its transactions are heavy, and may be arranged on time, from the distance between the places of receipt and disbursement. These are the favoring circumstances which have induced the belief that the provisions of the bill now reported will accomplish the end proposed. If this be so, it may be asked if the banks themselves are not interested in the adoption of such a measure. The loss of a valuable customer in the government is undoubtedly something; but with the entire field of American trade before them, they have ample room for adventure; and the loss of the government as a customer is not an evil to be compared with the dangers to which they would be subjected in the rude conflicts of party, so long as they maintained a political connexion. Nor is this the only advantage which they would derive. Their operations would be safer, when their policy was arranged to oblige and to deal with the government excluditures. They have themselves attributed some of their disasters to this cause, and doubtless there have been periods when this connexion was mutually embarrassing to both parties.

Having suggested the considerations which may commend the system now proposed to the attention of congress, this report ought here, perhaps, to be closed. But there are other circumstances which impress it upon our attention, to which we beg leave for a moment to refer. It is not necessary, to comment this plan to the consideration of congress, that it should be the best in the abstract; it is enough to show that it is better than that now in operation, provided it contains nothing positively ill in itself. To say that it would be better than the present system, (if system it can be called,) would be to use no extravagant pretension in its favor. The fragments of laws which now operate upon the subject can scarcely be said to afford a uniform rule, or to impose any limits upon the discretion of the secretary. It is so difficult to reduce the remains of the various systems which have been wrecked, or partially repealed, into any thing like order or uniformity, that it would be almost impracticable to hold the secretary responsible, if he were to adopt his discretion as the only guide. There are various constructions of the laws now in force, by skillful combinations of which he might introduce any system he pleased, with at least some plausibility of pretext. If it be true, as some have supposed, that the joint resolution of 1816, as modified by subsequent legislation, leaves it in the discretion of the secretary of the treasury to receive nothing but specie, or nothing but convertible paper, as he may please: and that the act of 23d June, 1836, is virtually repealed, from the disqualification of the banks which suspended specie payment to accept the conditions of the act, then he may introduce the independent treasury at his own pleasure, and that, too, without any of the restrictions which the friends even of that measure wished to impose upon him. On the other hand, if the deposit act is to be considered as functus officio, whilst that of 1789 is still in force, he may adopt the state bank agency without any of those checks by which the friends of that system would limit his authority, before they would intrust him with the power of using it. And lastly, supposing the act of 23d June, 1836, to be still in force, so soon as banks arise which are not disqualified from acting under it by its provisions, then it is manifest that, during the progress of their creation, we have a system mixed of bank and individual agency, without any sensible limitation upon the discretion of the secretary who administers it. Nor is this all: the law of 23d June, 1836, will then operate as a premium to the erection of new banks, which alone can enjoy its benefits under such a construction of its provisions. The effect of this bounty would probably be to call new banks into existence; and when enough of these had arisen to fulfil the provisions of the law, we should have the very system which has already failed upon our hands. In giving these various constructions of the acts regulating the treasury department, we express no opinion of our own in relation to them. It is not necessary to do so. We state the various opinions upon this subject, to indicate the dangerous latitude of the discretion now left in the secretary of the treasury. And yet, notwithstanding this immense discretion reposed in the secretary of the treasury, it is still almost impossible for him to administer the department with convenience to himself and safety to the government. So much is left to the discretion of his subordinates, that it is very difficult to enforce a strict and speedy responsibility for the public funds.

It would seem to be clear, then, that neither of the parties which divide the country upon the currency question can approve of the present state of the laws which regulate the treasury department. If, therefore, the plan now proposed be not the very best in the opinion of either of these divisions, it is respectfully submitted whether it may not be fairly entitled to the assent of all who think it better than the existing state of things. In consideration, therefore, of the reasons which we have presented, we respectfully submit a bill.

TWENTY-FIFTH CONGRESS.

THIRD SESSION—SENATE.

February 20. The Chair announced a communication from the secretary of war, transmitting a report from the chief of the topographical bureau, with accompanying documents, made in answer to the resolution of the senate of the 11th instant, on the subject of the operations for increasing the depth of water at the mouth of the Mississippi.

The Chair presented a communication from the people of Florida, for the purpose of forming a constitution and state government.

Mr. Allen presented a memorial from citizens of Geauga county, Ohio, in relation to the neutrality law, complaining of its provisions, and the manner in which they are executed, and expressing strongly the opinion that the affair of the Caroline was an outrage on the dignity of the American flag.

Mr. Wright, from the committee on finance, reported the bill making appropriation for the naval service for 1839; and gave notice that he would call it up at an early hour to-morrow.

The resolution to print 10,000 copies of the salt document was taken up, and agreed to.

A number of private bills from the house were favorably reported on.

The senate proceeded to consider the bill providing in part for the construction of a common jail in the city of Washington.

The sum proposed for this object was $30,000, in which Mr. Niles contended was too much. Mr. Calhoun was unwilling to make the appropriation till competent men had reported whether a new jail was necessary, and correct estimates for it. Mr. Wright, and Mr. Norvell insisted that the county ought to construct its own jail, as the counties in the states did. Mr. Bayard argued that the administration of justice in the District was in the hands of the United States government, and it was their duty, therefore to provide for all the means of that administration, and for a common jail as well as for the rest. Mr. Sevier contended that, as the general government had bought, or appropriated land for building a common jail, it would be unreasonable to refuse the same to this District. Messrs. Walker and King advocated the bill, but the latter afterwards opposed it on the ground of want of limitation of expense.

The bill was then, by consent, laid on the table for the present.

The bill to prevent the interference of certain federal officers with elections, was taken up; and

Mr. Calhoun addressed the senate at some length, in opposition to the bill; after which it was passed over informally. Mr. Calhoun giving notice of his intention to address the senate on the subject.

The senate then took up the bill for the relief of Mrs. Mira Alexander, on its third reading, and, after a debate, in which it was supported by Messrs. Crittenden, Walker, White, and Linn, and opposed by Messrs. Calhoun, Niles, Pierce, Hubbard, and King, the question was taken, and the bill was decided to be rejected—years 18, may 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Fulton, Linn, Merrick, Norvell, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith, of Indiana, Walker, Webster, White and Young—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Hubbard, King, Lyon, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Pierce, Preuss, Smith, of Connecticut, Strane, Swift, Wall, Williams, of Maine, and Wright—19.

The vote having been announced, Mr. Tallmadge rose and said that he had voted in the majority, but his name not appearing on the journals as having voted at all, he desired to have the journal corrected.

Mr. Wright and several other senators declared that they had distinctly heard the senator from New York answer to his name, voting in the affirmative.

A discussion then ensued, in which the propriety of making this correction was invoked by Messrs. Calhoun and Hubbard contending that the vote having been announced, the subject was passed from the senate, while Messrs. Walker, Tallmadge, Webster, and others, contended that it was the duty of the chair to correct the error the instant that it was discovered.

Mr. King suggested that the correction could be made by the unanimous consent of the senate, and hoped that this course would be taken.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. Walker, King, Wright, Clay, of Alabama, Tallmadge, Smith, of Indiana, Davis, and Smith, of Connecticut.

The debate then ended unanimously by the senate, that the vote should be corrected.

The name of Mr. Tallmadge was again called, who answered "ay."

The President then announced the vote as standing 19 in the affirmative and 19 in the negative; and, after a feeling and interesting eulogy on the services and character of George Madison, gave his casting vote in favor of the bill.

The bill the more effectually to preserve the public money in the hands of agents and officers of the government, and to punish defaulters, was read a third time, when, on the question of its passage,

Mr. Webster rose and moved an adjournment, which prevailed.

February 21. Mr. Pierce presented the memorial of George Gates and others, legal voters of the town of Antrim, New Hampshire, praying for the abolition of slavery in this District.

Mr. P. said that the memorial came to him, accompanied by a letter from a highly respectable clergyman, residing in his native county. The letter says, "though we are aware of your views may not correspond with those of the petitioners, they have no doubt of your readiness to present a respectful petition, coming from any portion of the citizens of New Hampshire."

It is certainly no task to present the memorial, and yet I cannot, in justice to my own convictions of duty, comply with the request, without expressing my deep regret, that these petitioners, many of whom I am sure are actuated by pure motives, should so far mistake their own moral responsibilities, and the power and duty of congress in relation to this subject.

I do earnestly hope that every honest man who has sincerely at heart the best interests of the slave and his master, may no longer be governed by a blind zeal and impulse, but be led to examine this subject, so full of delicacy and danger in all its bearings; and that, when called upon to lend their names and influence to the cause of agitation, they may remember that we live under a written constitution which is the paucity and protection of the south, as well as the north; that it covers the entire union, and is equally a guaranty for the unobstructed enjoyment of the domestic institutions of all its parts; and, I trust, further, that they will no longer close their eyes to the fact that, so far as those in whose welfare they express so much feeling are concerned, this foreign interference has been and must inevitably continue to be, evil, and only evil. Having, on a former occasion, expressed my views somewhat at length, I will not detain you further than to notice an erroneous statement which has been made, and a thousand times repeated, with regard to my own course, and that of the representatives of New Hampshire in that house of congress. We have been charged with having denied the right of petition; and although the charge is wholly without foundation, I have no doubt that, from its frequent repetition, it may have had an influence upon the minds of many honest and patriotic men. So far from having denied, we have uniformly asserted and maintained this right. But after declamation and argument had been exhausted on both sides of the question—after the memorials had been referred to a select committee during the twenty-fourth congress, and an elaborate report sent forth to the American people—we thought it our duty to take such a course with petitions of this character as would enable congress to proceed with the consideration of subjects of necessary and legitimate legislation. The whole question since that period has been one with regard to the disposition of memorials when received; and no denunciation or false representations will drive us from a course demanded alike by a regard for the proper and necessary legislation of congress, the rights of the south, and the interests of the whole country. After the declarations which have come from high sources during the present session, in both ends of the capitol, I am encouraged to hope that the agitation of this question in New England for political purposes will cease; that there will be no more attempts to deceive and excite the people by incalculating the impression that their right to petition has been invaded.

On motion of Mr. Williams of Mississippi, the question of reception was laid on the table.

Mr. Nicholas presented the memorial of upwards of one thousand citizens of the state of Louisiana, praying for the repeal or modification of the naturalization laws; referred to the committee on foreign relations.

Mr. Wright, from the same committee, reported without amendment the bill making appropriations for the erection of public buildings in Florida, and the bill to revive and extend the act authorizing the issuing of treasury notes.

Mr. King said, he rose to present a resolution in consequence of the melancholy death this morning of one of the officers of the senate, [Mr. Edward Weir.] But yesterday, (said Mr. K.) he was among us discharging his duties apparently in good health and spirits—to-day, he had passed that bourne whence no traveller returns. He would not dwell on the faithful services of this officer, while he was among us; they were well known to the members of this body. He rose simply to present a resolution that the senate would attend the funeral of their deceased officer, at half past 3 o'clock to-morrow, and that the expense of his funeral be paid out of the contingent fund of the senate.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. Benton submitted the following resolution, which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury and the postmaster general be directed to report to the senate what drafts on banks having public funds on deposit have been protested since the first day of January, 1837; the amount of public money in deposit in each bank at the time of each protest; and whether, in any case, such protests have been made in violation of special arrangements, and, if so, what those arrangements were.

The following bills were ordered to be engrossed. The bill entitled a bill in amendment of the acts respecting the judicial system of the United States; and

The bill to authorize the selection of lands for the benefit of the university of Michigan, instead of other lands heretofore selected;

The bill to repeal certain acts respecting navy pensions, and making further provisions in relation to navy pensions; and

The bill to authorize the Washington county and St. Genevieve railroad company, in the state of Missouri, to construct a road through the public lands.

The bill more effectually to preserve the public money in the hands of officers and agents of the government, &c. came up on its third reading; when

Mr. Ifebsler addressed the senate for a few minutes, to show that the laws and regulations of the treasury were abundantly sufficient, and that there was needed no further legislation.

Mr. Hubbard replied at some length; when a motion was made by Mr. Clay to recommit, with instructions to so amend it as to designate that the public funds of the government should be deposited to the credit of the treasurer of the United States, and not to the private credit of the officer; which motion was lost by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay, of Ala., Culbert, Fulton, Hubbard, Linn, Lyon, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Rogers, Prentiss, Rivers, Robb, N. Kuggles, Smith, of Indiana, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Webster, White—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay, of Ala., Culbert, Fulton, Hubbard, Linn, Lyon, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Rogers, Prentiss, Rivers, Robb, N. Kuggles, Smith, of Indiana, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Webster, White—15.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill, and carried in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay, of Alabama, Culbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lyon, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, S. Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Strange, Walker, Wall, Williams, of Maine, Williams, of Miss., Wright, Young—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay, of Kentucky, Crittenden, Davis, Foster, Knight, McKean, Morick, Prentiss, Robbins, Rogers, Smith, of Indiana, Swift, Tallmadge, White—15.

The senate adjourned.

February 22. Mr. Robinson, of Illinois, presented resolutions from that state, reorganizing against the sub-treasury system as unsuited to the policy of the government. Mr. R. took occasion to say that he differed with the legislature in their views—he thought the sub treasury system the best and wisest policy that could be adopted, and he thought that such also was the decided opinion of a larger portion of the people of Illinois. His political creed was such however, as fortide di-obedience to instruction. Mr. R. from the same source presented a resolution asking a change of the constitution, by which, after 1845, the presidency be restricted to one term.

Mr. Tallmadge, from the committee on naval affairs, made a report on the memorial of Henry Hall Sherwood, of New York, in relation to the invaluable discovery made by that gentleman, of the magnet in ascertaining the latitude and longitude of places; five thousand copies of the report and memorial were ordered to be printed.

The bill from the house for erecting a new jail in the District was passed.

The bill to prevent the interference of office-holders in elections, came up as the special order, when Mr. Calhoun delivered his views at length against the general principles of the bill. Mr. Calhoun declared that he had never made any move which did not tend directly to the diminution of executive patronage. But opposed as he was to it, he could not give his support to this bill. He held it to be clearly unconstitutional. He maintained that the power to decide who shall exercise the elective right belongs exclusively to the states—that to the states also belonged power to regulate this right.

The further discussion was then postponed on motion of Mr. Crittenden.

Mr. Benton, from the committee on military affairs, reported a bill making appropriations for the erection of certain national works in Maine, agreeably with the recommendation of General Wool and the secretary of war.

The bill to provide for the protection of citizens of the United States residing in Oregon territory, or trading on the Columbia river or its tributaries, was taken up, and after being explained and advocated by Mr. Linn and opposed by Mr. Niles, was postponed until to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. Davis, the secretary of the treasury was directed to report to the senate such information as he may possess as to the following particulars:

1. The amount of coin made at the mint, and the amount at each of its branches, for one year preceding the first day of February last.

2. The amount of bullion deposited at, or obtained for, each establishment in carrying on.

3. The expense incurred in carrying on, and in sustaining each establishment during the same time.

The bill for the protection of citizens of the U. States residing in Oregon and trading on the Columbia river and its tributaries, was taken up, and after being explained by Mr. Linn at some length, and some further discussion between Messrs. Sevier, Niles and Wright, it was passed over informally.

When the senate adjourned.

February 23. The bill to amend the act of 3d March, 1837, entitled an act supplementary to the act entitled an act to amend the judicial system of the United States and for other purposes, after being amended, on motions by Messrs. Linn, Clay, of Alabama, Norvell and Sevier, was ordered to be engrossed.

The bill to grant to the state of Indiana the right of pre-emption to a quantity of land, to aid in the construction of a railroad from New Albany, Indiana, to Mount Carmel, in Illinois, was read the third time and passed.

The bill to explain and amend the fifth section of the act for the better organization of the United States marine corps was read the second time, as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill to amend the act of 3d March, 1834, supplementary to the act entitled an act to amend the judicial system of the United States, was read a third time and passed.

The bill to provide for the appointment of a board of commissioners to hear and examine claims against the United States, was taken up and considered as in committee of the whole, and after some remarks from Messrs. Bayard, W. Sevier, Hubbard, Prentiss, Benton, Calhoun and Smith of Conn. was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Vice President said, that according to usage he did not intend to resume his seat in the senate this session. He had a great deal of correspondence and some business at the public offices to attend to, which the senate knew that he could not do while performing his duties in the chair, and therefore his absence from the senate became indispensably necessary. He would take this occasion to express his obligations to the members of the senate, for the kindness and courtesy with which he had been treated during the years he had presided over their deliberations, and he concluded by wishing them all safe and happy return to their families and their homes.

The senate then adjourned.

February 25. At eleven o'clock, in the absence of the vice president, the senate was called to order by the secretary, and then proceeded to ballot for a president pro tempore.

On the first ballot thirty votes were given, of which Mr. King of Alabama received twenty-eight, and was accordingly declared to be duly elected.

Mr. K. was then conducted to the chair by Messrs. Benton and Knight, and, in a neat and pertinent address, returned thanks for the honor conferred on him.

A number of memorials and petitions were presented and referred.

Mr. Norvell presented a joint resolution of the legislature of the state of Michigan, instructing her senators and requesting her representatives "to use their efforts for the adoption of such measures as will insure the recognition, by foreign powers with whom we have national intercourse, of the absolute citizenship of all foreigners naturalized by the existing laws of the United States." Also a memorial from a large body of respectable naturalized citizens having the same object in view; both of which were, after a few remarks from Mr. N., referred to the committee on foreign relations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Hubbard submitted a resolution that the senate should hereafter take a recess from 3 to 5 o'clock; and, after some remarks from Mr. H. on the amount of business on the calendar, and the necessity of the adoption of the proposed resolution, it was decided in the negative—yeas 14, nays 17.

Mr. Davis then submitted a resolution, that hereafter the senate meet daily at 10 o'clock; which was agreed to—yeas 15, nays 14.

Mr. Norvell, in pursuance of notice given, moved that the senate go into an election of an assistant doorkeeper; which, after some debate, was laid on table—yeas 23, nays 17.

Mr. Niles submitted the following motion, which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the secretary of war be directed to report to the senate whether the sum of $25,000, appropriated in 1836 for removing the sand bar at the mouth of the Connecticut river, has been expended for that object, or any part thereof; and if not, the reasons why the said appropriation has not been expended agreeably to the act appropriating the same.

The bill to provide for the security and protection of the emigrant and other Indians west of the states of Missouri and Arkansas, was taken up on its third reading, and after some remarks from Mr. Calhoun, in opposition to the bill, the question on its passage was decided in the affirmative—yeas 31, nays 10, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay, of Alabama, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Foster, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Knight, Linn, Merrick, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Pierce, Prentiss, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Indiana, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, White, Wright, and Young—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Calhoun, Niles, Norvell, Roane, Smith, of Connecticut, Williams, of Maine, and Williams, of Mississippi—10.

So the bill was passed.

The bill to provide for the appointment of a board of commissioners to hear and examine claims against the United States, was considered on the question of its passage, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 30, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Foster, Hubbard, King, Knight, Linn, Lyon, Merrick, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Robbins, Robinson, Smith, of Connecticut, Swift, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, Williams, of Maine, and Young—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, Rogers, Sevier, Smith, of Indiana, Strange, Williams, of Miss., and Wright—12.

So the bill was passed.

The bill to explain and amend the fifth section of the act for the better organization of the United States marine corps, was read a third time and passed.

The bill providing for the disposition and management of the funds bequeathed to the United States, in trust, by James S. Thomson, of London, deceased, for the establishment of an institution for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men, was taken up, and, after an animated discussion, in which Messrs. Robbins, Niles, Calhoun, Walker, Crittenden, Brown, Benton, and Hubbard participated, it was on motion of Mr. H. laid on the table—ayes 20, noes 15, as follows :

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Hubbard, King, Lyon, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Roane, Robinson, Smith, of Connecticut, Strange, Williams, of Maine, Williams, of Mississippi, and Wright—20.

NOES—Messrs. Davis, of Kentucky, Davis, Fulton, Knight, Linn, Merriek, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith, of Indiana, Walker, and Young—15.

Mr. Williams, of Maine, having asked and obtained leave of the senate to make some remarks not in order under the rules, proceeded to state that he had noticed in one of the morning papers some comments on the late incidents in Maine, to the effect that Maine had waged war against a foreign country, which was not the case. Mr. W. said he was surprised to see this notice, and that he was not notified. What their object could be when there was a prospect of a contest with a foreign country, thus to go in advance and put our own people in the wrong, Mr. W. could not understand. There could be no question whatever as to the right of Maine to the territory in dispute.

That question was largely and deliberately discussed at the last session of congress, and a resolution was passed by both houses with great unanimity, which Mr. W. trusted had put that question at rest. In order that the senate might understand more fully what the state of Maine had done, Mr. W. asked their attention while he made a brief statement of the circumstances which led to the controversy now going on.

This Mr. W. proceeded to do minutely. [But before he concluded, Mr. Preston objected that the same ground must be gone over again in a day or two, when the question would be regularly presented to the senate, and that no time was, at this late stage of the session, to be lost needlessly; but Mr. P. withdrew his objection at the intercession of Mr. Davis and others, and Mr. W. was allowed to proceed to a conclusion.]

A sketch of his statement follows :

A territory south of the St. John's was never considered debatable ground until after the treaty of Ghent, and when the commissioners under that treaty disagreed as to the line of boundary as described in the treaty of 1783.

A portion of it, contiguous to the line actually run by the main and present claim, between the Arkansas river and the line of Massachusetts, more than 30 years ago, and has been held by the grantees and those claiming under them to this time. Other parts have been surveyed into townships, under the joint authority of Massachusetts and Maine, and have been divided between those states.

Some years since, the American agents at Aroostook commenced within the last fifteen years, and were made by citizens of the states, and some persons from the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, who went upon it as American territory, and to avoid their provincial creditors.

Soon after Maine was separated from Massachusetts, and many of the present claimants, by land agents, from year to year, went upon this territory to prevent depositions, and to obtain satisfaction for trespasses committed thereon, and in many instances effected their purpose.

Pending the arbitration and since, various arrangements have been proposed to preserve the timber upon this territory, and to prevent collisions between the authorities of the contending parties, providing that neither party should do acts to increase their claims or prejudice the rights of the other.

Under this arrangement, Maine has not pressed her jurisdiction beyond the St. John's, but has constantly exercised a supervision of the territory south of the St. John's, granting permits to enter, and to obtain satisfaction for timber cut by trespassers, opened and made roads, put on settlers, &c.

The recent claim by the authorities of New Brunswick to maintain exclusive jurisdiction has been constantly resisted, as well by the United States as by Maine and Massachusetts.

The governor of Maine, being informed that very extensive depredations were being committed upon the timber in that territory, and by persons avowing their determination to resist by force any attempts which the authorities of Maine might make to remove them, thereupon the land agent of Maine, with the sheriff of Penobscot county, with a posse of about 200 armed men, was sent to the Aroostook to arrest the trespassers, and to prevent further depredations.

While in the discharge of this duty, the land agent was arrested upon our territory by armed men, taken to a stockade, there examined by magistrates, ordered to Fredericktown, and put upon a horse sled, under military guard and the huzzas of the multitude; and what his present situation is, is not known.

Upon this the lieutenant governor of New Brunswick issues his proclamation. Governor Fairfield communicates it to the legislature, and their action upon it.

Lieutenant governor Harvey writes to the governor of Maine that he claims exclusive jurisdiction: asks that the force be withdrawn, and says, if not done, he shall expel them.

Governor Fairfield replies, denies exclusive jurisdiction, and says he shall not withdraw the force so long as he can maintain it.

Mr. Walker said that he was not at all surprised at the course of the paper alluded to on this subject. It had but followed its instincts in this matter. In the difficulties with the Indians it had advocated their pretensions, in opposition to the government; in our difficulties with France, it was the French organ; in our dispute with Mexico, it was the Mexican organ; and in the present difficulty it was very natural it should be the British organ. Whenever we have had difficulties with a foreign power, this paper was sure to be found advocating foreign interests.

The Chair interposed, and said, there being no proposition before the senate, the remarks of the senator were out of order.

Mr. Davis said he was about to ask the senator from Maine what journal it was to which he alluded.

Mr. Williams said it was the National Intelligencer of this morning. He had seen no other.

Mr. Davis said he regretted that the senator from Maine had considered it a matter of sufficient importance to make a formal reply in the senate to the editorial remarks of a newspaper. An importance would be given them, whether designed or not, by bringing them before this body, to which they might not be entitled; and Mr. D. therefore regretted that the senator had considered them of so much importance as to present them gravely for the consideration of the senate in the present attitude of affairs.

In regard to this controversy, Mr. D. had, on former occasions, fully expressed his opinion that there was not a shadow of doubt as to our title to the disputed territory; and that any gentleman who would calmly and fairly examine the evidence could not doubt that the title of Maine was perfectly clear and conclusive. Mr. D. still thought there was and could be no doubt as to this question of right; and if the question should arise, whether that right should be maintained by the government, Mr. D. would promptly go for the right of Maine to this territory, according to the treaty of 1783; and, in Mr. D.'s opinion, Maine now claimed nothing but what that treaty gave. But it seemed that we had now come suddenly and unexpectedly to the very verge of war with one of the most powerful nations of the world. Mr. D. would say this was unexpected, because no one could have anticipated the events which had recently occurred. Under these circumstances, so very important as well as critical, it behooved all to act with prudence and considerate calmness, and to obtain a thorough knowledge of the circumstances, before attempting to make any impression on the public mind. The considerations connected with this subject were of a most momentous character. Our ships and property were abroad every where, in every sea and ocean, and the country was in no condition to meet such a crisis as might be now impending. The utmost calmness and deliberation were therefore demanded on every account, and, for one, Mr. D. was willing to wait and hear what Maine would have to say, with no disposition to impugn her course, and with the hope that she had done nothing prematurely or inconsistent with her own honor.

The journal to which the senator from Maine had alluded, he presented to the late proceedings in Maine on this subject as a matter of party strife, to see which party would go the furthest; and Mr. D. had himself sometimes thought that, under the deep and unanimous sense of wrong to which the people of Maine had been goaded, there had been a struggle to see who would be foremost. But senators were not to be influenced by that in their proceedings, but by the consideration of what the interest and honor of the country required. Mr. D. had hoped that this subject would not come up in any form till the senate had received a communication respecting it from the president of the United States; for rumor at least indicated that statements would probably be presented by him to congress, which, doubtless, could be relied on for their accuracy; and the subject would then be more clearly understood and better comprehended. Till then, Mr. D. hoped gentlemen would remain tranquil; and if it should then or afterward appear that it was necessary to maintain our rights by a resort to arms, Mr. D. was not one of those who would be for flustering on that question. Mr. D. had hoped, from the results of the last session, when this body were nearly unanimous in favor of further negotiation for a reserve, that it would have resulted in an amicable adjustment of this whole matter. He feared nothing important had grown out of it; but he desired better information as to the purposes of Great Britain on this head. Till all these matters and the relations in this respect are thoroughly understood, it behooved the senate to look upon this subject with the calm firmness which the crisis demanded, and to preserve the peace of the country, if consistent with its integrity and honor.

The senate having taken up the bill providing for the protection of the citizens of the United States residing in the Oregon territory, or trading on the Columbia river, Mr. Linn referred to the recent movements upon the Maine frontier, as evidence of the grasping disposition of the British government, and commended the spirit with which the aggressors had been met, &c. But thinking that the passage of the bill at this period might be misconstrued, he would not press its passage at this session. [Mr. Linn's remarks shall be inserted hereafter.] On motion of Mr. Wright, the bill was then recommended to the committee on foreign relations, and the senate adjourned.

February 26. After the presentation of a number of petitions, numerous reports were made by the committees on private cases, and the bills before ordered to be engrossed were severally read a third time, and passed.

A joint resolution was introduced by Mr. Davis to establish the legal value of the pound ($4) of the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, British provinces in North America.

The following bills amongst others, were severally considered in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed :

To authorize the location of the pre-emption certificates given by the register of the land office at Batesville, in Arkansas, under the act of the 26th of May, 1824, on any of the public lands for sale in the state of Arkansas.

To authorize the inhabitants of township eight north range thirty-two west, in the state of Arkansas, to enter a section of land, in lieu of the sixteenth section in said township, upon condition that the same is surrendered to the United States for military purposes.

To revive the act entitled "an act to enable the claimants to land within the limits of Missouri and the territory of Arkansas to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims," approved the 26th of May, 1824, and the act amending the same.

To provide for additional clerks in the post office department and the auditor's office connected therewith, and for other purposes.

The senate took up, on its third reading, the following bill, reported by Mr. Wall, from the committee on the judiciary :

To explain and limit the powers of the circuit court of the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, &c. That it shall not be lawful for the circuit court of the District of Columbia to issue a writ or writs of mandamus to an officer or officers of the United States, except in cases in which the power to issue such writ or writs is or may be conferred by law on the circuit courts of the United States.

Mr. Prentiss, who had made some explanatory remarks, moved to recommend the subject to the committee on the judiciary, with instructions to amend the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting the following words :

"That the several circuit courts of the United States shall have power to issue writs of mandamus within their respective jurisdictions according to the usage of law."

Mr. Prentiss warmly advocated his motion, and contended that the writ of mandamus was the most beneficial remedy next to the habeas corpus, known to the common law. It existed, he believed, in the jurisprudence of every state in this union, and he could not consent that the judicial system of the United States should be destitute of this ancient and highly valuable common law remedy.

Mr. Preston observed that, from the lateness of the session, there was little or no prospect of the bill passing in the other house, if it should now pass the senate in any form. He therefore moved the indefinite postponement of the bill.

This motion was negatived, by yeas and nays, as follows :

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay, of Kentucky, Crittenden, Davis, Foster, Merriek, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Swift, Tallmadge—14.

NAYES—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Culbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Perce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Conn., Strange, Williams, of Maine, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, Young—14.

Mr. Preston now argued, with great earnestness, and at considerable length, in opposition to the original bill, and in favor of a power residing in the United States courts, of issuing a writ of mandamus, as in the case of Stockton & Stokes versus the postmaster general.

Mr. Prentiss's substitute, as above, was now rejected, by yeas and nays, as follows :

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Foster, Knight, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Swift, Tallmadge—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Culbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Lyon, M'arris, Montou, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Kinnell, Rouse, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Georgia, Wall, Williams of Maine, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, Young—27.

The bill was then passed, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Culbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Lyon, Lyon, Morris, Montou, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Rouse, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Georgia, S. Range, Wall, Williams of Maine, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, Young—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Foster, Knight, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Swift, Tallmadge—15.

Some time was occupied in considering the bill from the other house making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1839, which was amended and ordered to a third reading.

A message was received from the president of the United States, together with documents, on the subject of the recent and existing difficulties between the people and authorities of Maine and New Brunswick. [See proceedings of house, page 14.] After the message and documents had been read, an animated debate (to be given in our next) ensued, at the termination of which they were referred to the committee on foreign affairs, and five thousand extra copies of both ordered to be printed.

February 27. This morning, the joint resolution introduced yesterday by Mr. Davis, to establish the legal value of the pound (currency) of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, was read a third time, and passed.

In pursuance of the resolution adopted to that effect, the senate went into the election of a printer, for the next congress, and the first ballot resulted as follows:

Blair and Rives received 25; Gales and Seaton, 11; Ogden Niles, 4; Thomas Allen, 2; Blank, 1.

So that Blair and Rives were duly elected.

The bill to prevent the interference of public officers in elections coming up as the special order, Mr. Crittenden addressed the senate at some length, and was followed by Messrs. Wall and Niles.

The bill to establish light-houses and to place buoys, was considered in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed. [See last page.]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, February 21. The journal having been read, Mr. Prentiss of Mississippi, rose, he said, for the purpose of presenting to the house a question of privilege. And he then offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That this house proceed forthwith to inquire—

1. Whether Alex. Duncan, a member of this house from the state of Ohio, be the author of a certain publication or publications under his name in relation to the proceedings of this house, and certain members thereof, published in the Globe newspaper of the 19th instant.

2. Whether, by said publication or publications, the said Alex. Duncan has not been guilty of a violation of the privileges of this house, of an offence against its peace, dignity, and good order, and of such grossly indecent, ungentlemanly, disgraceful, and dishonourable conduct, as renders him unworthy of his seat in this house, and justly liable to expulsion from the same.

The Speaker said that this, being a question of privilege, would take precedence over all other business.

Mr. Prentiss said that, as the question was an important one, he would, before proceeding in his remarks, move a call of the house; which was ordered.

The roll having been called, 123 members answered to their names. The names of the absentees were then called, and there appeared 149 members present. Mr. F. moved a suspension of further proceedings, but withdrew the motion. Several members who had received the hall call ad interim appeared, and announced their presence to the chair.

The doors of the hall were then closed; also, those convenient apertures, commonly called windows. And excesses were received. After which, on motion of Mr. Halstead, all further proceedings in the call were dispensed with.

Mr. Prentiss then called for the reading of the publication to which the resolution had reference, which having been read, Mr. P. rose and addressed the house at great length on the subjects of his resolution.

Mr. P. was followed by Messrs. Jenifer, Duncanson, and a number of other members; and the debate and proceedings continued until nearly 7 o'clock.

In the course of the day's proceedings, two motions were made to lay the motion of Mr. Prentiss on the table; the one by Mr. Gray of New York, which was negatived by 91 yeas to 83 yeas; the other by Mr. Parry of Maine, which was negatived by 101 yeas to 91 yeas.

In the course of the debate, Mr. Thompson of South Carolina, moved to amend the motion of Mr. Prentiss, by striking out and substituting for it the following:

"Resolved, That Alexander Duncan, a member of this house, having avowed himself the author of an article published in the Globe of the 19th instant, grossly libellous of honorable members of this body; that the said Alexander Duncan be reprimanded by the speaker in the presence of the house."

Before the question was taken on this proposed amendment, the house adjourned; and the subject comes up first, as the unfinished business, to-morrow.

[We will give the details of this day's proceedings, with the publication alluded to, and letters from Messrs. Slade and Stanly in relation thereto, in the next REGISTER.]

Friday, Feb. 22. The house resumed the further consideration of the question of privilege under consideration at its adjournment yesterday, the pending question being on the adoption of the following resolution offered last evening by Mr. F. Thompson, as a substitute for the original proposition of Mr. Prentiss:

"Resolved, That Alexander Duncan, a member of this house, having avowed himself the author of an article published in the Globe of the 19th instant, grossly libellous of honorable members of this body; that the said Alexander Duncan be reprimanded by the speaker, in the presence of the house."

After some remarks from Mr. Petrikin, that gentleman moved to lay the whole subject on the table. Mr. Tillinghast moved a call of the house.

When, on the request of Mr. Elmore, and on his pledge to renew the motion, Mr. Petrikin withdrew the motion to lay the subject on the table.

Some desultory conversation ensued on a point of order, when Mr. Elmore yielded the floor to Mr. F. Thompson for the especial purpose of enabling him to modify his proposition.

Mr. T. then modified his proposition to read as follows:

Whereas Alexander Duncan, a member of this house from the state of Ohio, has, in his place, acknowledged himself to have written and caused to be published in the Globe newspaper of the 19th instant the following resolution, to wit: [Here insert it.]

Therefore, resolved, That the said Alexander Duncan has, in the premises, subjected himself to the just censure of this house, and that he be reprimanded therefor by the speaker in the presence of the house.

Mr. T. said that this proposition would be accepted by the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. Prentiss) as a modification of his own.

Mr. Prentiss said he accepted it, although contrary to his own opinion.

The debate was continued by Mr. Elmore in opposition to any action on the subject, and Mr. Menefee and Mr. Prentiss in occasional explanation.

After which, Mr. E., in compliance with his pledge, renewed the motion to lay the subject on the table.

Mr. Dringole suggested to Mr. Petrikin to change his motion to a demand for the previous question, but Mr. P. did not accept the suggestion.

Messrs. Prentiss, Mercer, Adams, and Lezare urged a withdrawal of the motion to lay the subject on the table; but Mr. Petrikin persisted.

Mr. Tillinghast renewed his motion for a call of the house, which being ordered, 206 members answered to their names. And, the names of the absentees being called, there appeared 216 members present.

When, on motion, further proceedings on the call were dispensed with, and the question recurring on the motion to lay the subject on the table, Mr. Reed demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. Slade asked Mr. Petrikin to withdraw his motion, to enable him to make an explanation personal to himself. Mr. P. declined.

At the request of Mr. Sherrod Williams, and on his pledge to renew it, Mr. Petrikin withdrew his motion for the purpose of enabling Mr. W. to state his reasons for voting in favor of the motion to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. W. having concluded, and having renewed the motion according to pledge, several gentlemen attempted ineffectually to induce Mr. Petrikin to withdraw it.

The question was then taken and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beers, Beine, Bicknell, Birdsall, Broadhead, Bronson, Buchanan, Bynum, Cambreleng, John Campbell, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Clowrey, Coles, Connor, Crab, Craig, Cray, Crockett, Cushman, Dyer, DeGraff, Dringole, Elmore, Farrington, Isaac Fletcher, Foster, Fry, Gallup, Glascock, Grant, Gray, Griffin, Haley, Hammond, Hamer, Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Holsey, Holt, Howard, William H. Hunter, Robert M. T. Hunter, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Joseph Johnson, Nataniel Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kingsmill, Leadbetter, Logan, Leomin, Lyon, James M. Mason, Merritt, Maury, McKay, Robert C. Meade, McClain, McClellan, McClure, Miller, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Samuel W. Morris, Murray, Noble, Owens, Palmer, Parker, Parmenter, Parry, Paymer, Pennypacker, Petrikin, Phelps, Picky, Richardson, Rives, Robertson, Sawyer, Sheffer, Shepard, Snyder, Spencer, Swearingen, Taylor, Thomas, Thomas, Towner, Tully, Van Hook, Van Hook, Wagener, Webster, Weeks, Whittier, Sherrod Williams, Jared W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Worthington, Yell—117.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Heman Allen, Ayer, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Borden, Boutin, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, J. Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Carter, Chesnut, Cushing, Dawson, Duff, Deberry, Dennis, Dunn, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Richard Fletcher, Fillmore, Eric Garland, Giddings, Goode, James Graham, William Graham, Grennell, Hall, Halsted, Harper, Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Herod, Hoffman, Jabez Jackson, Jenifer, Henry Johnson, Win. Cost Johnson, Kennedy, Lezare, Lincoln, Chas. Clark, Corwin, McKenna, Menck, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Naylor, Noyes, Ogd, Pearce, Peck, Poe, Potts, S. S. Prentiss, Putnam, Kariden, Randolph, Reed, Ridgway, Robinson, Ramsey, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Augustine H. Shepherd, Shields, Sibley, Slade, Stuart, Augustus T. Tallcott, Thompson, Tillinghast, Thomas, Towner, Tully, Van Hook, Van Hook, L. Williams, C. H. Williams, Wise, Word, Yorke—94.

So the subject was laid on the table.

On leave given, Mr. Everett, from the committee on Indian affairs, reported with amendments senate bill to appoint commissioners to adjust claims under the Cioctaw treaty.

On leave given, Mr. Naylor, from the select committee, appointed to inquire into the conduct of commodore Elliott, made a report, accompanied by the following resolutions:

Resolved, That an interference, by the house of representatives, with the disputes that exist between subordinate officers of the navy and their superiors, commanding squadrons, is a power which ought at all times to be exercised with great caution, and is calculated to produce insubordination in that important arm of the national defence. But, in the opinion of this committee, it is competent for the representatives of the people to investigate any abuses alleged to be committed by officers in command of squadrons, and to provide, by law, for the recurrence of such abuses; and, moreover, to investigate and ascertain whether the head of the navy department may have used such means as are placed in his hands by law to punish and prevent any such illegal proceedings.

Resolved, That the most appropriate remedy for such subordinate officers is an appeal to the secretary of the navy for a court of inquiry to investigate the charges exhibited against their superiors; and from his decision the party aggrieved may appeal to the president, who, by the constitution, is commander-in-chief of the navy; he, as well as the secretary, being liable to impeachment for a wilful and corrupt violation or neglect of duty.

Resolved, That the time allowed this committee is insufficient to enable them to make a full and thorough examination of the subject committed to them; that even a limited and partial examination would require more time, contrary to the duty they owe to their immediate constituents and the country at large, to be absent daily during the sittings of the house, at this important period of the session.

Resolved, therefore, That it is inexpedient to commence the investigation at this time, and that the chairman report these resolutions, with the journal of our proceedings, to the house, together with the committee of this committee, that the subject matter referred to them by the resolution of the house of the 14th instant require investigation, and that he ask that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

The report and resolutions having been read, Mr. Naylor moved that they be laid on the table and printed. Mr. N. then explained that this was the report of the majority, and asked leave to present two other reports on the same subject—the one of the minority of the committee, and the other of an individual member thereof. Mr. Prentiss, of Miss., inquired if it was in order to move to recommit the report with instructions. The Speaker said it was not in order whilst a motion to lay on the table and print was pending. Mr. Naylor then withdrew his motion. Mr. Howard called for the reading of the views of the majority.

Mr. Prentiss claimed the floor, and moved to recommit the report and resolutions of the majority to the committee, with instructions to strike out so much thereof as gave advice to this house, or reflected on its course in going into the investigation.

Mr. P. proceeded to address the house, but yielded the floor, on the suggestion of Mr. Chambers, in order that the other reports might be read. The Speaker said that the minority could not, as a matter of right, report; but that, by unanimous consent, their views might be laid before the house. And leave having been granted, the two other reports were read. [See page 11.]

Mr. Prentiss then addressed the house at length on the subject of his motion. After which, on motion of Mr. Cambreleng, all the reports were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

A message was received from the president of the United States, through A. Van Buren, his private secretary.

On leave, Mr. Howard introduced the following resolution; which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to inform this house whether any and what change has occurred, since his annual message, in the posture of the relations between the United States and Mexico, and to communicate to the house such correspondence relating thereto as may not be incompatible with the public interest.

Mr. Cambreleng having made an urgent appeal to the house on the subject of the appropriation bills.

The house, on his motion, again resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Banks, of Virginia, in the chair), on the general appropriation bill; the pending question being on the motion of Mr. Bronson, declaring that no part of the contingent fund of the supreme court of the United States should be paid to the clerk for printed copies of papers which had been printed and already paid for by the United States.

Mr. C. H. Williams addressed the committee at great length in a review of political topics generally. Mr. James Gardiner obtained the floor, but gave way to Mr. Stude, who spoke for some time, when he gave way for a motion for the committee to rise, on which the vote was yeas 44, noes 51—no quorum.

Mr. S. resumed and concluded, when the committee rose and the house adjourned.

Saturday, February 23. By general consent, a number of bills on the speaker's table were put on their first and second reading, and were appropriately referred.

The senate bill to provide for the armed occupation of Florida, coming up on the question of a resolution, Mr. Robertson called for the reading of the bill; which having been read, Mr. Downing moved its reference to the committee on military affairs, Mr. Robertson being about to address the house, Mr. Yell appealed to Mr. R. not to discuss the bill at this time. On the request of several gentlemen that the bills on the speaker's table might be referred, he (Mr. Y.) had yielded his right to the floor on the report of the committee on public lands. He hoped he would not be deprived, on that account, of the opportunity to close his remarks. Mr. Robertson persisting in his desire to say a few words, Mr. Yell moved that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until Monday. Mr. Robertson moved its indefinite postponement.

The Speaker said the latter motion would bring up the merits of the bill. Mr. Yell again appealed to the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Robertson) not to deprive him (Mr. Y.) of the opportunity to close his remarks. That gentleman should be the last to do so, inasmuch as he had himself addressed the house on the subject of the public lands for the morning hour for three or four days. Mr. Downing wished the bill to be committed to the military committee, but said that, if it was to be indefinitely postponed, he hoped the question would be decided now. The Speaker said the question first in order would be on the motion to postpone until Monday. Mr. Yell withdrew that motion. The question then recurred on the motion to commit to the committee on military affairs. Mr. Robertson proceeded to oppose the commitment, on the ground that the bill contemplated the commencement of an entirely new policy, and that it was a bill to add 10,000 men to the standing army of the United States. He was opposed to the commitment, but, if committed at all, it should be committed either to a select committee or to the committee on public lands. Mr. R. was interrupted several times by Messrs. Yell and Petrikin for entering, as they alleged, into the merits of the bill, to discuss which the speaker decided to be out of order on a motion to commit. Mr. Robertson then changed his motion for indefinite postponement to a motion that the bill be laid on the table. Mr. Stansly moved a call of the house. Mr. L. Williams demanded the yeas and noes on that motion; which were ordered, and being taken were: yeas 89, noes 60. So the call was ordered; and the clerk having called the roll, 170 members answered to their names. The names of the absentees having been called, there appeared 185 members present. On motion of Mr. Cambreleng, all further proceedings on the call were dispensed with.

And the question recurring on the motion to lay the bill on the table, Mr. Grennell asked for the yeas and noes, which were ordered, and being taken were: yeas 91, noes 94; so the motion to lay the bill on the table was rejected. The question recurring on the motion to commit to the committee on public lands, Mr. Robertson moved that as much of the said bill as related to surveys be referred to the committee on public lands, and so much as related to grain to the committee on agriculture. The Speaker decided the motion not to be in order. Mr. Cambreleng moved that the house proceed to the orders of the day.

By general consent, the house took up the senate bill on the speaker's table, entitled "an act to amend the act for regulating the judiciary system of the United States." The bill having been read twice by its title, Mr. Thomas moved it be engrossed for a third reading. Some conversation followed between Messrs. Sergeant and Fillmore, when Mr. Adams called for the reading of the fifth section, (which abolishes the punishment of whipping and the pillory.) Mr. Adams said that the question which occurred to his mind was, that the bill abolished certain punishments without providing a substitute. Mr. Sergeant was understood to explain that this constituted a part of the punishment for certain offences, and that, this being taken away, the other punishment remained. Mr. Adams said he would not raise any serious objection to the bill, although he would have preferred to have had further time to consider one or two points in it which occurred to him as objectionable. One of the objections was this—here were two ignominious punishments abolished, punishments implying much more of ignominy than of pain, and nothing was substituted in their stead. The additional imprisonment which the judges were empowered to impose was not, as it seemed to him, an adequate substitute for the pillory; and the bill was further objectionable, because it did enable the court, at their discretion, if not at their pleasure, to add to the punishment of imprisonment what they might think a proper equivalent. There were many cases in which great injustice might thus be done to offenders. He was reluctant to give up the punishment by pillory, believing, as he did, that it exercised a salutary influence on the mind, the conscience, and the moral feelings of the man. He would not, however, at this late period in the session, throw himself in the way of the passage of the bill. And the bill was then ordered to a third reading on Monday.

The Speaker laid before the house several executive communications.

On motion of Mr. Cambreleng, the house again resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Banks, of Virginia, in the chair), and again took up the general appropriation bill, and reported its attention until near 12 o'clock, P. M., when the committee rose and reported its progress.

When the committee rose, an appeal was pending which had been made by Mr. Ingham, from a decision of the chairman, (Mr. Banks,) in relation to his motion for a reappropriation of $100,000, formerly appropriated for a dry dock in New York harbor. On the motion to adjourn the yeas and noes were called, when there were 34 for the adjournment, and 25 against it. A motion for a call of the house was negatived. After frequent attempts to get the bill out of committee, a little before twelve o'clock, P. M., the house adjourned.

Monday, Feb. 25. The regular business of the day being the call for resolutions, Mr. Cambreleng moved a suspension of the rule for the purpose of calling the committees for reports, and proceeding with the public business.

Mr. Adams asked leave to present the following resolutions, which were referred for information:

Resolved, by the senate and house of representatives in congress assembled, two-thirds of both houses concurring therein, That the following amendments to the constitution of the United States be proposed to the several states of the union, which, when ratified by three-fourths of the legislatures of said states, shall become and be a part of the constitution of the United States: That after the first day of July, 1842, there shall be throughout the United States, no hereditary slavery; but on and after that day every child born within the United States, their territories or jurisdiction, shall be born free.

2d. With the exception of the territory of Florida, there shall hereafter never be admitted into this union any state, the constitution of which shall tolerate within the same the existence of slavery.

3d. From and after the 4th of July, 1815, there shall be neither slavery nor slave trade at the seat of government of the United States.

Objection having been made, Mr. A. proceeded to state that he had in his possession a petition which he desired to present, and on which these resolutions were founded. It was a petition from John Jay and 43 most respectable citizens of the city of

New York. [Mr. A. was here interrupted by cries to order.] And the Speaker having decided that the motion to suspend the rule must first be disposed of, Mr. A. did not press the motion further at this time. And the question having been taken on the motion of Mr. Cambreleng, the rules were suspended.

Reports of committees were then called for, when the following, among others, were made to the house:

Mr. Cushman, from the committee on commerce, reported a bill explanatory of an act entitled an act making appropriations for building light-houses, light-boats, beacon-lights, buoys, and making surveys for the year 1838, passed 7th July, 1838.

Mr. Casey, from the committee on public lands, reported, without amendment, senate bills authorizing the relinquishment of the sixteenth sections granted for the use of schools, and the entry of other lands in lieu thereof; and authorizing certain certificates of deposit to be cancelled and reissued; which last mentioned bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. Chapman, from the same committee, reported, with amendments, senate bill for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands who were deprived of the benefits of the act granting pre-emption rights, which was approved on the 19th of 1839.

Some debate followed, (directed in the question of engrossment or commitment,) in which Messrs. Lincoln, Chapman, L. Williams, and Crab, participated; when, on motion of Mr. Lewis Williams, the bill (yeas 82, noes 54) was laid on the table. Mr. Loomis, from the same committee, reported, with amendment, senate bill to authorize John E. Metcalf and others to locate certain pre-emption claims to land in Indiana.

Also, made a report upon the subject of securing to actual settlers on public lands the right of pre-emption to their own improvements, when offered for sale, in preference to others, accompanied by a bill for that purpose.

Also, reported a bill authorizing the issuing of land scrip to satisfy military bounty land warrants.

Mr. Bouldin, from the committee for the District of Columbia, reported, without amendment, senate bill supplemental to the act granting certain city lots to the corporation of the Columbian college, for the purposes therein mentioned, approved 14th July, 1832. This bill was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. Tucey, from the committee on the judiciary, reported, without amendment, senate bill to prevent the abatement of suits and actions now pending, in which the Bank of Columbia, in Georgetown, may be a party; which bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. Tucey, from the same committee, reported an amendatory bill to authorize the circuit courts of the United States to appoint their own clerks and to regulate the fees of clerks in the states of Louisiana and Alabama.

Also, senate bill to abolish imprisonment for debt in certain cases, without amendment; which bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. McKay, from the committee on military affairs, reported a bill for the erection of certain military works on the northeastern frontier of the United States.

Mr. Howard, from the committee on foreign affairs, reported at length, relative to the commercial intercourse between the United States and the British provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

Mr. Mercer, from the committee on roads and canals, made a report upon the subject of an appropriation for improving the navigation of the Ohio river, and reported an amendment to the joint resolution now before the house, authorizing certain military surveys.

Mr. Pratt, from the committee on public buildings and grounds, made a report upon the subject of having the public buildings, hereafter to be erected, built either of marble or granite, instead of sandstone.

Mr. Ward, on leave, presented certain joint resolutions from the legislature of Mississippi on the subject of post routes. Referred.

Mr. May presented certain joint resolutions from the legislature of Illinois, on the subject of the currency, which were read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Sherrod Williams moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill abolishing imprisonment for debt in certain cases had been passed. The motion was entered.

Mr. Lincoln, from the committee on public buildings and grounds, laid before the house certain communications in relation to the material for the construction of public buildings. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Jenifer, chairman of the select committee to which had been referred so much of the president's message as relates to the tobacco-trade with foreign nations, made a report; which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Howard said that as this was a very important report, he would move the printing of 5,000 extra copies. And the rule having been suspended, the motion to print (having been urged briefly by Messrs. Howard and W. C. Johnson) was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Toucey, the rules were suspended for the purpose of considering the motion heretofore made to reconsider the vote abolishing imprisonment for debt. Mr. Petricin demanded the previous question. The bill having, on motion of Mr. Robertson, been read, the previous question was seconded, and the main question (being on the reconsideration) was ordered and taken, and the motion to reconsider was rejected.

On motion of Mr. Sergeant, the act amending the act in relation to the judicial system of the United States, was taken up on the question of final passage.

Mr. Everett moved to recommit the bill to the committee of the whole on the state of the union, for the purpose of striking out the second section. Some debate followed, in which Messrs. Everett and Thomas participated. Mr. Cambreleng moved the previous question.

Mr. Everett moved to lay the bill on the table; which motion was rejected. The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered, and the bill was passed.

The house again resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Banks in the chair,) on the general appropriation bill, which was debated until near one o'clock A. M.

When the committee rose, on motion of Mr. Toucey, and the committee having risen, the Chairman reported the fact of the absence of a quorum. Mr. Toucey moved that the house adjourn; on which motion the yeas and nays were asked and refused.

And then, at 10 o'clock A. M. the house adjourned.

Tuesday, Feb. 26. The unfinished business of the morning hour was the report of the select committee on the public lands; the question being on the amendment of Mr. Robeson.

Mr. Yell said that there were but a few days of the session left for the transaction of business indispensable to the support of the government; that it was now apparent that no action could be had during this session, and he would not trespass another morning upon the business of the nation, &c. He stated the positions which induced him to oppose the resolution, in addition to those advanced on a former day: First, that the public lands, under the deeds of session, were set apart for the payment of the national debt, which amounted, at the close of the war, to about $80,000,000. That debt has been paid, and, if you please, by the proceeds of the public lands; or rather, the whole amount of the sales amounts to about $106,000,000, out of which amount about $30,000,000 has been expended in surveying and paying all necessary expenses and salaries. But it must be recollected that this funded debt was paid as well out of the common treasure as the proceeds of the public lands. Secondly, that, from the estimate of the commissioner of the general land office, there has been about $60,000,000 paid for the purchase under the treaties with Florida and Spain and the extinguishment of Indian titles. That must be paid before the proceeds can be diverted from their original purpose. The money was taken out of the public treasury to acquire these titles, and it therefore became a part of the revenue, and could no more be applied in distribution than money raised from customs upon imports.

Mr. Y. took a brief survey of the grounds assigned, and finally closed with his objections to the passage of the resolution, because the state of the treasury would not justify it, and because the effect would be to raise the tariff, or a resort to direct taxation to make up the deficiency, which he estimated to be $10,000,000, or more, and which, moreover, would fall heavily upon the western states, as they were the consumers, and paid the duties in the end. Mr. Stierck Williams moved to lay the whole subject on the table. Mr. Hayes asked Mr. W. to withdraw the motion, which Mr. W. refused to do.

Mr. Lewis Williams demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table; which were refused; and the question being taken, the whole subject was laid on the table. Some conversation took place as to the order of business; when Mr. Cambreleng moved a suspension of the rule, for the purpose of going into committee of the whole on the state of the union, to resume the consideration of the general appropriation bill.

Mr. Sherrod Williams moved a reconsideration of the vote by which a bill in relation to certain pre-emption rights in the state of Alabama had been laid on the table yesterday; which motion was entered on the journal.

The house then again resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr.

Banks in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the general appropriation bill, which was debated by several gen.lemen.

Mr. W. Thompson having concluded his remarks, Mr. Howard stated that he understood that an executive message was ready to be delivered; and, to afford an opportunity for its presentation, he moved that the committee rise. The motion prevailed, and the committee rose and reported progress.

The following message was then received from the president of the United States on the subject of the difficulties in Maine, and on motion of Mr. Howard, was immediately read at the clerk's table; also, a letter from Mr. Fox to Mr. Forsyth; Mr. Forsyth's reply; Mr. Fox's rejoinder; Mr. Forsyth's letter to governor Fairfield; governor Fairfield's letter to Sir John Harvey. [The documents accompanying the message shall be published hereafter.]

To the house of representatives of the United States:

I lay before congress several despatches from his excellency the governor of Maine, with enclosures, communicating certain proceedings of the legislature of that state, and a copy of the reply of the secretary of state, made by my direction, together with a note from H. S. Fox, esq. envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of Great Britain, with the answer of the secretary of state to the same.

It will appear from those documents that a numerous band of lawless and desperate men, chiefly from the adjoining British provinces, but without the authority or sanction of the provincial government, had trespassed upon that portion of the territory in dispute between the United States and Great Britain which is watered by the river Aroostook, and claiming to belong to the state of Maine; and that they had committed extensive depredations, there by cutting and destroying a very large quantity of timber. It will further appear that the governor of Maine, having been officially apprised of the circumstance, had communicated it to the legislature, with a recommendation of such provisions, in addition to those already existing by law, as would enable him to arrest the course of said depredations, disperse the trespassers, and secure the timber which they were about carrying away; that in compliance with a resolve of the legislature, passed in pursuance of his recommendation, his excellency had despatched the land agent of the state, with a force deemed adequate to that purpose, to the scene of the alleged depredations, who, after accomplishing a part of his duty, was seized by a band of the trespassers, at a house situated to be within the jurisdiction of Maine, whether he had prepared for the purpose of meeting and consulting with the land agent of the province of New Brunswick, and conveyed as a prisoner to Fredericton, in that province, together with two other citizens of the state, who were assisting him in the discharge of his duty.

It will also appear that the governor and legislature of Maine, satisfied that the trespassers had acted in defiance of the laws of both countries, learning that they were in possession of arms, and anticipating (correctly, as the result has proved) that persons of their reckless and desperate character would set at naught the authority of the magistrates, without the aid of a strong force, had authorized the sheriff, and the officer appointed in the place of the land agent, to employ, at the expense of the state, an armed posse, which had proceeded to the scene of these depredations, with a view to the entire dispersion or arrest of the trespassers and the protection of the public property.

In the correspondence between the governor of Maine and Sir John Harvey, lieutenant governor of the province of New Brunswick, which has grown out of these occurrences, and is likewise herewith communicated, the former is requested to recall the armed party advanced into the disputed territory for the arrest of trespassers, and is informed that a strong body of British troops is to be held in readiness to support and protect the authority and subjects of Great Britain in said territory. In answer to a request of the provincial governor is informed of the determination of the state of Maine to support the land agent and his party, in the performance of their duty, and the same determination, for the execution of which provision is made by a resolution of the state legislature, is communicated by the governor to the general government.

The lieutenant governor of New Brunswick, in calling upon the governor of Maine for the recall of the land agent and his party from the disputed territory, and the British minister in making a similar demand upon the government of the United States, proceed upon the assumption that an agreement exists between the two nations conceding to Great Britain, until the final settlement of the boundary question, exclusive possession of, and jurisdiction over, the territory in dispute. The important bearing which such an agreement, if it existed, would have upon the condition and interests of the parties, and the inducement it might have upon the adjustment of the dispute, are too obvious to allow the error upon which this assumption seems to rest to pass for a moment without correction. The answer of the secretary of state to Mr. Fox's note, will show the ground taken by the government of the United States upon this point. It is believed that all the correspondence which has passed between the two governments upon this subject has already been communicated to congress, and is now on their files. An abstract of it, however, hastily prepared, accompanies this communication. It is possible that in thus abridging a voluminous correspondence, commencing in 1825 and continuing to a very recent period, a portion may have been accidentally overlooked; but it is believed that nothing has been taken of which would materially change the aspect of the question as therein presented. Instead of sustaining the assumption of the British functionaries that correspondence disproves the existence of any such agreement. It shows that the two governments have differed not only in regard to the main question of title to the territory in dispute, but with reference also to the right of jurisdiction, and the fact of the actual exercise of it in different portions thereof. Always aiming at an amicable adjustment of the dispute, both parties have entertained and repeatedly urged upon each other a desire, that each should exercise its rights, whatever it considered them to be, in such a manner as to avoid collision, and ally, to the greatest practicable extent, the excitement likely to grow out of the controversy. It was in pursuance of such an understanding that Maine and Massachusetts, upon the remonstrance of Great Britain, desisted from making sales of lands, and the general government from the construction of a projected military road in a portion of the territory of which they claimed to have enjoyed the exclusive possession, and that Great Britain, on her part, in deference to a similar remonstrance from the United States, suspended the issue of licenses to cut timber in the territory in controversy, and also the survey and location of a railroad through a section of country over which she also claimed to have exercised exclusive jurisdiction.

The state of Maine had a right to arrest the depredations complained of; it belonged to her to judge of the exigency of the occasion calling for her interference, and it is presumed that the lieutenant governor of New Brunswick was correctly advised of the nature of the proceedings of the state of Maine, he would not have regarded the transaction as requiring, on his part, any resort to force. Each party claiming a right to the territory, and hence to the exclusive jurisdiction over it, it is manifest that, to prevent the destruction of the timber by trespassers, acting against the authority of both, and at the same time avoid forcible collision between the contiguous governments during the pendency of negotiations concerning the title, resort must be had to the mutual exercise of jurisdiction in such extreme cases, or to an amicable and temporary arrangement as to the limits within which it should be exercised by each party. The understanding supposed to exist between the United States and Great Britain has been found heretofore sufficient for that purpose, and I believe will prove so hereafter, if the parties on the frontier, directly interested in the question, are respectively governed by a just spirit of conciliation and forbearance. If it shall be found, as there is now reason to apprehend, that there is, in the mode of construing that understanding by the two governments, a difference not to be reconciled, I shall not hesitate to propose to her Britannic majesty's government a distinct arrangement for the temporary and mutual exercise of jurisdiction, by means of which similar difficulties may in future be prevented.

But between an effort on the part of Maine to preserve the property in dispute from destruction by intruders, and a military occupation by that power of the territory, with a view to hold it by force, while the controversy is the subject of negotiation between the two governments, there is an essential difference, as well in respect to the position of the state, as to the duties of the general government. In a letter addressed by the secretary of state to the governor of Maine, on the 1st of March last, giving a detailed statement of the steps which had been taken by the federal government to bring the controversy to a termination, and designed to apprise the governor of that state of the views of the federal executive, in respect to the future, it was stated, that while the obligations of the federal government to do all in its power to effect the settlement of the boundary question were fully recognized, it had, in the event of being unable to do so specifically, by mutual consent, no other means to accomplish that object amicably, than by anotheir arbitration, or by a commission with an umpire in the nature of an arbitration; and that in the event of all other measures failing, the president would feel it his duty to submit another proposition to the government of Great Britain, to refer the decision of the question to a third power. These are still my views upon the subject, and until this step shall have been taken, I cannot think it proper to invoke the attention of congress to other than amicable means for the settlement of the controversy, or to cause the military power of the federal government to be brought in aid of the state of Maine, in any attempt to effect that object by a resort to force.

On the other hand, if the authorities of New Brunswick should attempt to enforce the claim of exclusive jurisdiction set up by them, by means of a military occupation on their part of the disputed territory, I shall feel myself bound to consider the contingency provided by the constitution as having occurred, on the happening of which a state has the right to call for the aid of the federal government to repel invasion.

I have expressed to the British minister near this government a confident expectation that the agents of the state of Maine, who have been appointed under the obvious misapprehension of the object of their mission, will be promptly released; and to the governor of Maine that a similar course will be pursued in regard to the agents of the province of New Brunswick. I have also recommended that any militia that may have been brought together by the state of Maine, from an apprehension of a collision with the government or people of the British province, will be voluntarily and peaceably disbanded.

I cannot allow myself to doubt that the results anticipated from these representations will be seasonably realized. The parties more immediately interested cannot but perceive that an appeal to arms, under existing circumstances, will not only prove fatal to their present interests, but would postpone, if not defeat, the attainment of the main objects which they have in view. The very incidents which have recently occurred will necessarily awaken the governments to the importance of promptly adjusting a dispute, by which it is now made manifest that the peace of the two nations is daily and imminently endangered. This expectation is further warranted by the general forbearance which has hitherto characterized the conduct of the government and people on both sides of the line. In the uniform patriotism of Maine, her attachment to the union, her respect for the wishes of the people of her sister states, of whose interest in her welfare she cannot be unconscious, and, in the solicitude felt by the country at large for the preservation of peace with our neighbors, we have a strong guarantee that she will not disregard the request that has been made of her.

As the session of congress is about to terminate, and the agency of the executive may become necessary during the recess, it is important that the attention of the legislature should be drawn to the consideration of such measures as may be calculated to obviate the necessity of a call for an extra session. With that view, I have thought it my duty to lay the whole matter before you, and to invite such action thereon as you may think the occasion requires.

M. VAN BUREN.

Washington, 26th February, 1859.

Mr. Howard moved that the message and accompanying documents be referred to the committee on foreign affairs, and be printed; and that the committee have liberty to sit during the sittings of the house.

Mr. Waddy Thompson moved the printing of 20,000 extra copies, and supported the motion by a speech in which he highly commended the message. Mr. Pearce, of Maryland, briefly replied to some remarks of Mr. Thompson's speech which he considered as reflecting, in an offensive manner, upon the house. Mr. Thompson explained. Mr. Evans, of Maine, followed in a long and very animated speech, in which he gave a full history of the present difficulty in that state from its origin; stated minutely its present condition; commented with some severity on the neglect which had been shown by the general government to the oft repeated representations of that state, in which the present crisis had been represented as inevitable; and insisted that it was evident from the whole tone of the message that the urgency of the case was not appreciated. Mr. Howard remonstrated against this crimination of the government as necessarily leading to a defensive reply, and thus tending to withdraw the attention of the house to a collateral subject, and diverting it from the deeply interesting subject of the message. Mr. Evans proceeded some time longer, and when he sat down, Mr. Pe-trikin moved the previous question. [Loud cries of "no," "no"—"withdraw it," "withdraw it," from all the house.] Mr. Petrikin withdrew his motion. Mr. Adams then addressed the house, encouraging fully the speech of Mr. Evans, but suggesting a constitutional difficulty in relation to the advice of the president to the governor of Maine, to enter into an explanation and accommodation with the governor of New Brunswick, &c. as a thing which a governor of a state was not authorized to do, and expressed his hope that an agent of the government would be appointed to manage such an arrangement, should it take place, &c. Mr. Cray moved the previous question. Mr. Lincoln requested him to withdraw the motion, but he refused to comply. The question being taken by tellers, on seconding the motion, it was rejected: ayes 48, noes 89.

Mr. Lincoln then addressed the house, and after warm commendations of the message, went at large into the general subject.

He was succeeded by Mr. Cushing, who strenuously denied the existence of any agreement between the two governments, that pending the controversy, Great Britain was to hold exclusive jurisdiction over the disputed territory, and advised to the aggressive claims of that government, her course toward the Indians, and on the northwestern coast, &c.

Messrs. Pickens, Sergeant, and Everett also addressed the house. When the last named gentleman had concluded his remarks, Mr. Whittlesey demanded the previous question, which was seconded. The main question was ordered; and, being taken, the message and accompanying documents were referred to the committee on foreign relations, and ordered to be printed. On motion of Mr. Howard, the said committee were leave to sit during the sessions of the house. On motion of Mr. Evans, so much of the report of the land agent of Maine as referred to the subject of the message was also ordered to be printed. Mr. Bronson moved to print 10,000 extra copies of the message and documents, but waived the motion for the present. [The debate on the message will be given at length hereafter.] Mr. Cambreleng asked the house again to go into committee on the general appropriation bill. Mr. Harlan, from the select committee appointed on the 17th of January to inquire into recent defalcations, asked leave to make a report. Mr. Cambreleng objected. The general appropriation bill had already kept the committee up two nights, and he hoped it would be disposed of. It was most important that it should be. Mr. Harlan said if he had to set from now until daylight, he would put his motion. He moved to suspend the rule. Mr. Wise demanded the yeas and nays on that motion, which were ordered; and, being taken, were yeas 83, nays 59; (not two-thirds.) So the rule was not suspended.

The house again went into committee and resumed the consideration of the general appropriation bill, which was further amended and reported to the house—when Mr. Chambers offered an amendment, the effect of which would be to prohibit any collector from retaining in his hands moneys paid under protest, and requiring him to deposit the same in bank to the credit of the treasurer of the United States. The amendment was adopted. The house then concurred in the amendments reported from the committee, save a few which were reserved for discussion, which were ordered to be printed. Mr. Bell moved an adjournment, but withdrew the motion at the request of Mr. Evans, who, by leave, laid on the table a communication from governor Fairbald to the legislature of Maine, which he observed, presented a very critical state of things there. The reading was dispensed with, and the document ordered to be printed for the information of the members. Mr. Jenifer, on leave, offered a resolution calling for certain information in relation to the tobacco trade.

A bill in explanation of a bill for the reorganization of the United States marine corps, was read twice and committed.

Mr. Ewing, on leave, presented certain joint resolutions of the legislature of Indiana, condemnatory of all interference on the part of free states, and the citizens of free states, with the domestic institutions or legal regulations of the slave states, which were laid upon the table, under the rule applicable thereto.

Mr. Dawson, from a select committee, made a report on certain claims of the state of Georgia; which were read and referred. Mr. Beatty moved an adjournment, (about half past 10.) Mr. Harlan requested him to withdraw it, that he might present a report from the investigating committee on the Swatwout defalcations. Mr. Beatty refusing, Mr. Harlan demanded the yeas and nays; which being ordered, were taken, and resulted in the negative: yeas 43, nays 52. So the house refused to adjourn. A call of the house was moved by Mr. Hopkins. Mr.

Beime demanded the yeas and nays. Mr. Wise remonstrated. All the committee desired was to get the report out of their hands into those of the printer. Mr. Mercer hoped the report would be received and ordered to be printed. Mr. Hopkins withdrew his motion for a call.

Mr. Owens stated that the report of the minority would be ready in the morning; and it being understood that both reports should be presented simultaneously to-morrow morning.

The house, a little before 11 o'clock, adjourned.

Wednesday, Feb. 27. Mr. Harlan, from the select committee appointed on the 17th of January last, to inquire and report as to defalcations of public officers, made a report; when

Mr. Owens, of the same committee, on behalf of the minority, by leave, submitted a report containing the views of the minority upon the subject matters committed to the committee. Mr. Harlan, on behalf of the committee, moved the reading of the conclusions of the committee; and that 5,000 copies of the reports with the journal, and 20,000 copies of the reports without the journal, be printed. Mr. Petrikin said he was not opposed to printing, but he objected to the reading, unless all the reports were read. And he on that point, accordingly. Some conversation followed in different parts of the house, of which little could be heard, owing to the extreme confusion. The Choir decided that it was a parliamentary right to call for the reading; and, after some further conversation on points of order, the clerk proceeded to read the report of the majority. The reading was frequently interrupted by attempts to suspend it. And, after it had proceeded some way, on motion of Mr. Owens, all the reports (by general consent) were laid on the table; and 5,000 copies thereof, with the journal, and 20,000 copies of both documents, without the journal, were ordered to be printed.

Mr. Hall, from the select committee, appointed on the 24th of January, to inquire into the character and amount of proof which is required by existing laws and regulations to establish claims on the United States for military services in the Virginia continental and state lines; and whether any and what further legislative provisions be necessary in regard to the mode of adjusting and allowing claims for such services, made a report thereon, adverse to further appropriations for the satisfaction of said warrants, and moved that it be laid on the table, and that the report and documents be printed. Mr. Talzferro asked a division of the question. Mr. Wise urged that the question should not be taken now, as a colleague of his, and a member of the committee, (not now in his seat,) was preparing his protest against this report, by which great injustice, he contended, was done, and he wished to have that protest printed together with the report. A report was laid on the table.

The question recurring on the motion to print, some remarks followed from Messrs. Talzferro, Craig, Hall, and Wise. When, with a view to save the time of the house, now so precious, Mr. Stanly moved to lay the motion to print on the table. Mr. Briggs, as a member of the committee, appealed to Mr. Stanly to withdraw the motion. Mr. Stanly not consenting, Mr. Granel asked the yeas and nays on the motion to lay the motion to print on the table, which were ordered; and, being taken, were—yeas 43, nays 127. So the motion to lay the motion to print on the table was rejected; and the question recurring on the motion to print, before further action was taken, the speaker announced the expiration of the morning hour.

On leave, Mr. Cambreleng offered a resolution fixing the hour of meeting at 10 o'clock, and providing that the house take a recess from 3 to half past 5. Some amendments being offered, Mr. Cambreleng moved the previous question, which was seconded, the main question was ordered; and the resolution was adopted, (and takes effect as to the recess this day.) On leave, Mr. Adams presented certain joint resolutions from the legislature of Massachusetts on the subject of the salt duty. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed. The speaker laid before the house a letter from the secretary of war, transmitting reports of the commissary general of the army, and the commissioner of Indian affairs, together with document No. 75 of the house of representatives, 2d sess. 25th congress, containing the information called for by a resolution of the house of representatives of the 28th ut.

A letter from the secretary of war, in answer to a resolution of the house of representatives of the 21st of January last, calling for information as to the number of Cherokee Indians now residing in North Carolina, &c.

A letter from the secretary of war, transmitting the information required by a resolution of the house of representatives of the 14th ult. in relation to the improvement of Little Egg Harbor.

The house resumed the consideration of the general appropriation bill, which had been reported from the committee of the whole on the state of the union, the question being on concurring in certain amendments made thereto in committee, and which had been reserved for special question.

The amendments occupied the attention of the house until the hour of recess.

EVENING SESSION.

The house met after recess, when the general appropriation bill was again considered and further amended. Mr. Cambreleng moved the previous question. Mr. Garland, of Louisiana, asked him to withdraw the motion, reminding him of a pledge given by him on a former day that he would not make this motion till Mr. G. should have had an opportunity of presenting in the house certain amendments moved by him in committee. Mr. Cambreleng denied that he was under any such pledge. Mr. Garland replied with great warmth, and in somewhat intemperate terms, which, however, were indignantly heard by the reporter amidst the cries of "order!" "order!"; and the general confusion of the house. Mr. Williams, of N. C., moved a call of the house; which motion prevailing, the house was called. 129 members having answered to their names, the absentees were called, when 157 members were found to be present. The call was then suspended. The previous question was seconded by yeas and nays: yeas 113, nays 47. It was then put, and carried.

Mr. Connor demanded the yeas and nays; but the house refused to order thereon; when the bill was read a third time, its title, and passed.

Mr. Garland apologized to the house for the intemperate expressions he had used towards Mr. Cambreleng, stating that the latter had come to his seat, and stated that he had forgotten having given the pledge, though afterwards convinced it had been given, as Mr. G. had stated.

[Cries of "well done!" "handsome!"]

The following message, and memorandum, were received from the president of the United States:

Washington, Feb. 27, 1839.

To the house of representatives of the United States:

I transmit to congress copies of various other documents received from the governor of Maine, relating to the dispute between that state and the province of New Brunswick, which formed the subject of my message of the 26th instant, and also a copy of a memorandum signed by the secretary of state of the United States and her Britannic majesty's envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary near the United States, of the terms upon which it is believed all collision can be avoided on the frontier, consistently with, and respecting the claims on either side. As the British minister acts without specific authority from his government, it will be observed that this memorandum has but the force of recommendation on the provincial authorities and on the government of the state.

M. VAN BUREN.

MEMORANDUM.

Her majesty's authorities consider it to have been understood and agreed upon by the two governments that the territory in dispute between Great Britain and the United States, on the northeastern frontier, should remain exclusively under British jurisdiction until the final settlement of the boundary question.

The United States government have not understood the above agreement in the same sense, but consider, on the contrary, that there has been no agreement whatever for the exercise, by Great Britain, of exclusive jurisdiction over the disputed territory, or any portion thereof, but a mutual understanding that, pending the negotiation, the jurisdiction then exercised by either party, over small portions of the territory in dispute, should not be enlarged, but be continued merely for the preservation of local tranquility and the public property, both forbearing as far as practicable to exert any authority, and, when any should be exercised by either, placing upon the conduct of each other the most favorable construction.

A complete understanding upon the question, thus placed at issue, of present jurisdiction, can only be arrived at by friendly discussion between the governments of the United States and Great Britain; and, as it is confidently hoped that there will be an early settlement of the question, this subordinate point of difference can be of but little moment.

In the mean time the governor of the province of New Brunswick and the government of the state of Maine will act as follows: Her majesty's officers will not seek to expel by military force the armed party which has been sent by Maine into the district bordering on the Aroostook river; but the government of Maine will voluntarily, and without needless delay, withdraw beyond the bounds of the disputed territory any armed force now within them; and, if future necessity should arise for dispersing notorious trespassers, or protecting public property from depredation by armed force, the operation shall be conducted by concert, jointly or separately, according to agreements between the governments of Maine and New Brunswick.

The civil officers in the service, respectively, of New Brunswick and Maine, who have been taken into custody by the opposite parties, shall be released.

Nothing in this memorandum shall be construed to fortify or to weaken in any respect whatever, the claim of either party to the ultimate possession of the disputed territory.

The minister plenipotentiary of her Britannic majesty having no specific authority to make any arrangement on the subject, the undersigned can only recommend, as they now earnestly do, to the governments of New Brunswick and Maine, to regulate their future proceedings according to the terms hereinbefore set forth, until the final settlement of the territorial dispute, or until the governments of the United States and Great Britain shall come to some definite conclusion on the subordinate point upon which they are now at issue.

JOHN FORSYTH, secretary of state of the United States of North America.
H. S. FOX, U. S. M. envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary.
Washington, February 27, 1839.

The message and memorandum having been read, Mr. Evans addressed the house at length.

The motion of Mr. Ingham all having come back from the senate without amendments.

Mr. Cambreleng moved his reference to the committee of the whole on the state of the union, which was agreed to.

On his motion the house then went into committee of the whole, (Mr. Ingham in the chair,) and took up the bill to prevent and suppress Indian hostilities, which was amended, and laid aside. In the course of the debate, Mr. W. C. Johnson, on urging the propriety of laying aside the above bill, that some of the many other bills before the house might be taken up, alluded to the great loss of time in debate, and to the excellent practice in the British house of commons of coughing members down on certain occasions; a rule which he thought might be most properly applied here.

On motion of Mr. Lincoln, the committee took up the bill providing for the erection of a fire-proof building for the use of the general post office department, which was amended; but a count having been made upon a motion of Mr. Rencher providing that not more than one architect be employed, the committee was found to be without a quorum.

After various motions the committee rose and reported that fact to the house.

A call of the house was moved, and negatived by yeas 33, nays 80; when a quorum being present, Mr. Ingham resumed the chair of the committee of the whole.

And the amendment of Mr. Rencher was adopted. On motion of Mr. Evans, the committee took up a bill for the erection of military works on our northeastern frontier: (it appropriates to that object $300,000.)

Mr. W. C. Johnson inquired what was meant by the phrase "military works," in the bill.

Mr. McKay, chairman of the committee on military affairs, explained the grounds of the bill.

Mr. Johnson then went at length into a speech in favor of the erection of a United States army for the founding of cannon, in which he quoted the report of the ordnance bureau, from which it appeared that 1,178 guns were needed to man new forts already erected, 2,578 for works in a process of construction, 752 for forts now rebuilding, 3,606 for other works projected, but not yet commenced; making, in all, 13,320 pieces of ordnance, exclusive of what were needed for the navy.

He then stated the guns now on hand, which were 1,000 heavy cannon and mortars, not much more than half of which were fit for use; 935 in forts, 1,219 in depot, 150 under contract to be cast; making in all 2,303; thus leaving a deficit of 11,017 pieces, aside from the navy and field trains.

He stated the condition of the guns now mounted in our forts; the want of new mortars similar to those used by the French in the late siege and demolition of the castle of St. Juan de Ulton, in Mexico; and the introduction of similar mortars into the British service. He then quoted the recommendations of an armory by various presidents, and urged the measure with much zeal.

Mr. Cambreleng moved for the rising of the committee; which motion prevailing, the committee thereupon rose, and reported the bills which had been acted upon to the house; which, at about half past 11, thereupon adjourned.

Thursday, Feb. 28. After the consideration of some business which shall be noticed in the next "REGISTER," Mr. Howard, on leave, from the committee on foreign relations, reported the following bill, accompanied by a report, [to be given in our next.]

A BILL giving to the president of the United States additional powers for the defence of the United States, in certain cases, against invasion, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That the president of the United States be, and he is, authorized to resist any attempt on the part of Great Britain, or of any other power, to obtain to exclusive jurisdiction over that part of the state of Maine which is in dispute between the United States and Great Britain; and, for that purpose, to employ the naval and military forces of the United States and such portions of the militia as he may deem it advisable to call into service.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, in the event of British troops being encamped, or of the United States by any foreign power, or of imminent danger of such invasion discovered, in his opinion, to exist, before congress can be convened to act upon the subject, the president of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized, in addition to the present military establishment of the United States, to raise a provisional force, not to exceed 50,000 men, or 5000 cavalry, or an equal number of hostilities with any foreign power, not exceeding one regiment of dragoons, one regiment of artillery, two regiments of riflemen, and sixteen regiments of infantry, to be organized, in all respects, like the corresponding regiments now in service; and, also, to appoint not exceeding one major general, four brigadiers general, and one lieutenant general, or an equal number of assistant generals for each new regiment; the regiments, general, and medical officers to be subject to the same laws and rules, and to be entitled to the same benefits, of every kind, with the like corps and officers now in service; and it shall be the duty of the president to discharge the troops which may be raised by virtue of this act whenever there shall be occasion for them, as defined by this act, shall cease to exist.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That, in the event of either of the contingencies provided in the first section of this act, the president of the United States shall be authorized to complete the public armed vessels now authorized by law, and to equip, man, and employ, in actual service, all the naval force of the United States.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the sum of ————— millions of dollars is hereby appropriated and placed at his disposal for the purpose of executing the provisions of this act, to provide for which the secretary of the treasury is authorized to borrow money on the credit of the United States, and to cause to be issued certificates of stock, signed by the register of the treasury, for the sum to be borrowed, or any part thereof; and the same to be sold upon the best terms that may be offered after public notice for proposals for the same. And no engagement or contract shall be entered into which shall preclude the United States from reimbursing any sum or sums thus borrowed after the expiration of five years from the first of January next; and that the rate of interest shall not exceed five per cent., payable semi-annually.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the sum of eighteen thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the salary and salary of a special messenger, to be appointed by the president of the United States shall deem it expedient to appoint the same.

The bill, as well as the report, having been read, Mr. H moved that they be referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union, he made the special order of the day for to-morrow at 11 o'clock, and that they be printed. A debate now ensued in which Messrs. Howard, Adams, Evans, and Legare, participated. Finally, as an easy mode of making any alterations that might be advisable, Mr. Evans suggested that the report should be printed under the superintendance of the committee. Mr. Howard accepted the suggestion, and modified his motion accordingly; and, thereupon, the bill and report were referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union, where he made the special order of the day for to-morrow, (Friday,) at 11 o'clock, to take precedence over all other business, and were ordered to be printed under the superintendance of the committee on foreign affairs. Mr. W. C. Johnson moved the printing of 20,000 extra copies of the bill and report, documents, &c. but, on the suggestion of Mr. Loomis, modified the motion to 10,000; and, after some few remarks, the motion was considered and agreed to. The house then again went into committee; and, on motion of Mr. R. Garland, the committee took up the bill pending, for the taking of the next census. The bill having been read, Mr. R. Garland moved two additional sections, which were agreed to. Some amendments were offered, and some progress had been made in the bill, when the hour of 3 having arrived, the house took a recess.

NILES' NATIONAL REGISTER.

FIFTH SERIES. No. 2.—VOL. VI.]

WASHINGTON CITY, MARCH 9, 1839.

[VOL. LVI.—WHOLE No. 1,432.]

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED, EVERY SATURDAY, BY WILLIAM OGDEN NILES, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

✪ An awkward error occurred on publishing Mr. Price's letter in our last. The "Intelligencer" was authorized to say that it was addressed to his son—but our compositor made us say that they were authorized to say it was not addressed to that individual.

✪ The bill which finally passed both houses of congress empowering the president to protect the Maine border, is inserted in the next page. We will, hereafter, bring up the journal of congressional proceedings, and publish the debates on the question at length.

✪ The annual general appropriation bill contains besides its ordinary items, the following enactment for the further security of the revenue derived from imposts:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the passage of this act, every paid to any collector of the customs, or to any person acting as such, for unspecified duties, or for duties paid under protest against the rate or amount of duties charged, shall be placed to the credit of the treasurer of the United States, kept and disposed of, as all other money paid for duties is required by law, or by regulation of the treasury department, to be placed to the credit of the said treasurer, kept and disposed of, and shall not be held by the said collector, or person acting as such, to await any ascertainment of duties, or the result of any litigation in relation to the rate or amount of duty legally chargeable and collectible in any case where money is so paid. But, whenever it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the treasury that, in any case of the said ascertained duty or duties paid under protest, more money has been paid to the collector or person acting as such, than the law requires should have been paid, it shall be his duty to draw his warrant upon the treasurer in favor of the person or persons entitled to the over payment, directing the said treasurer to refund the same out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated.

✪ The twenty-fifth congress terminated on Monday morning last; the house having adjourned at about one o'clock, and the senate at about three o'clock. Never, perhaps, since the formation of the constitution, has a session terminated which has been so little productive of benefits to the country, or so rife with bad passions, miserrand artifices, and all that is offensive in party tactics. During the entire session, excepting a few days before its close, there seemed to be a total disregard of the interests of the people and the government; and day by day has been wasted in stupid debates to win popularity at home, or wicked and foolish attempts to gain party ascendancy. As a consequence of this profligate waste of time, there has been a frightful wreck of the public business, and a vast amount of suffering entailed upon individuals whose rightful claims have been deterred another year.

In speaking thus, we do not intend to reflect upon either of the two parties in congress, for we consider the whole body liable to censure; but upon that spirit which regards legislation more in its effects upon party interests than the public welfare; for on no question that has been discussed, have that which involved the national honor, have that which involved the rights of the people, which bore a broad and national view of the consequences of measures.

To give our readers some idea of this waste of time, we state, that more than one hundred bills which had passed the senate, were not acted on by the house; and that of the vast number which had been prepared by the committees of the latter body, with great labor, hardly a fourth part were finally acted on. Indeed, in the whole list of public acts passed, there are but few, if we except the appropriation bill, the bill to take the next census, and the bill in relation to the north-eastern boundary, which were immediately called for by the public interest, and might not have been postponed until the next session.

The "Intelligencer" has the following notice of one of the bills which failed:

"The session was closed long after midnight of Sunday the 3d instant, the house adjourning at a quarter past two o'clock, the senate not until after three o'clock, A. M. of Monday.

Among the acts which failed, may be reckoned as first among those which have attracted the public attention, the bill known as the sub-treasury bill; which, after passing the senate, was suffered to lie on the table of the other house till the close of the session, without its friends venturing so far as even to make a motion for its consideration.

In the list of acts passed during the late session, the reader will find none making appropriations for fortifications, or for the support of the military academy. The appropriations for these objects were incorporated in the bill making appropriations for the support of the army for 1832. An appropriation is also contained in that bill for the defence of the Niagara, Oswego, and Plattsburg frontier; and an appropriation of $80,000 for the defence of the western frontier is included in the Indian appropriation bill.

The appropriations for the support of the post office department are included in the civil appropriation act. No post-road act was passed at this session.

No act for building or completing light houses was passed. The bill for that purpose which passed the senate was never even read in the house.

Neither was any act for the improvement of harbors passed this session.

The bill making appropriations for the continuation of the Cumberland road, after passing the senate, failed in the house of representatives, notwithstanding the strenuous exertions of its friends to procure for it a hearing at least. On Sunday night, Mr. Rariden got a motion before the house to go into committee of the whole on that bill, but his motion was negatived."

DELAWARE. The legislature of this state had adjourned without electing a senator in the place of Mr. Bayard. We will give all the proceedings in relation to this omission hereafter.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS. The following "circular to collectors, naval officers, and surveyors," has been issued by direction of the secretary of the treasury:

Treasury department,
Comptroller's office, March 4, 1839.

The recent session of congress having terminated without the passage of an act proposed by this department, explanatory of the various conflicting provisions of existing laws in regard to the classification of several descriptions of merchandise imported into the United States; and the supreme court of the United States having lately pronounced an opinion in respect to one of the principal species of goods, heretofore the subject of great controversy, it has been deemed expedient and proper by this office to avail itself of the occasion so far to modify existing instructions as to make them conform to the judicial decision in reference not only to the article of merchandise specially the subject of the recent suit, but to all those articles also which clearly come within the spirit of the law as expounded by the court.

The supreme court has declared that silk hosiery is free from duty, under the act of 2d March, 1823.

By the application of the principle established by the court, it follows as a necessary consequence that hats, gloves, bindings, millinery, ready-made clothing, and all other manufactures of silk, or of which silk is the component material of great value, coming from this side of the Cape of Good Hope, except sewing silk, are also exempt from duty.

The opinion of the court being maintained, in part upon the position, that the second clause of the second section of the duty act of 1823, except only as it respects ready-made clothing, has exclusive reference to articles of wool, or of which wool is a component part, it follows, in accordance with this opinion, that hats, gloves, and bindings, when composed wholly or in part of wool, are chargeable with the duty of 25 per centum, as specified in that section; when of other material, (except silk) according to the material of which they are composed, as leather 30 per cent., cotton 25 per cent. Ready-made clothing, being separated from the general operation of the principle here applied, stands as an independent specification, subject to a duty of 50 per cent., whatever may be the fabric, and exempted from duty only when of silk, by the operation of the act of March, 1823.

Your practice in future will be regulated by these opinions. All instructions from this department not consistent therewith being necessarily superseded, and in cases in which you have received duties, paid under protest, on any of the articles now declared exempt from the payment of duty, you will refund the said duties to the owners of the goods.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. N. BARKER, comptroller.

NORTHEASTERN FRONTIER. The news in our last from the frontier, was from Augusta, under date of the 25th ult. We have since gathered the following items of intelligence:

A letter to the editor of the Boston Atlas, dated Augusta, Me., Feb. 28, says—

"The last of the troops drafted from this division who have been called into active service, left here this morning. They are to proceed forthwith to the disputed territory.

A letter was received in this town last evening dated at Houlton, the 26th instant, which says, that five companies of British troops had gone up the St. Johns. A part of the militia of the province had been called into the service of her majesty. Some of them were stationed at Woodstock. A gentleman who left Houlton on Monday last, represents that the proceeding in our legislature and the letter of gov. Fairfield to sir John Harvey, had created great excitement in the province. A part of gen. Hodson's detachment reached Houlton on Tuesday.

Orders were issued yesterday calling about a thousand more of our militia into the service of the state.

On the 1st instant letters from Houlton were received at Bangor, a distance of 120 miles, in 10 hours and 25 minutes, by the line of videttes established between the two places. One of them is from colonel John L. Hodson, and communicates the important intelligence that a regiment of 800 Fusiliers had arrived at Halifax from Cork, and were ordered to be at Frederickton on Wednesday last, and to proceed forthwith to the disputed territory.

It also states that it would be necessary to cut a road from seven to twenty-five miles for the Maine troops to join Mr. Jarvis's force, which road must at one point approach within a few rods of the undisputed boundary, at which point it was anticipated there must be a brush with the British. It was also supposed that a reinforcement of American troops would be ordered very soon.

Another letter from Houlton states that col. Webster, one of the persons taken with Mr. McIntire, had arrived there from No. 10, with the information that Jarvis' force had thrown up a fort near Fitzherbert's. The letter also says, that col. Webster reports the arrival of 500 British troops from Quebec, at Madawaska village—having been ordered to New Brunswick before the difficulties commenced.

The detachment sent by Mr. Jarvis to the Fish river, had broken up a camp of lumbering trespassers, making 5 men, 4 horses and 5 oxen prisoners. Another account says 11 men and all their teams.

Most of the troops under general Hodson had arrived at Houlton; another 1,000 under general Bachelard were on their way thither, and another 1,000 had received orders to march; making in all about 3,700 concentrated, or soon to be in the disputed territory.

Sir John Harvey had sent an express to sir John Colborne. Three companies of regulars were quartered at Woodstock. The Maine papers say the British troops were strongly disposed to desert, and that a strong guard of provincial militia was stationed between Woodstock and Houlton, to prevent the regulars from slipping over the line.

The Boston Mercantile of Monday evening states that it seems to be the general opinion in Maine, that the government of that state will not relinquish her claim to the jurisdiction over the disputed territory—but will retain possession with a military force—in spite of the protocol. The Portland Advertiser says "we say this, and we do but speak the language of the whole state of Maine, that we will not yield up the possession of the Aroostock to any earthly power."

By an extra of the Bangor Mechanic and Farmer, dated 2d March, (Saturday,) we learn that a gentleman from Woodstock reports that the militia are gathering on the frontier. Only 140 regulars were at Woodstock, with 7 pieces of artillery.

A correspondent of the Boston Courier, under date of Houlton, Feb. 27th, says there was then raging a violent snow storm, which it was thought would impede the progress of the six or eight hundred militia of Bangor on their march to Houlton.

The Portland Courier of Friday evening says— "Gov. Fairfield's answer to sir John Harvey's letter, in which sir John Harvey claims exclusive jurisdiction over the disputed territory, created something of a stir at Frederickton; in less than an hour after it was received, a special message was on its way to Washington with despatches to the British minister."

A letter in the Boston Atlas of Monday, dated in the senate chamber of Maine, at Augusta, March 20, (probably from a Maine senator) says:

"I speak advisedly, when I say that if the contemplated visit of general Scott to Maine is only to persuade a withdrawal of our troops from the disputed territory, or a relinquishment of our present position, he might as well slidy away. I repeat that I speak advisedly when I say this. It may appear as strong language, but I say from my heart that I had rather see our state deluged in blood, and every field bleached by the bones of our citizens, than that we should yield our footsteps and submit to British arrogance. Yes, the "glorious stars and stripes" must wave on the line, and we must speak, if necessary, with the cannon's mouth to the British minions, "thus far shalt thou come and no farther."

The Boston Atlas of Tuesday contains the following letter from its correspondent, dated

Bangor, Saturday, March 2, 1839.

We are again in the midst of excitement. The information from the frontier which I forwarded to you last night, and the intelligence by this morning's mail of the state of feeling in the cabinet, in congress and among the people of Washington, have aroused to greater intensity the interest of our citizens in the all absorbing subject, and given impulse to curiosity, inquiry, discussion and speculation. Bulletins and extras are issued and hawked about the street and posted up in public places. At no time before have we felt the probability of a general war to be so great. The people of this state will be rejoiced if the general government, as there is now reason to believe, will approve and aid and make common cause with them in the struggle they have commenced. Yet would they much more rejoice, enthusiastic and excited as they are, if the difficulty could be terminated honorably without bloodshed.

No express has arrived to day, and there is no news of importance from the east. A draft from the 7th division is on its way to Calais—it amounts to 800 men, and 220 light infantry and riflemen from the 5th division are ordered to meet at Portland on Monday and proceed at once to Augusta, and a new draft from the 5th, 6th and 8th divisions of 1,000 is ordered, of which a part are to assemble at Augusta on Wednesday next. It is reported that the four men captured on Fish river by Mr. Jarvis's detachment as trespassers, have produced permits from the provincial authorities. This I believe is from good authority. If correct, it shows the self constituted guardians of our territory in no very favorable light, and proves that Maine has come of age and assumed the manly toga none too early.

P. S. 5 o'clock, P. M. Since writing the above, Mr. English, who brought sir John Harvey's first letter to you, Fairfield, has passed through town with a communication from sir John to the governor. Report says it contains some proposition in regard to a conventional line. Nous verrons.

The schooner Eleanor Jane arrived at Boston, on Saturday, having left St. Johns, N. B. on the preceding Sunday. The captain informed the Boston Atlas that the whole militia of the province had been ordered out by sir John Harvey.

Part of the 69th regiment, which arrived at Halifax, a few days ago, embarked on the 20th for conveyance to the frontier.

The Nova Scotia Royal Gazette is very belligerent. We copy the following paragraph:—"Nothing can justify this conduct of Maine. Great Britain holds sovereignty over the district which has been invaded, and will as firmly defend it as she would any other part of the empire. Still we are anxious that this boundary story should be brought in a close in some way or other. We would have no unsettled accounts with the United States, for the only friendship they have for us is that which rests on commercial cupidity."

A New Brunswick paper winds up an angry article upon the subject of the border difficulties, with the following remarks upon the course which it will be the duty of Great Britain to pursue in case of any invasion:

"Whenever such an infringement is made, from the moment the commencement of hostilities between the two countries may be dated, and although we cannot pretend to boast with our western neighbors, yet we are greatly mistaken if such a war, brought about by the self-willed and misguided policy of Maine, does not end in leaving the United States with a ruined trade—crippled commerce—mouldering cities—and a FREE, but disinherited and distracted people."

General Scott, accompanied by major Ripley, and captain Anderson and Keyes, reached Boston on Saturday morning on his way to the northeastern frontier. We learn from the Boston Evening Gazette that general S. was introduced to governor

Everett in the council chamber, who addressed him substantially as follows:

GENERAL: I take great pleasure in presenting you to the executive of Massachusetts. I need not say that you are already well known to them by reputation. They are familiar with your fame, as it is recorded on some of the most arduous and honorable fields of the country's struggles. We rejoice in meeting you on this occasion, charged as you are with the most momentous mission, and the result of the United States. We are sure you are entrusted with a duty most grateful to your feelings—that of averting an appeal to arms. We place unlimited reliance on your spirit, energy, and discretion. Should you unhappily fail in your efforts, under the instructions of our president to restore harmony, we know that you go equally prepared for a still more arduous and important duty in the support of the commonwealth of Massachusetts.

The answer of the general was happy and appropriate—he concluded by saying that the executive of the United States had full reliance upon the patriotism and public spirit of Massachusetts, in any emergency which might arise.

The Boston Transcript of Monday evening says:—"Major general Scott and suite left town to-day, at 12 M. for the east. The general expected to receive despatches from Washington, but in consequence of the non-arrival of the mail, concluded to proceed without them."

The following resolutions were reported in the Massachusetts senate. The committee to which governor Everett's message was referred:

Resolved, That the present state of affairs in relation to the northeastern boundary, as communicated to the executive of this commonwealth by the governor of the state of Maine, furnishes a strong reason for again asserting our rights, and for re-affirming the position heretofore assumed by the legislature of this state against the unwarrantable claims of Great Britain, and the adoption of strong and vigorous measures by the government of the United States, for a speedy adjustment of the existing difficulties in such a manner as shall protect Massachusetts and Maine in the possession of the large tract of territory guaranteed to them by the treaty of peace of 1783.

Resolved, That the active measures authorized by the act of the legislature of the state of Maine, passed January 25, 1839, for the prevention of depredations upon the lands of Massachusetts and Maine, were required by the exigencies of the case, and a wise regard for the preservation of their interests in those lands, and were similar in character to the measures adopted by the land agents of Massachusetts and Britain, in October last, and recognized and approved, through their agent, by the government of the province of New Brunswick.

Resolved, That the claim of Great Britain to the exclusive jurisdiction of the whole of the disputed territory, as recently asserted by the governor of Great Britain, and his avowal of a determination to sustain that claim by a military force, and his denial of the right of the state of Maine to protect from the lawless depredations of trespassers, the lands which have long been in the possession of Massachusetts and Maine, government and that territory, has arrived, when the honor of the nation demands the adoption of decisive measures for the protection of her citizens, and for the preservation of the rights and interests of two of the members of our confederacy.

Resolved, That this commonwealth will co-operate with the state of Maine in all constitutional measures for the preservation of the interests of both states in the lands in the disputed territory, and for the speedy adjustment of the existing controversy.

Resolved, That his excellency the governor be requested to transmit a copy of these resolutions to the executive of the United States and of the state of Maine, and to each of our senators and representatives in congress.

It will be seen from the following resolves, that the British claim of exclusive jurisdiction over the disputed territory, is not so novel as some persons have supposed it.

Resolves concerning the northeastern territory of the United States, claimed by Great Britain.

Whereas, a large tract of the northeastern territory of the United States, belonging in common to the states of Maine and Massachusetts, and lying within the limits of the former state, has, for many years past, in consequence of a claim of Great Britain, been surrendered to the exclusive custody of the British government; and whereas, it appears from the report of the committee appointed by the legislature of this commonwealth, to make personal examination of the rights and interests of Massachusetts, that great inconvenience and gross abuses have resulted, from so valuable a portion of our domain being left in the keeping of agents over whom they have no control.

Therefore, resolved, by the senate and house of representatives in general court assembled, That in the interests of Massachusetts, that measures should be taken by the executive of the United States to secure a speedy settlement of this long protracted controversy, so that these States may be reinstated in the enjoyment of that property which was so long in their undisputed possession, and which is so indisputably theirs.

Resolved, That in case there be a prospect of further unavoidable delay in the settlement of this controversy, it is essential to the ends of justice, that measures should be taken by the executive of the United States to obtain representation of the interests and rights of Maine and Massachusetts, in the agency and guardianship of the territory.

Resolved, That his excellency, the governor, is hereby requested to transmit a copy of these resolutions to the executive of the United States, to our senators and representatives in congress, and to the governor of the state of Maine.

In senate, March 1, 1836.

Passed—sent down for concurrence.

HORACE MANN, president.

Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States, That the president of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized to resist any attempt on the part of Great Britain to enforce, by arms, her claim to exclusive jurisdiction over that part of the state and territory of Maine which is in dispute between the United States and Great Britain; and that for that purpose, to employ the naval and military forces of the United States and such portions of the militia as he may deem it advisable to call into service.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the militia when called into the service of the United States by virtue of this act, or of the laws of the United States, shall be called forth to execute the laws of the union, suppress insurrections, repel invasions, and to repel the act now in force for those purposes; may if in the opinion of the president of the United States the public interest require it, be compelled to serve for a term not exceeding six months after the arrival at their place of rendezvous, in any one year, unless sooner discharged.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That, in the event of actual invasion of the territory of the United States by any foreign power, or of imminent danger of such invasion discovered, in his opinion, to exist, before congress can be convened to act upon the subject, the president be, and he hereby is, authorized to call into the service of either of the contingencies provided for in this act, the president of the United States shall be authorized to complete the public armed vessels now authorized by law and to equip, man, and employ, in actual service, all the naval force of the United States; and to build, purchase or charter, arm, equip, and man, such vessels and steamships, as he may deem it necessary and proper to communicate with the United States and Great Britain, as I shall deem necessary to protect the United States from invasion from that quarter.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the sum of ten millions of dollars is hereby appropriated and placed at his disposal for the purpose of executing the provisions of this act; to provide for which the secretary of the treasury is authorized to borrow money of the credit of the United States, and to cause to be issued certificates of stock, signed by the register of the treasury, for the sum to be borrowed, or any part thereof; and the same to be sold upon the best terms that may be offered after public notice for proposals for that purpose. Provided, That no engagement or contract shall be entered into which shall preclude the United States from reimbursing any sum or sums thus borrowed after the expiration of five years from the first of January next; and that the rate of interest shall not exceed five per cent, payable semi-annually.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the sum of one hundred dollars be, and the same is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the treasury or otherwise appropriated, for outfit and salary of a special minister to Great Britain: Provided, The president of the United States shall deem it expedient to appoint a same.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That in the event of either of the contingencies provided for in the first and third sections of this act, the president of the United States shall be authorized to apply a part not exceeding $1,000,000 of the appropriation made in this act, to pairing or arming fortifications along the seaboard frontier.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That whenever militia or volunteers are called into the service of the United States, they shall have the organization of an army of the United States, and shall receive the same pay and allowances.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the several provisions of this act shall be in force until the end of six days after the meeting of the first session of the next congress, and no longer.

LETTER FROM MR. PRICE.

To the editors of the National Intelligencer.

House of representatives, Feb. 28, 1839.

GENTLEMEN: On the 26th instant, after the select committee on the late defalcations had concluded its labors and ordered its report to be made, I received the enclosed letter from Wm. M. Price. I am assured that the letter is genuine, and therefore send it to you for publication. I have no other way of complying with his request to "put his plea" upon "the record."

Respectfully,
HENRY A. WISE.

Paris, February 2, 1839.

SIR: By a letter this day received from Washington, I learn that, on the 27th day of December last, you stated on the floor of congress that you had been informed:

1st. That I had sold a bond given to the United States in the sum of $50,000, for $30,000, in order to get gold for it.

2d. That I had taken with me to Liverpool $100,000 in gold.

And, 3d. That the secretary of the treasury had made inquiry into my accounts, and found a deficit of $240,000.

The first and second items of your informant appear to have been stated as matters of fact. So help me God, sir, some villain has abused you with the most malignant misrepresentations. I never sold a bond given to the United States in the sum of $50,000, or any other sum, for $30,000, or any other amount, in order to get gold for it, or for any other purpose. In either form or substance, the assertion is infamously untrue, "sine aliquo alio testimonio."

Equally untrue is it that I carried with me to Liverpool $100,000 in gold. I never, at any one instant of my life, had in my possession a title part of such amount of gold. I purchased in Wall street, the day preceding my departure, one hundred and fifty pounds sterling in gold; and that was all the gold I purchased, exchanged, procured, or had in my possession at the time of my departure.

As to the third item, to wit, that the secretary of the treasury had made inquiry into my accounts and found a deficit of $240,000, I can only say that he must have done so, then, with his proverbial accuracy. He is not—he could not have been at that time in possession of my credits. Then, how dare sworn accounting officer of the government make me debit side, only of an account the evidence by which he would prove me to be a defaulter.

I have not, of course, my accounts here for examination, but I would be both legally and equitably entitled to allowances which would probably be deducted to me at the treasury.

Of such description I will present to you, from memory, one or two, out of very frequently occurring cases, in the course of what was called the anti-

Mr. Woodbury, during that year, directed me to procure to collection the bonds of New York banks and New York merchants to the amount of several millions of dollars. By the general bankruptcy it could produce, I entreated him not to enforce his orders. At the request of the board of trade of New York, I repaired to Washington to stay the mischief, succeeded in my object, and was instructed to negotiate with the parties. I allude especially to the Dry Dock bank of New York, and the Bank of Brooklyn, whose bonds amounted to more than a million of dollars. As attorney of the United States had repeated interviews with those institutions; he indulgence they asked was granted, and they honorably discharged their indebtedness to the government. I was not a salary officer, and there could have been, in such proceedings, no costs of suit. The secretary holds all like services to be gratuitous, and I presume he means to insist upon injury of the country dissenting from his construction of allowance at the treasury.

I had not, sir, at the time of his statement of my accounts, been three weeks absent from my country, and, yet, within that time, Mr. Woodbury, without that decent notice which the law of every state gives to the most unquestionable absent debtor, upon an ex parte inquiry adjudges me to be a defaulter. Sir, it is untrue. A just allowance of my claims upon the department will entitle me to a balance over and above all amounts received by me from debtors of the government.

Although the several millions of fines transmitted me for collection in the course of the last five years, should make my compensation appear to be immense, still, the law which has allowed such rates of compensation to others must not altered or repealed, secure it to me.

It is mighty easy to charge high crimes, especially from high places, but, before Mr. Woodbury pronounced me, "upon inquiry into my accounts," for five years, to be a defaulter, he should have recollecting his letter addressed to me within the last six months, approving, in almost fulsome terms of approbation, my official conduct during the term of my appointment. He will, I hope, favor you with a perusal of the draught.

If, "upon inquiry," he then understandingly approved my whole course in office, he has been cruelly precipitate in his late conclusion; or, if he paid me the compliment without an examination of my affairs, it is valueless, and he is welcome to it again. If he can so abstract himself from the general confusion of his official concerns as to allow me the credits to which I am justly entitled, I will stand at least wholly absolved from the indebtedness he has charged.

My motives for the resignation of my office and coming hither will, in due season, be deemed unquestionably correct.

I am not here upon departure from any official responsibility. I am here upon matters of great private moment to myself and family, and I will, upon any issue the treasury may tender, absolve myself, in the judgment of every just man, from any wrong done to it.

I claim, sir, from your sense of justice, that while debating upon the postulates above referred to, you will, at least, permit me to put my plea on record.

I am, sir, your most obedient servant,
WILLIAM M. PRICE.

Henry A. Wise, esq.

MESSRS. DUNCAN, STANLY AND SLADE.

We give below the communication from Dr. Duncan, of Ohio, published in the "Globe" of the 19th ult. and read, on the motion of Mr. Prentiss, in the house of representatives on the 21st ult.; with letters from Messrs. Slade and Stanly in reference thereto, published in the Intelligencer. The speeches of Messrs. Prentiss, Mencelee, and others, shall also have a place in our pages as soon as they are ready for the press.

From the Globe.

On the 16th and 17th January last, I made some remarks in the house of representatives on the resolutions to appoint a committee to inquire into the defalcations of Samuel Swartwout, which remarks were soon after published in the Globe, and have since been published in pamphlet form. Mr. Stanly, of North Carolina, followed me in reply. At the commencement of his remarks, he intimated that I was an abolitionist. I promptly pronounced the insinuation a base falsehood, and a foul detraction, whether it dwelt upon the lips of the unprincipled calumniator or floated on the breeze in the corrupt, poisonous, and slanderous federal sheets of the day. My intention at the time was to insult the member. So he understood me. So all who heard me understood me. My meaning was that the member was a base liar and a foul calumniator; and the only reason that he was indirectly thus denounced, was because the rules of the house prohibited me from doing it directly, without laying myself liable to its censure. All this, too, was well understood at the time; and for this intended and well understood insult, I held myself in readiness to give the member any satisfaction which he might have the moral courage to seek. But no disposition to seek redress was manifested within the time I had a right to expect it, or within the time it might be expected from a man who had any regard for his honor or reputation. So I was disposed to let the member go for what I believe him to be, a mean poltroon and a base liar; and which I believe he may at any time, and in any place, be pronounced with impunity.

Some ten or twelve days after making the remarks to which I allude, I saw a communication in the National Intelligencer, occupying the space of four or five columns of that paper, purporting to be "the reply of Mr. Stanly, of North Carolina, to Dr. Duncan." I was surprised to see a reply of such length. I was not present all the time the member was speaking. I was present, as I have stated, when he commenced. I was present when he finished, and his last remark was, "I have detained the house not more than fifteen minutes." I thought he was correct as to the time he occupied the floor—a (short time in which to make a speech occupying four and a half columns of one of the largest newspapers sheets.)

Leave is sometimes asked of the house to write out a speech which there may not be time to make, and the privilege is generally granted. This is a case of the kind, and the house and to the country whose business is permitted to progress. But, in all cases of this kind, leave of the house ought to be obtained, and a notice of the fact ought to accompany the written speech. It is mean and basely dishonest, and it is a falsehood and a fraud practised upon the community, to promulgate a speech purporting to have been delivered on the floor of congress which never was there spoken, on any other conditions than by the leave and with the notice which I have named.

I say that the speech published in the National Intelligencer of the 4th instant, purporting to be "the remarks of Mr. Stanly, in reply to Dr. Duncan," never was delivered in the house of representatives nor any other place, except through the polluted columns of the corrupt, bank bought, servile and degraded sheet, through which it makes its appearance; therefore, its very caption or title contains a base falsehood, and a mean attempt at fraud and imposition upon the public. Its whole body is a tissue of misrepresentations, unmanly insinuations, and low vulgarities, worthy of the man that can be charged with base falsehood and foul detraction with impunity. In order to know that I could not be mistaken as to the time the member occupied in his attempt to reply to me, and to ascertain some other facts, of which I will soon speak, I addressed the following notes to the gentlemen whose names are prefixed, to which I received the subjoined answers:

House of representatives,
February 9, 1839.

SIR: If you were present on the 17th January, 1839, when Mr. Stanly, of North Carolina, replied to some remarks made by me on the resolution to appoint a committee to inquire into the defalcations of Samuel Swartwout, will you have the goodness to state what time Mr. Stanly occupied in making his reply? Whether Mr. Slade, of Vermont, did, or did not, hand him (Stanly) a paper containing my answer to some abolition interrogatories, and whether Mr. Slade did, or did not, point out to Mr. Stanly such passages of said answer as Mr. Stanly exhibited in his reply.

Your attention to this will much oblige your friend,
A. DUNCAN.

Hon. H. L. TURNEY.

House of representatives,
February 9, 1839.

SIR: I have received your note of the 9th of this month, and in answer thereto have the honor to state, that I was in my seat in the house of representatives on the 17th of January last. I heard your speech delivered in the house on that day, on the subject to which you refer, and the reply thereto of the hon. Mr. Stanly of North Carolina, on the same day. I did not tax my recollection with the precise time occupied by Mr. Stanly in making his reply, but my impression is that it did not exceed fifteen or twenty minutes.

In the course of Mr. Stanly's remarks, I understood him to make allusions to a letter which he alleged had been written by you on the subject of abolitionism. He regretted that he had not the letter to read to the house. In a few seconds after this your attention was directed to Mr. Stanly by some gentlemen who sat near me, and who called my attention to the fact, that Mr. Slade was prompting Mr. Stanly, by pointing out to him certain parts of your letter, to be read by him to the house. I have no knowledge how or from whom Mr. Stanly received the letter above referred to.

I am, sir, respectfully yours, &c.

H. L. TURNEY.

Hon. A. Duncan.

House of representatives,
February 9, 1839.

SIR: Were you in the house on the 17th January, 1839, when I made some remarks on the resolution providing for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the defalcations of Samuel Swartwout, or were you present when Mr. Stanly, of North Carolina, replied to me? If so, will you be so good as to state, first, if Mr. Slade of Vermont did, or did not, hand him (Stanly) a paper containing my letter in answer to some abolition interrogatories? Second, state whether Mr. Slade did, or did not, stand by him (Stanly) and prompt or point out such passages of said letter as were exhibited in his reply? Third, will you state what time Stanly occupied in his reply, and whether or not the greater portion of that time was occupied in reading portions of the letter above alluded to?

Your attention to this, will much oblige,
Yours, &c. A. DUNCAN.

Hon. J. A. Blynum.

Washington city, 10th Feb. 1839.

SIR: In reply to your note of the 9th instant, and the questions therein contained, I can only say that I was present, and heard the concluding part of your remarks on the occasion alluded to; after which, I saw Mr. Stanly rise, and heard his reply. I did not see Mr. Slade hand Mr. Stanly the paper containing your letter on the subject of abolition. Mr. Slade has informed me since, however, that he did hand Mr. Stanly such a paper at the time alluded to by you.

While Mr. S. was speaking, I saw Mr. Slade standing by, or behind Mr. Stanly, pointing, as I thought, at different paragraphs in the paper held by Mr. S. As to the last question, I think I heard Mr. Stanly say, in concluding his few remarks, that he had not addressed the house more than fifteen minutes, and I think that about the time he did speak.

With respect,

I have the honor to be,

Your obedient servant,

J. A. BYNUM.

The hon. A. Duncan.

House of representatives,

February 9, 1838.

STR: Were you in the house on the 17th January, when I made some remarks on the resolution providing for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the defalcations of Samuel Swartwout, or were you present during the time that Mr. Stanly replied to me? If so, will you be so good as to state the time, as near as possible, or as well as you can recollect, that he (Stanly) occupied in his reply. Your early answer will much oblige your friend.

A. DUNCAN.

To hon. Ely Moore.

House of representatives,

February 12, 1838.

STR: In reply to the interrogatories contained in your communication of the 9th inst., I will state that I was in the house at the time referred to, and heard the remarks both of Mr. Stanly and yourself. The time occupied by Mr. S. in his reply to you, did not, to the best of my recollection, exceed fifteen minutes.

Very respectfully,

ELY MOORE.

Hon. A. Duncan.

I think I am sustained in the fact which I have asserted, viz: that "the speech of Mr. Stanly, of North Carolina, in reply to Dr. Duncan," &c., was made in the house of representatives, or, if made, must have been made in the short space of "fifteen minutes!" But even all that time was not occupied in making the speech purporting to be the reply to "Dr. Duncan." When I charged upon the member a base falsehood, &c., for making the insinuation which he did, some part of the fifteen minutes was occupied in denying that he had insinuated that I was an abolitionist. Here is where the member showed the white feather. That denial was but a squirming from under the responsibility of answering in an honorable way the charge of being guilty of base falsehood. A part of the balance of these precious fifteen minutes, (and a great part, too,) was occupied in reading garbled extracts from a letter which I wrote in answer to some abolition interrogatories pronounced to me shortly before my re-election. The member first regretted that he had not the letter in his possession; but it was soon furnished. Who furnished it? Mr. Slade, of Vermont. Ah! Mr. Slade, I am happy to meet you on this board of exposition. I have been talking all this time about (to use a vulgar phrase) "the little end of nothing;" a thing that requires the use of a telescope to see it if at any considerable distance; hardly the ninth part of a man; a thing now out of time and out of place; a thing that the Almighty never intended for any other purpose than the use of the hokins, shears, and thimble. But you see, in the talking, and in your shoes. I feel a freedom in talking to you; and, in order to have a full and ample case, I will splice the member from North Carolina to you, and for a short time will consider you one person, or in "cahoot," and in that capacity I will hold myself responsible to you for all I say.

You profess to be an abolitionist; religiously, morally, patriotically, and civilly, a modern abolitionist; even so, I have been told, to unamelgamationism. You furnished the member from North Carolina, did you, with my answer to the abolitionists, from which to read garbled extracts? You stood at his elbow, did you, prompting him, and pointing out suitable passages of my letter, and at the same time make an anti-abolition speech, and attach to my name that of abolitionism? Only think of this! A rank abolition whig from the north in "cahoot" with a rank anti-abolition whig from the south, in exposing the pernicious doctrine contained in a letter which deprecates slavery in the abstract, or, rather, a northern abolition whig making a convenience and a parrot of a southern anti-abolitionist, through which to expose the dangerous tendencies of an expression of hostility to slavery in the abstract, and its effects, without regard to time or place! What base sophistry! What black hypocrisy! What political swindling for base and corrupt party purposes!

Yes, black hypocrisy, take it as you may. I am an abolitionist, why should the member from Vermont lend himself to make me odious to the slaveholding people? Or, if the member from Vermont is sincere in his profession of abolitionism, why is he assenting and prompting an anti-abolitionist to expose opinions of mine, to the prejudice of the principles of his faith? If the member from North Carolina is sincere in his professions of anti-abolitionism, why does he lend himself to be made the tool of an avowed abolitionist? All this unnatural connection is well understood. Abolitionism and whiggery, like twin brothers, walk hand and hand here and every where else. There is not an ism on earth, however degraded, that whiggery will not take by the hand. Here we have the evidence of the submission and acknowledgment into which the member from North Carolina was either kicked or coaxed by party discipline, evidenced by the following letter, by which the member from North Carolina is made publicly to retract a charge which he had made against the member from Vermont, and to declare, publicly, that he (Stanly) believes that the open, avowed, and reckless abolitionist (Slade) "means no harm to the south." But read the letter. Here it is:

TO THE EDITORS.

Washington, Dec. 14, 1838.

MESSES. GALES AND SEATON: In the Intelligence of this morning I find the following report:

"Mr. Slade introduced the following resolution: 'Whereas there exists, and is carried on between the ports in the District of Columbia and other parts of the United States, and under the sanction of the laws thereof, a trade in human beings, whereby thousands of them are annually sold and transported from said District to distant parts of the country, in vessels belonging to citizens of the United States; and whereas such trade involves an outrageous violation of human rights, is a disgrace to the country by whose laws it is sanctioned, and calls for the immediate interposition of legislative authority for its suppression:

"Therefore, to the end that all obstacles to the consideration of this subject may be removed, and a remedy speedily applied, be it enacted, &c."

"Resolved, That so much of the fifth of the resolutions on the subject of slavery, passed by this house on the 11th and 12th of the present month, as relates to 'the removal of slaves from state to state,' and prohibits the action of this house on 'every petition, memorial, resolution, proposition, or paper, touching' the same, be, and henceforth be, rescinded."

After which, it is reported that "Mr. Dawson called for the reading of the resolution; which having been again read, Mr. Stanly said he wished to introduce an amendment. The chair said it was not now in order, that resolution not yet being in the possession of the house."

When Mr. Slade's resolutions were read, and I heard the words "outrageous violation of human rights" and "disgraceful" applied, as I thought, to the slaveholding states, and to North Carolina as one of them, I could not repress the indignation I felt at such language. It was under the influence of this excitement that I wished to "introduce an amendment," when the "chair said it was not now in order."

The amendment I wished to introduce was in the words following:

"Resolved, That said resolution is disrespectful in its language, and outrageously insulting to the representatives of the slaveholding states; that it is calculated to provoke and irritate the members from said states; and that the consideration of said resolution would be an 'outrageous violation' of the respect due to the slaveholding states, and would necessarily tend to weaken the bonds of our union."

"Resolved, That the said resolution is 'disgraceful to the house, and presents it as it evinces a total disregard of the feelings of the representatives of the slaveholding states of this union, and does not deserve to be considered by the house."

But the rules of order, different at different times, prevented me from introducing this amendment, and I erred by the house, as I have been since satisfied that, though the language sounded harshly to the ears of a representative from the south, nothing offensive was intended, and I write this note now that my constituents may be informed what my amendment was; waiting for an hour of leisure, when I will inform them more fully than it was that I did not vote upon the resolutions recently offered by a member from New Hampshire.

I have good reasons for refusing to join in the miserable farce which has been played by the instruments of party in the house of representatives during Tuesday and Wednesday last.

Oblige me by publishing this note.

Very respectfully, yours,

EDWARD STANLY.

Comment on this letter, it would seem, is unnecessary. The resolution of the member from Vermont not only strikes at the root of every interest the southern states have in the institutions of slavery, but it uses the most degrading and abusive language that a foul tongue could express, or a poisoned pen record; and so the member from North Carolina virtually expresses himself; but, either from being whipped into the traces by force of party discipline, or from cowardice unworthy a son of the south, whose heart ought to be in her interests, and her reputation his boast, he is forced to the degrading public acknowledgment that nothing offensive to the south was intended by the member from Vermont! I think, as the people of North Carolina will understand this matter, it is useless for me to expand upon it.

But a word in relation and in justice to myself. A few days prior to the session, several interrogatories were propounded to me on the subject of the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and I, probably on the spur of the occasion, answered them without time for reflection, or opportunity for examination; but I am to say that, on mature examination, I have not one word, contained in that letter, to take back, as it regards slavery in the abstract or abolitionism. When I wrote that letter I felt as I wrote. I wrote as I now feel, and as I hope always to feel on the subject of slavery, in the abstract, and as thousands and hundreds of thousands of the best men the world ever produced, have thought, and now think, both in free and in slave states.

My remarks in that letter were made with reference to slavery in all time, present, past, and future, and without reference to any particular realm, kingdom, empire, or republic, and I now say, that the man who will otherwise express himself to this general view of the subject of slavery in the abstract, is no philanthropist, is no friend to human liberty, and would be unworthy the proud name of an American.

My objections to modern abolitionism are strongly expressed in the same letter. I there deprecate it as disorganizing in its tendencies—in violation of the compact by which the union was brought into existence, and, if persisted in, will endanger its duration. My official course since has been in accordance with the view I then entertained of it. I voted to suspend the rule for the admission of Mr. Atherton's resolutions, for the object and contents of which I refer the reader to the journals of the house of representatives for the present session of congress. A motion for adjournment was then made by Mr. Bell at the early hour of half past one o'clock, P. M., evidently for the purpose of defeating the adoption of the resolutions. I voted against the adjournment; but the member from North Carolina (Mr. Stanly) voted in favor of the adjournment. I voted throughout for the adoption of these resolutions, with the exception of the last division of the last resolution, which goes to prevent the reading, printing and reference of petitions on the subject of abolitionism. This I thought impolitic, and well calculated to multiply petitions and petitioners on this vexed question, because such a disposition never fails to raise the cry of persecution. I also thought that such a disposition of petitions was a violation of the right of petition as secured by the constitution; for, not only to prevent and refuse legislative action upon them, but to prevent and refuse the right of petition.

To recognise the right of petition congress should abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, (which congress does by receiving petitions for that purpose,) and at the same time, and by the same act, refuse them the usual legislative action, is worse than contemptuous mockery of the right to petition.

I hold that the people have a right to petition congress for the redress of every grievance not forbidden by the constitution. I hold that the people are, and of right ought to be, the judges of what they shall petition congress for; and I hold it follows, as a corollary, that congress is bound to give petitions the proper and usual direction, to the end that they may receive that legislative action which the framers of the constitution intended they should, when they secured and inviolate the right of petition. It seems to me that good policy and a sound interpretation of the constitution require that such should be the disposition of all petitions.

I voted for Mr. Atherton's resolutions, because I thought the reserved and constitutional rights of the southern states demanded their adoption. I voted for them because I thought the peace and quiet of the country required it. I voted for them, because, as I have before said, I think the practical operation of the principles of modern abolitionism would be more fatal to the unfortunate African than even slavery itself as it at present exists in the United States; and, therefore, I can consider modern abolitionism to be no other light than as mistaken philanthropy. I voted for their adoption, because I am sure that congress has any such power over the District of Columbia, as to abolish slavery within its limits. But above all, I voted for them, because I think the perpetuity of this Union, and the durtion of our institutions required that they should all be adopted, with the exception of that part of the last resolution which I before excepted.

I say I stood by and sustained these resolutions, voting for them against all the efforts to defeat them by the opposition; but where was the member from North Carolina at this trying moment? I have examined the journals; the name of Edward Stanton is not to be found. Where was he, I ask; when the northern democracy rallied almost to a man to put at rest a question that was shaking the institutions of his state from their centre to their circumference, and endangering the very existence of the union itself? I repeat, where was the member at this responsible crisis? Was he at his post, sustaining the interests of his state, which he said on one occasion not long since, had "grown with his growth! strengthened with his strength!" No, he was not at his post. He was, spaniel-like, skulking from his duty and his post, at the nod of party discipline; but, when backed and prompted by the abolitionist, Stated, he assumed all the pertness of a chieft, hissed on, puppy-like, to do that which a bigger dog had not the courage to attempt.

But to conclude, people of North Carolina, (for my paper may find its way to you,) what do you think of your representative, who has attempted to practise a base fraud and a mean deception upon you, by promulgating a speech among you, purporting to have been delivered by him in the house of representatives, which never was delivered, and which a disgrace—delivered or written—to any man but the member from North Carolina, he has either the moral courage or the talent to deliver? that do you think of your representative, who has patiently stood to be charged with base falsehood and foul detraction with impunity, and who, skulk from the responsibility of resenting such insult, has basely denied that which every word written in that which he is pleased to call his speech, bears evidence, thus adding, I repeat, base falsehood to mean cowardice? What do you think of your representative who has skulked from the support of measures, (I mean Atherton's resolutions,) introduced for the purpose of putting to rest that dangerous question, modern abolitionism, so eminently calculated to disturb the peace and harmony of this union, and to prostrate or shake the institutions of the member's state, whose interests have grown with his growth!! and strengthened with his strength!?"

But, above all, what do you think of your representative, who has permitted himself to be made the tool, the cat's paw, the thing, the automaton, and the puppet, through which an open and avowed abolitionist should make an anti-abolition speech? An anti-abolition speech through your representative! that, too, by an abolitionist! yes, and I believe, an amalgamation abolitionist, too; a man who has spent or evaporated thousands of dollars the floor of congress in efforts to establish principles and laws subversive of your institutions, in violation of your reserved rights as a state, and disuniting, if not destructive, to the union, and so as amalgamation is concerned, or is a part of it, creed, degrading to the American character. Is this the man from whom your representative issues his promptings, papers, and dictations, to fix on the character of an abolitionist! and to execute the horrors, injustice, and dangers of modern abolitionism!"

I conclude by saying, that if the speech in the Intelligencer, which purports to be "the reply of Mr. Bell of North Carolina to Dr. Duncan," had been delivered, and had the member suspended the previous question which he held and which he refused to suspend, this communication would have appeared in the form of a reply, which would have been due to all he really did say; but as it was, I might it due to myself, to those who may read my paper, and to the cause of truth and justice, to state the above expose.

Further this deponent saith not.

A. DUNCAN.

House of representatives,
February 12, 1839.

SIR: In a letter written by me in answer to some interrogatories propounded to me on the subject of abolitionism, by a number of members of the anti-slavery society in the district I have the honor to present, I deprecate slavery in the abstract; and I attempt, to some extent, to describe the effects it has upon the institutions and prospects of those countries and states where it exists. I also, in the letter, deprecate modern abolitionism as dangerous and disorganizing, subversive of the reserved rights of the slave states, and calculated to endanger the union, &c. All in that letter that I said in relation to slavery, was intended to apply to slavery in the abstract; also to apply to slavery and its effects in all time past, present and future. I gave no locations. My objections and descriptions were of the most general character. I see in a speech published in the National Intelligencer, purporting to be a speech made by "Mr. Stanley of North Carolina, in reply to Dr. Duncan, &c." he is made to ask, in substance, if the ruin and desolation, &c. which I describe in the letter above named, applies to your district, &c. You are made to respond, "No; it is a foul libel, a base slander upon my constituents and upon my state." If you made such a remark, I did not hear it, or I would have responded to it at the time. I presume you made it. Now, sir, if you read my letter, you must have seen that my objections to slavery have reference to slavery in the abstract, and applied to slavery, as I have before said, in all time; and my description of its effects had no location. You had no right to suppose that my description of the effects of slavery applied to your state, or your district, where it is well known, it is a matter of history creditable to your state, that slavery exists in its mildest and most unexceptionable form, and if you had read my letter, you would have said no grounds to warrant the remark you are said to have made. If you never read the letter, and know nothing of its contents, only from the base and unmanly manner in which its garbled fragments have been exhibited, you were wholly unjustifiable in your remark. You made the remark under the broad and protective shield of parliamentary privilege. You have not the moral courage to face me, or any other man, and make such a remark, without the protection of such a privilege. It is a shield and privilege under which many a puppy, in man's shape, has taken refuge.

I think your remarks were unwarranted, uncalculated, and unprovoked. And, sir, on my own responsibility, and without claim to privilege, permit me, by way of offset and compromise, to reciprocate the remark by another, which I think better founded in truth—that is, that you are a liar and a scoundrel, and permit me to add, also, that in my opinion, you are better qualified to adorn the gambler's board, the brothel, and the dogery, than the halls of congress.

House of representatives,

SIR: In the remarks which I made in the house of representatives on the 17th January, 1839, on the resolution to appoint a committee to investigate the delinquencies of Samuel Swartwood, I exposed the names of several government defaulters, and the several amounts for which they were in default, and the offices which they held under which the delinquencies occurred. In my exposures I was governed by the official reports and records of the different government departments. Among them I found the name of Robert B. Randolph, acting purser in the navy, reported to be a defaulter to the amount of $25,000, or upwards. Since the publication of the remarks above referred to, I have seen a communication addressed to me through the Alexandria Gazette, (a paper published in the district of Columbia,) signed Robert B. Randolph, denying that he is a public defaulter, as he has vouchers to show, &c.

I hope the statement of Mr. Randolph is true. It will give me great uneasiness, if I have done him injustice. I have not the slightest acquaintance with the delinquencies of Samuel Swartwood, or with the delinquencies of whatever. If I have done him injustice in the exposures I have made, it will give me great pleasure to acknowledge my error in as public a manner as I have made the exposures. Will you have the goodness to inform me, without delay, what the relations of Mr. Randolph are with the government in reference to the delinquencies reported by your department?

Respectfully,

(Signed) A. DUNCAN,

To the fourth auditor.

Treasury department, fourth auditor's office,
February 19, 1839.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this date, inquiring "what the delinquencies of Mr. Robert B. Randolph are with the government, in reference to the delinquencies reported by the treasury department," and to state, in reply, that the account of Mr. Randolph, as acting purser of the frigate Constitution, was settled and closed in this office, in the month of October, 1828; that in February, 1833, he was recharged with items for which he had been erroneously credited in the previous settlement, amounting to $25,229 17; and that by a subsequent allowance for pay and rations to 19th April, 1833, the balance against him was reduced to $25,097 83, in which sum he appears, by the books of this office, still to be indebted to the United States.

I have the honor, sir, to be,

Very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,
A. O. DAYTON.

To the hon. Alex. Duncan,
House of representatives.

House of representatives,
February 19, 1839.

SIR: If you were fourth auditor of the treasury department at the time Robert B. Randolph was purser in the navy, will you have the goodness to state to me whether Mr. Randolph was, or was not, a public defaulter. If he was a defaulter, please state to what amount he so appeared. It is alike due to myself, as it is to Mr. Randolph, that this information should be furnished me. Will you please give it your immediate attention?

I am yours,

With high respect,

A. DUNCAN.

Hon. A. Kendall.

Washington, Feb. 18, 1839.

SIR: I have just received your letter of this date. I was not fourth auditor at the time Robert B. Randolph was an acting purser in the navy, nor did I settle his account for that service; but I settled the account of his predecessor in the purshership, who had died at sea; and in the course of that duty discovered that Mr. Randolph had received a large sum of public money left by the deceased purser on board of his ship, with which he had never been charged, and other property, public and private, for which he did not appear to have accounted. The amount was accordingly charged to him on the books of the fourth auditor, where, I suppose, the charge still stands.

Mr. Randolph denied his indebtedness, alleging that he had paid away the money on account of his predecessor, and taken the vouchers in his name, but could produce no proof which would entitle him to credits in the accounting office. It was the opinion of a court of inquiry, called in his case, that he had applied a portion of the money in the way he alleged, and that he was justly indebted for the balance.

I write from memory and cannot particularize. Very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

AMOS KENDALL.

Hon. A. Duncan.

I have been induced to make the inquiries and exposures here exhibited, in consequence of the following communication,

To the hon. A. Duncan, of Ohio.

In a speech which has been published, said also to have been delivered by you, in the house of representatives, I find that you have classed me among the public defaulters. However much you may be in favor of abolition "in the abstract," I beg that, hereafter, you will not, in making use of my name, abolish the truth. I am no defaulter, as the doctrine you stand up in your place, and, with brazen front, defame honest and honorable men; but you shall not use your "privilege" where I am concerned, without receiving a proper contradiction. You have quite enough to do, to defend the speculations and frauds of your political friends—those who steal millions and use state paper for England, as well as those who steal thousands, and remain at anchor here—without calumniating innocent persons. I therefore recommend to you a little caution in your future harangues.

R. B. RANDOLPH,

late of the United States navy.

Alexandria, January 29, 1839.

It was not from a spirit of resentment I have been induced to notice the above communication. No; I was led to notice it from a disposition to do Mr. Randolph justice and right, if I had done him an injury, although I think most readers will conclude, with me, that Mr. Randolph might have seen abundance of reason in the following extract, to have desisted from the above communication. This extract is taken from the speech to which Mr. Randolph alludes, and was in answer to Mr. Bell, as the extract shows. When I was exposing the delinquency of the Messrs. Erwins, Mr. Bell of Tennessee, rose, and said the Erwins were not defaulters; it was a slander promulgated by the Globe paper; "Mr. Duncan responded, that he did not get the information from the Globe; he obtained it from the records in the archives of the government; evidence of the highest character, and that which is open to the view of every one who desires to read. I hope (said Mr. D.) it is not true. I would prefer to conceal, at all times, human weakness and error, rather than expose, where it may be done without public injury; but I would prefer that such depravity as I am now exposing, did not exist. And let me say, once for all, that I know nothing personally of the numerous and wholesale frauds which I am now exposing. I am alike ignorant of the men whom the records show to be the perpetrators. These frauds, with the names of those who committed them, are matters of record, and the facts are spread over the whole country, and known to all who read the journals of congress, and the reports of the secretary of the treasury. Consequently, my exposition can neither affect the reputation of those whose names I expose, or the cause of justice."

I say the remarks contained in this extract might have well superseded the communication. "But Mr. R. volunteers the following advice: "I therefore recommend to you a little caution in your future harangues." I return my thanks for this advice, and when I want more I will call for it. But Mr. R. is unkind in saying, "It may suit your creed, sir, to stand up in your place, and with brazen front, to defame an honest and honorable man." I say this is an unkind charge—is unkind, if it is intended to fix on me a claim of privilege in consequence of my representative character. I claim no privilege on that ground. I hold myself responsible for all I say, either in my personal or representative character. If, perchance, I am officially compelled to notice men and things in a manner unpleasant, and I am to be held responsible in my individual capacity, all I ask is that he be a gentleman who so holds me. I want him to have clean hands. He must be such an one whose faults have not been such as to stain him out of time and out of place when he is without a gloomy walls of a degrading penitentiary. He must not have the base and degraded character of coward united to his reputation in life and in his memory in death, by having pulled the nose of an old patriot, withered and bleached by the frosts of seventy winters, and worn to the brink of the grave by services to his country.

House of representatives,

MESSRS. EDITORS: I regret that I am compelled to ask the privilege of making an explanation through your columns, which I was denied an opportunity of making in the house this morning. I refer to the refusal of Mr. Petrikin, of Pennsylvania, to withdraw, at my request, his motion to lay on the table the resolution censuring Mr. Duncan, of Ohio, for the purpose of allowing me to place myself right before the house and the country in regard to a matter which had been misrepresented in the debate on that resolution—a refusal which, much to my surprise, was immediately followed by a withdrawal of his motion, to give another member an opportunity to make a speech against the resolution.

The communication of Mr. Duncan to the Globe, which had been made the foundation of the proceeding against him, embraced several letters from members of the house, in reply to his inquiries addressed to them, stating that, on the occasion of Mr. Stanly's reading the letter addressed by Mr. Duncan to certain abolitionists before his election, I was seen "prompting Mr. S. by pointing out to him certain parts of that letter to be read by him to the house."

The effort of Mr. Duncan, in his communication to the Globe, to use this fact to create an impression that there was a conspiracy between Mr. Stanly and myself to use Mr. D.'s letter against him, was followed up by him in his remarks in the course of the debate yesterday, in which he alleged that this prompting, as it has been called, was the result of a preconcert, between Mr. S. and myself. A similar attempt to show a connection between us in this matter was made in an editorial article in the Globe accompanying the publication of Mr. Duncan's account, to which Mr. Stanly's was a reply, in which it was said that I "was seen in close converse" with Mr. Stanly at the time of his reading Mr. Duncan's letter.

The purpose of these coincident attempts to connect Mr. Stanly and myself in this matter, I well understand. It is to excite against him the feelings of his slavholding constituents, upon the assumption that he is secretly plotting with an "abolitionist" to put down the great anti-slavery man, Mr. Duncan, of Ohio. I felt it due, therefore, to Mr. Stanly to explain my agency in regard to the use which was made of Mr. Duncan's letter, and to show that by the insinuation of the Globe and the assertion of Mr. D. were without foundation. This I will now proceed to do.

Mr. Duncan, in his speech to which Mr. Stanly replied, had taken occasion to speak in terms of strong denunciation of abolition and abolitionists. I perceive that, in the report of his speech in the Globe, that part is entirely omitted. I was much surprised at his denunciations, recollecting, as I did, the letter of his to the abolitionists, to which I have alluded in which he indulged in language of most unmeasured denunciation of slavery as it exists in the southern states—language stronger than any that I, though frequently denounced as an incendiary abolitionist, have ever used.

Intending to take the floor upon the general question under discussion after Mr. D. should have finished his speech, and deeming it not inappropriate to confront him in this matter with the letter referred to, I went to my lodgings while he was yet speaking, and drew from my file of Niles' Register the No. containing the letter, with which I returned to the house. When I entered the hall Mr. D. had closed his speech, and Mr. Stanly was on the floor replying to him. I went to my seat, which is near that of Mr. Stanly, with the intention of obtaining the floor when he should have finished, not knowing he had taken it under a pledge to Mr. Petrikin to renew a motion for the previous question made by Mr. P., and which had been withdrawn at the request of Mr. Stanly. Soon after I took my seat, Mr. S. came to that part of his remarks in which he alluded to Mr. Duncan's letter to the abolitionists, and expressed his regret that he had not the letter to read to the house. Upon hearing this, I drew the paper containing Mr. D.'s letter from my pocket, and handed it to Mr. S. pointing out to him the page on which it might be found. After he had read the paragraph in which Mr. D. denounced slavery as it exists in the southern states, I directed his attention to that in which Mr. D. gave an affirmative answer to the question—"are you opposed to the admission of any new state into the federal union whose constitution tolerates slavery?" and that in which he replied to the question with regard to the right of the people to petition for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

This was my whole agency in the matter. I obtained the letter, not for the purpose of furnishing it to Mr. Stanly, but to use it myself. I furnished it to him without any preconcert between us, and, indeed, without any previous knowledge by him that I had it.

I ought to add that, understanding from Mr. Duncan that he deemed it unfair to have a part of his letter read and not the whole, I handed him the paper containing it, that he might use it on some subsequent occasion in the house, for the purpose of reading the remainder. I afterwards asked him if he intended to use the letter in the way I had intimated, to which I understood him to reply that he did not.

This is the explanation which I intended to have made in the house this morning. I intended, also, to have said that I have just seen the Globe issued this morning, in which, under the lead of "Dr. Duncan and his assailants," it is said that "the attempt was made [yesterday] by the friends of Messrs. Stanly, Southgate, and Slade, to revenge the quarrel by a resolution and abusive speeches in the house;" and intended to have added that, wantonly and unjustly as I have been assailed by Mr. Duncan, in his communication to the Globe, I had no "quarrel" with him whatever; that I had not been in the least disturbed by his abuse of me, and that I entertained no feeling of "revenge" towards him or any other human being.

I am, respectfully, yours,

WILLIAM SLADE.

From the Intelligencer of Feb. 27, 1839.

TO THE EDITORS.

Washington, February, 1839.

GENTLEMEN: On the 20th instant, my attention was called to a publication in the Globe, signed A. Duncan, in which I am abused and denounced, in language almost as violent as all the people of the southern states have been by the same individual.

This communication has created no other sensations with me than those of ineffable disgust and humiliation,—disgust, to see such an article paraded before the world, in the official paper, (in the paper supported by executive patronage;) and humiliation, that such a man should be a member of congress. I do not wish the author of this article any other punishment than that the people should read his communication in the Globe of the 19th of February, 1839.

I had not been in the house, on the morning of the 20th instant, more than an hour, before the appended letter, signed by my friend S. S. Prentiss and others, was handed to me. After the receipt of this, several other statements were offered me, and I requested several gentlemen to give me their opinions in regard to the correctness of the report of the speech.

I must ask the favor of you to publish these letters with this note. The letters are from gentlemen who advocate the sub-treasury—from whigs and from conservatives.

Washington, February 20, 1839.
DEAR SIR: Our attention has been called to a publication in the Globe of this day, signed A. Duncan, which denounces the speech as published in the Intelligencer, purporting to be your Reply to Dr. Duncan, delivered by you in the house of representatives, on the 17th of January, 1839, was ever present when you replied to Dr. Duncan, on that day, and heard your remarks through; and feel bound in justice and truth to tender to you our testimony that the said report of your remarks in reply to Dr. Duncan, on the 17th of January, 1839, is, according to our recollection, in which we are confident of more faithful and correct than the reports of speeches in the house of representatives are usually; that it is nearly, if not quite verbatim correct; and, if incorrect in any respect, it is less severe than were your remarks on the floor. We add, also, that your remarks seemed to be extemporaneous; and at the moment you regretted, we are not aware of; Dr. Duncan's letter on the subject of abolition, and it was, we thought, from the expression of this regret that Mr. Slade (of Vermont) openly handed you a copy of that letter, from which you read several extracts.

We beg leave to express to you our individual respect, and esteem, and are, most truly, your friends.

Hon. Edward Stanly, house of reps.

House of representatives, Feb. 21, 1839.

DEAR SIR: I listened very attentively to your speech in reply to Mr. Duncan, on the 17th of January last, and have since that time read the report of it in the National Intelligencer. It strikes me that the speech is reported with the accuracy usual in congress in debates, and especially in those portions of it which personally referred to the member from Ohio. Indeed, in regard to that portion of the printed speech, I had remarked some mitigation of the severity of the phrase used.

If you consider it important that I should give a recollection of the time occupied by you in speaking that occasion, I can say my impression is that you occupied the floor but little short of an hour. You spent some short time before a copy of Mr. Duncan's answer to certain interrogatories respecting abolition could be found in the house; and extracts from them, and collected upon them in the manner in which your remarks appear in your speech.

Truly, yours,

J. P. KENNEDY

Hon. Edward Stanly.

House of representatives, Feb. 20, 1839.

SIR: In answer to your note just handed to me, I state that I heard your speech delivered in the house on the 17th ult. in reply to Mr. Duncan, and have read it in the National Intelligencer, and that it appears to me to be, in substance, correctly reported.

Respectfully, yours,

S. GRANTLAND

Hon. Edward Stanly.

House of representatives, Feb. 21, 1839.

MY DEAR SIR: I was in my seat in the house during the delivery of your speech of the 17th of January, and have endeavored to recall to my first impression, of the length of time you were on the floor, and of the length of time you were from three-quarters of an hour to an hour. As regards the fidelity with which your speech has been reported, I repeat what I have frequently said, that I have never seen a printed speech more true to the oral one than yours, and I am confident to be coincident with that of several other members of our house, who, like myself, had the pleasure of being present when you spoke.

As regards the communication between you and Mr. Slade, I considered it a mere incident, unworthy of particular remark. You, in the course of your speech, when commencing your remarks, had expressed your regret that you did not have it at hand, and Mr. Slade (who happened to be sitting next you) proffer a paper to you, which I presumed was your copy, because you read extracts from it as from a letter. I observed no other communication between you and him; and I may be permitted to add that any thing to your injury, which your constituents can manufacture against you, is such merely incidental circumstances. I shall be much mistaken in their character.

I am, dear sir, very respectfully, yours,

J. JACKSON, of Georgia

The hon. Edward Stanly.

House of representatives, Feb. 21, 1839.

SIR: Your note of yesterday has just been handed me, and, in reply to it, I say that I heard your speech delivered in this house on the 17th ultimo, in answer

Dr. Duncan, of Ohio, and have since read it as published in pamphlet form, and in the National Intelligencer; and, whilst my recollection of particular remarks made in this house is perhaps not as good as those of others, I must say that I do not remember to have delivered, quite so severe as the published remarks, and I think I have rarely seen a speech more faithfully reported, according to my best recollection.

Very respectfully, I am your ob't servant,
G. W. HOPKINS.

Hon. E. Stanly.
I fully concur with my friend and colleague, Mr. Hopkins, in the above statement. I recollect distinctly most of the striking remarks in the published speech.

A. STUART.

Being called upon by Mr. Stanly to say whether I hear his speech in reply to Mr. Duncan, and whether the report of it in the National Intelligencer is correct, I state that I heard the speech, and have read the report of it, and believe the report to be in substance faithfully written out, according to my best recollection.

J. GARLAND.

Washington, February 21, 1839.

Sir: I see a publication in the Globe of the 19th February, 1839, signed A. Duncan, denying that you made the remarks of Mr. Republican in answer to Dr. Duncan, on the appointment of a committee to investigate the defalcations at the custom house in the city of New York. When Mr. Stanly began his speech, I was sitting near the fire-place in the southwestern part of the house, reading some papers, and did not then distinctly hear his remarks; but, after a short time, my attention was attracted by Mr. Stanly stating his intention to comment upon a letter in relation to abolition, which purported to be written by Dr. Duncan. I then left my distant position, and drew near enough to hear Mr. Stanly make his remarks on that letter, which I read, and read in the newspapers. After I took my seat on the right side of the house, the conductor placed in front of the speaker's chair, I heard all the remarks of Mr. Stanly delivered in the continuation of his speech on that occasion. I attended particularly to the passages and extracts which he read from Dr. Duncan's letter, which he held in his hand, and to the comments of Mr. Stanly upon the opinions and sentiments expressed in that letter. When the remarks of Mr. Stanly in answer to Dr. Duncan's speech were published in the National Intelligencer, in the early part of this month, I read them. I believed then, and I believe now, that many of the very words and sentences found in the printed speech were used by Mr. Stanly in his verbal speech in debate; and that the speech published is substantially the same which was delivered in the house of representatives.

Respectfully,
JAMES GRAHAM.

To the hon. Edward Stanly.

Washington, Feb. 21, 1839.

DEAR SIR: By comparing your speech as published with our recollection of it as delivered, in reply to the hon. A. Duncan, of Ohio, on the 17th ult, we feel no hesitation in stating that it has been correctly reported; and by this we do not mean merely to say that the report embodies the thoughts and sentiments conveyed by you while speaking, but preserves throughout, with remarkable fidelity, the very words and phrases in which you uttered them.

Very respectfully,
A. H. SHEPPERD,
EDMUND DEBERRY.

To the hon. E. Stanly.

I did not hear the whole of Mr. Stanly's speech. I heard distinctly, I suppose, two-thirds, perhaps three-fourths of it; and I say that it is, I believe, so far as I am concerned, a correct report in the printed copy as much so, I think, as any other speech I have heard or read.

LEWIS WILLIAMS.

From the distance at which I sat from Mr. Stanly's seat, I could not hear him distinctly, but from what I did hear, I have no hesitation in giving it as my opinion that the speech as reported is correctly given. I have never before heard its correctness questioned.

A. RENCHER.

I have read the foregoing statement of Messrs. Shepperd and Deberry, and fully concur with them in opinion.

JOHN W. CROCKETT.

Sir: You did me the honor to address to me a note, enclosing the rough notes of your speech, in regard to Mr. Duncan's letter on the subject of abolition, taken by me at the time, and from which you afterwards wrote out the speech as published with my report, that I would compare the published speech with the notes, and then say whether it did not correspond with them, and did not follow the track which those notes indicated as having been taken by you when speaking. I have complied with your request, and feel no hesitation in saying that it does. Candor leads me further to say that the speech very fully agrees with my recollection of it, as delivered; that it is much less extended than is usual when members write out their speeches from reporters' notes; and that you have not inserted in the published speech all that was spoken in the house. As to the time occupied in its delivery, if you said, as I think you did, that you had occupied but fifteen minutes, I am persuaded you were unconscious of the lapse of time. My impression is that you spoke, in all, including the reading of extracts from the letter, at least half an hour.

You are at liberty to make what use you please of the above, which a sense of justice induces me to furnish at your request; but I pray, at the same time, that I may not be drawn into the very unpleasant controversy between yourself and Mr. Duncan further than sheer necessity shall demand.

With sincere regard, I am, sir,
Your obedient servant,
ARTHUR J. STANSBURY,
Reporter for the National Intelligencer.

Hon. Mr. Stanly.
The letter published in the Globe of the 19th instant affords much material for comment. Besides the misstatements as to the correctness of the reported speech, others are very apparent. But I cannot deliberately descend to expose this individual, who is already punished more than he can bear. I cannot believe he is in earnest in using such harsh epithets towards me. He no doubt intended to speak of me as he did of slavery, as it exists "in the slave states in our union," merely "in the abstract!" He has presented abolition petitions since he voted on the Atherton resolutions. He is a democratic Van Buren friend of the south, and of course he is willing to let slavery continue in this district and the states—he only wishes to abolish it "in the abstract."

Self-respect, regard for the opinions of my friends, respect for my constituents—all forbid that I should descend to notice the author of such a communication.

I owe an apology to the gentlemen whose respect I possess and a prize, for having noticed this individual at all. I know it was a contest in which I could gain no laurels. But he had been constituted the defender of the administration; the speech-maker, "by authority," of the party; the libeller of southern institutions. He had attended the caucuses, with the democratic Esaus—the exclusive friends of the south—with the monopolizers of all the chivalry in our land; and I availed myself of the opportunity, I submitted to the disagreeable necessity of using the "bodkin and shears" upon him, for the purpose of exposing the southern humbugging chivalry democrats.

When he spoke of "Cressers and Hercules, Assyria, clearing stables, hickory and broom," &c. a friend of mine perceived me writing down what he said, and begged me not to notice him, asking me, "Do you consider him a gentleman?" I instead asked, in return, "Do you consider me a candidate for admission into a lunatic asylum?" And then remarked that I wished to say something in reply to his praises of Tappan; his denial that there were any democratic abolitionists, &c.

In conclusion, let me assure the "deponent" of the Globe, that his malignant vituperation has not produced the slightest feeling of resentment; and wishing him many more pleasant rides with his friend and patron at the white house—wishing him much leisure to practice with the broad sword and the clarinet, I leave him to the judgment of an intelligent community.

EDWARD STANLY.

NORTH-EASTERN BOUNDARY.

In house of representatives, Thursday, Feb. 28.

The following is the report on the boundary question referred to in the Register of last week. The bill which accompanied it will be found on page 16.

The committee on foreign affairs, to which have been referred two messages from the president of the United States, enclosing sundry papers relating to the disturbances upon the Aroostook river, in the state of Maine, report:

That they have examined the papers submitted to them by the house with great care, and will offer such reflections upon them as the limited time for the preparation of this report will admit. The very near approach of the termination of the present congress, and the desire of the committee that as much time as possible should be afforded to the house, for the examination of the bill herewith reported, are considerations of such a powerful nature, that consequential matters, connected with the subject, cannot be investigated. The main points, however, of the controversy, are not numerous, and upon them the opinion of the committee is clear and decided. The position assumed by the president in his message, is correct, and ought to be sustained, by the legislative power of congress.

It is well known that an informal arrangement or understanding has existed, for many years past, between the United States and Great Britain, relating to the territory in dispute between them, and having for its object the avoidance of clashing authorities, calculated to endanger the peace of the two nations. The committee have not time to give a detailed and historical statement of the origin and progress of this arrangement, the examination of which might perhaps elucidate the cause of the strange error into which the British government is represented by its agents in this country to have fallen with respect to its provisions. Suffice it to say that it never appears to have gone further, in its great extent, than to adopt the basis of the "uti possidetis," leaving each party to the continued exercise of the jurisdiction which it had previously maintained in practice. The idea which is occasionally suggested in some of the British documents, that, prior to the peace of 1783, the government of Great Britain was in possession of the whole country, and, therefore, that this constructive possession must be considered as continuing until she is divested of it with her own consent, is one which the United States can never sanction, or even listen to without strong repugnance. It implies that the people of the United States hold their country by a grant from the British crown, and that the treaty of 1783 is a doctrine which was successfully resisted by the ministers of the United States, even when it was advanced by remote implication, prior to the signature of that treaty, by their refusing to treat with the British ministers, until their credentials were changed. At a subsequent period of our history, the same document was advanced in argument; and at that period, also, was, as it must ever be, met with instant contradiction. The people of the United States hold their country by virtue of the declaration of the 4th July, 1776; and the treaty of 1783 did nothing more than arrange the boundary lines between the two nations, independent of each other in fact and in right. So far, therefore, as the claim of Great Britain to the jurisdiction over the unsettled parts of Maine is founded upon the twice exploited theory that she is the rightful sovereign of all that she has not granted away, it cannot be submitted to without sacrifice of honor, which the American nation never will make.

When the discussion became active between the two governments, as to their respective rights to the territory now in dispute, the greater part of it was, and indeed still remains, uninhabited by permanent settlers. Here and there a small settlement could be found, consisting in some cases of a single house, and in others of more than one, placed near each other for the convenience of the inhabitants. The extent of the arrangement between the two governments does not appear, as construed by the American government, to have gone further than the recognition of the jurisdiction of each over the people and land then operated upon by it. If these inhabitants had taken out the titles to their lands from either one government or the other, and were in the habit of resorting to its judicial authority for the preservation of order, then they were to continue so to do until the question of ultimate ownership should be finally decided in some mode satisfactory to both governments. The propriety of this arrangement will not be questioned by the committee. If it left to the British government the jurisdiction over the inhabitants along the military road which leads from Halifax to Quebec, and thereby furnished it with a motive for procrastinating the controversy, inasmuch as it continued in the enjoyment of nearly all that rendered the country valuable as a British possession, it also furnished a strong proof of the desire of the American government to deal fairly and liberally with its antagonist in the argument. Demonstrating, in this conclusive manner, that it was not influenced by a capricious spirit of discontent, the government of the United States derived from this state of the case a right to appeal to the British government to expedite the final adjustment of the controversy, and to claim, in the mean time, the full benefit, on its part, of an arrangement which, perhaps, gave to its adversary more than an equal share of advantages. But the arrangement has been entirely misunderstood or misconstrued if the lieutenant governor of New Brunswick be correct in his exposition of the orders under which he is acting. The United States never did, and never can, consent that the exclusive jurisdiction of the whole territory in dispute shall be consigned to the care of any officer of the British government. The pretension now advanced is as unreasonable in itself as it is unjustified by any agreement between the two governments. Supposing that the parties to the controversy stand upon an equal footing as to their rights, (and there is no ground on which to dispute the maintenance of the territory formerly allotted to the United States) has as much reason to expect that Great Britain will yield to them the exclusive jurisdiction of the whole of the contested territory, together with the care and custody of the timber and other public property, as she has to require from us such an extravagant concession. On the part of the United States, it has never been claimed or asked, as far as the committee are informed; and the true position of the president now is, that he resists the application of a principle which no executive of this country ever adopted as his guide. It has not been asked of Great Britain, nor can it be submitted to from her. What the United States ask from others, they are always willing to grant; nor can they grant what it would be deemed unreasonable to ask.

That portion of the territory in which the recent and present disturbances exist, has been, for a number of years past, subject to the laws of Maine; and, before the separation of Maine from Massachusetts, was under the control of the latter. In December, 1807, Massachusetts conveyed one township, lying on both sides of the Aroostook, and near the meridian line from the source of the St. Croix, according to a selection, survey, and plan made under a resolve passed in March, 1806. In January, 1808, she conveyed ten thousand acres, lying west of the aforesaid township, and on both sides of the Aroostook, pursuant to a survey and plan made under the same resolve. This jurisdiction has been continued, through the medium of land agents, ever since that time; and the settlers, who have been there for a number of years past, (certainly since 1822,) have always, in practice, held their property under grants from Massachusetts and Maine, the part remaining unsettled has been applied to other useful purposes than to use the timber, in which it is very productive; and the state of Massachusetts has been in the practice of granting licenses to her people to cut timber from the public domain. The exercise of jurisdiction was as perfect as the nature of the country would permit. The mere fact of granting licenses to cut timber to certain individuals shows that the preservation of the timber was held to be an object of great consequence, and drew after it the incidental right of refusing to permit the timber to be cut down, whenever it was thought wise to do so; or of taking other measures for its preservation, by driving off trespassers, or punishing them by civil process. This right Maine derived from Massachusetts. Every state government in the union has a right to regulate the landed interest, whether public or private, within its limits, and to assume awards upon the same logic, unless as to such parties of it, it be decided not to be under its jurisdiction by the exercise of the constitutional powers of the federal government. But, as has been already observed, no proceeding or agreement of the federal government can be found which did not recognise an actual jurisdiction, just such as that now claimed and enforced by Maine. Whether the legislature of that state ought or ought not, in courtesy to the federal government, to have invoked its interposition before driving off the trespassers with a strong hand, is a question which the committee deem it unnecessary to examine; because the pretensions advanced by the lieutenant governor of New Brunswick equally include the rights of the United States and Maine to interfere. If the United States have been applied to, and the urgency of the case had rendered a prompt and forcible interposition necessary to remove the lawless trespassers who were equally the enemies of both governments, the same opposition would have been made to such interference by the lieutenant governor of New Brunswick, and the same question arisen as in the present case. The conflicting claims of Great Britain and the United States arose presented in antagonistical position to each other, and the subordinate question as to the manner in which they have thus been brought in direct opposition is not of sufficient importance to require a strict examination. If it were, it might be argued that the conduct of the lieutenant governor of New Brunswick in directing a boom to be placed across the mouth of the Aroostook river, for the purpose of intercepting, seizing, and selling the timber which has been cut, is no sufficient satisfaction to the state of Maine, which may desire to preserve its own timber, whilst it argues such remissness on the part of the British authorities, over their own people, as might well have induced the state of Maine to enforce her own laws. If the committee are right in the view which they have taken of the arrangement between the United States and Great Britain, there is nothing in it to impair, but, on the contrary, every thing to ratify the jurisdiction of Maine over that part of her territory where it had long been familiar, and the interference of the lieutenant governor of New Brunswick is a violation of the existing understanding between the two governments of Maine, the force sent to the coast of the United States, and the trespassers who were depicted upon the public property, appears to have been in the nature of a civil process, in execution of the law of the land. The power of a ministerial officer, such as a sheriff, for example, to compel obedience to the law, and to summon to his aid a sufficient portion of the "power of the country" to subdue opposition, is well known both to American and British jurisprudence, and is sanctioned by early laws in the history of England. The riotous and desperate character of the marauders upon the Aroostook is sufficiently manifested by the fact of their breaking open an arsenal upon the British territory, in order to supply themselves with an additional quantity of arms to enable themselves to resist and repel the party which was approaching, under a civil officer, to require submission to the laws. The proclamation of the lieutenant governor of New Brunswick was issued before any steps were taken by Maine to sustain the civil by the military power, and was directed against the interference of the ministerial officer of the law, acting in strict conformity with what are believed to be fundamental principles of British as well as American law. The first appeal to military force was made by him, and the subsequent proceedings of Maine are defensive merely. The pretension of the lieutenant governor of New Brunswick excludes the civil as well as military power of Maine and the United States from interfering to preserve order in this seat of the ancient jurisdiction of Massachusetts; and would compel the United States and Maine to rely upon the justice, the vigilance, or the generosity of the British authorities for the maintenance of quietude. The proclamation of the laws, in a county where nothing but a naked claim is said to exist upon the part of the British government. It demands of Maine that she should divert herself of a jurisdiction practically established and ascertained, and transfer it to Great Britain. It demands of the United States that an arrangement, alleged to have been made between the two governments, of the existence of which the United States are unconscious, should be summarily carried out, according to the construction which one of the parties is said to have placed upon it, and without giving to the other party an opportunity to contest such construction. It is difficult, in the opinion of the committee, to believe that the government of Great Britain maintains such an interpretation of that arrangement, and thus converts what was intended for the preservation of friendly feelings into a source of great and instant discord. But the assertion of the lieutenant governor of New Brunswick has been twice officially, deliberately, and publicly made, that he is acting under the instructions of his government; a fact of which he and his government can be the only judges. The execution of these orders is incompatible with the honor of the United States. The executive branch of the government has expressed this opinion, and in this opinion the committee fully concur. The sudden execution of these orders may bring on a crisis for which as much preparation ought to be made as the short time remaining of the present session of congress will permit; and the bill which is herewith submitted is intended to accomplish that purpose.

The committee refer with much pleasure to the efforts which have been made by the British minister at Washington, evidenced by the memorandum of a conference between him and the secretary of state, to avert the events which seem to be approaching. If the lieutenant governor of New Brunswick shall desist from any attempt to take or hold military possession of the whole of the disputed territory, it will be easy to restore things to their former condition. If he shall determine to suspend further movements until the decision of the British government be known, it will be for that government to say what shall be the political relations between the United States and Great Britain; whether the friendship which now so happily prevails between the two nations, for the preservation of which the essential interests of both loudly call, shall be suddenly and rudely broken by assuming a principle as a ground of action to which the United States cannot submit.

The committee cannot but entertain the hope that no precipitate counsels on the part of the lieutenant governor of New Brunswick will deprive the government of Great Britain of an opportunity of explaining, before any more serious difficulties shall have occurred, orders which he is believed to have misunderstood. In this event, all immediate difficulties will disappear. The insuperable objection to the military occupation of the disputed territory by Great Britain, requires, in common fairness, that no attempt of the kind should be made by Maine or the United States. Having accomplished her intention of driving off or arresting the trespassers upon the Aroostook, and thus enforcing her laws, Maine will be doubtless satisfied with this vindication of her sovereignty, and withdraw the military force which is now in arms to sustain the civil authority and repel invasion. A contemporaneous cessation of measures by Maine and New Brunswick will compromise the honor of neither; and time will thus be afforded for the British government to select the position which it intends to occupy in the relations between it and the United States. If any motive were necessary to induce Maine to adopt a course so manifestly proper, it would be found in the prompt response of the executive of the United States to the appeal made to it at the present crisis, and the jealous sensibility which has been manifested for the protection of her rights, by spreading over them the ample powers of the federal union.

The committee ought, perhaps, here to close this report. But the anxiety which they feel that no measure should be left unemployed to preserve peace between the United States and Great Britain, by removing, not only temporarily but permanently, the causes of discontent between them, induces them to offer another recommendation to the house. It is, the expression of an opinion by the house, sustained by a legislative provision, that a special embassy should be sent to England, for the purpose of co-operating with the resident minister there, in endeavoring to adjust this long-pending controversy. The precedents for this measure in our history are numerous and encouraging.

The object of such an embassy is, to express a deep conviction on the part of the government of the extreme urgency of the case, and the absolute necessity of adjusting existing difficulties. The ordinary forms of diplomatic agency insufficient to rouse the British government to the danger that the two nations may find themselves involved in war, notwithstanding the desire of the governments of both to avoid it, and the step proposed would manifest to the world, at all events, that the United States are sincerely anxious to exert every means in their power to maintain the most amicable relations with a government and people, so eminently entitled to the respect and regard of every civilized nation on the globe.

The committee are conscious that some of the provisions of the bill herewith reported would more properly have emanated from some of the other committees of the house, upon whose jurisdiction they are reluctant to encroach; but the few days which remain of this session would not have permitted any delay, with a view of referring these subjects to other committees, with the slight hope of obtaining any action on the part of the house. They submit the whole matter, therefore, as the result of their anxious reflections, to the better judgment of the house.

Mr. Howard, from the committee on foreign affairs, to which was referred the president's message of the 27th ult. submitted, on Saturday last, the following report:

The committee on foreign affairs, to which was referred the message of the president of the United States of the 27th February, relating to Mexico, have had the same under consideration, and offer the following report:

In the month of September last, a convention was made between the governments of Mexico and the United States, wherein it was agreed that the claims of a private nature upon Mexico by citizens of the United States should be referred to a board of commissioners, two of whom were to be appointed by Mexico and two by the United States. It was further agreed that, in case of a difference of opinion between the commissioners, the questions should be decided by the king of Prussia, or an arbiter to be selected by him, who should proceed to Washington and reside there until the termination of his functions. The ratifications of this convention were to be exchanged at Washington on or before the 10th of February.

The committee regret to say that the time thus stipulated for the exchange of the ratifications has passed away, without the performance of this concluding obligation on the part of Mexico. There are only two reasons given for the omission. The first is contained in a letter from the Mexican minister to the secretary of state, dated on the 11th February, 1839, in which he says that he had been informed on the 7th of December, by the acting secretary of foreign relations of Mexico, that the despatches relating to the convention had been received, but that Señor Cuevas, the minister in ordinary, was preparing to go to Jalapa for the purpose of treating the affairs of the India, and that the government had been consequently occupied at Jalapa with his affairs, and had not been able to examine the said convention. No reason is assigned for the inactivity of the government prior to the 7th of December, although sufficient time intervened between September and December for the reception and examination of the convention, the ratification of which could scarcely have occupied more than an hour. The reason is altogether insufficient and unsatisfactory.

Another reason which is assigned through the medium of the consul is, that the king of Prussia declined to act as arbiter, as Mexico had been informed by the Prussian charge d'affaires. But as no direct information of this description has reached the United States, the committee think some error must have occurred, as the good understanding between Prussia and the United States would, in all probability, have induced a communication to the United States as well as Mexico, if the arbitration had been declined. It is not a good reason for the omission to ratify the convention, because another power could easily have been substituted in the place of Prussia.

In a note from the Mexican minister to the secretary of state, dated on the 13th of February, 1839, he declares that the approbation expressed by his government with regard to a former minister did not extend to the preparation, publication, and use made by that person of a pamphlet which he printed at Philadelphia, when he supposed, in good faith, that his mission was entirely ended. This disavowal removing the objection which prevented the renewal of diplomatic intercourse with Mexico, has induced the president to order a minister plenipotentiary from the United States to repair to Mexico with all convenient despatch, after the preparation of his instructions, which cannot be drawn up until a satisfactory explanation (daily expected) shall be given of the causes which prevented the ratification of the convention. In the mean time, congress is about to close its session, and the committee cannot, with any probability of having it discussed, offer to the house any mode in which it may exercise its legislative powers. They have thrown their opinion into the form of resolutions, which are herewith submitted.

Resolved, That the house of representatives of the United States view the existing condition of the political relations between the United States and Mexico with great dissatisfaction, the earlier causes of which are now increased by the omission of the Mexican government to ratify the convention concluded between the agents of the two powers in September last, without assigning any sufficient reason for such omission.

Resolved, That the unreasonableness procrastination which has attended every step on the part of Mexico in the progress of the negotiations between the two governments, for many years past, justifies a hope that the minister who is about to be sent to that country by the president will press for a speedy and definite settlement of the demands which have been so repeatedly, but ineffectually, made upon Mexico by the government of the United States.

Resolved, That this house will impatiently expect the result of this mission; and, if it shall prove unavailing, will sustain the executive branch of the government in any ulterior measures which may become necessary.

THE SENATE AND THE POSTMASTER GENERAL.

From the Globe of Saturday night.

It is due to the postmaster general that the whole facts connected with Friday's proceedings in the senate, should be laid before the public.

On the 12th of February, Mr. Tallmadge submitted the following resolution, which was adopted, viz :

Resolved, That the postmaster general communicate to the senate the number of removals of deputy postmasters since the 4th day of March, 1837; the names of the persons so removed, and the times when removed; the names of the persons appointed to fill the vacancies; the names of the offices where such removals have been made, classifying the whole by states and territories.

This resolution was received at the post office department on the 13th. As it did not appear to look to any action of the senate, legislative or executive, it was not considered necessary to interrupt the ordinary business of the department, for the purpose of hastening a reply, as the object, it was presumed, would be accomplished if it was sent before the close of the session. The statement was, therefore, made out as other business permitted, with intent to send it up as soon as it should be prepared. This, of itself, was no light job, as the names had to be extracted from about 1570 pages of the postmaster general's journal, composed of large manuscript volumes.

On the 27th of February, Mr. Tallmadge offered the following resolution, which was adopted, viz :

"Whereas, the senate, on the 12th day of February instant, passed a resolution as follows :

Resolved, T. at the postmaster general communicate to the senate the number of removals of deputy postmasters, since the 4th day of March, 1837; the names of the persons so removed, and the times when removed; the names of the persons appointed to fill the vacancies; the names of the offices where such removals have been made, classifying the whole by states and territories: and, whereas, no answer has been received to the same, therefore,

Resolved, That the postmaster general inform the senate, without delay, what he has not communicated the information required by said resolution."

This was immediately sent to the post office department. At the moment of its reception the postmaster general's reply to the resolution of the 12th, with the statement called for, was in the hands of his messenger for conveyance to the capitol, and the messenger was detained until a reply to the last resolution could be prepared. The replies to the two resolutions, therefore, went up together, and were as follows :

"Post office department, Feb. 27, 1839.

SIR: In compliance with the resolution of the senate, adopted on the 12th instant, I have the honor to transmit a statement showing the number of removals of postmasters since the 4th day of March, 1837, the names of the persons so removed, the time of removal, the names of the persons appointed to fill the vacancies, and the names of the offices where such removals have been made, classified by states and territories.

Very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

AMOS KENDALL.

"Hon. R. M. Johnson,
"Vice president and president of the senate."

"Post office department, Feb. 27, 1839.

SIR: Just as my messenger was about to start for the capitol with several communications, including my reply to the resolution of the senate adopted on the 12th inst., I received their resolution of this day, asking why the information then asked for has not been communicated.

In reply, I have the honor to state, that the only reason I have to give why it has not been before communicated is, that it was not ready.

Very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

AMOS KENDALL.

"Hon. R. M. Johnson,
"Vice president and president of the senate."

To do justice to the postmaster general, these papers should be taken together. But it so happened that, although sent up on the 27th February, they were not read until the 1st March, and then the last was read first. Had the other been read first, it cannot be doubted that the impressions of most of the senators would have been different. With an imperfect view of the case, they, however, proceeded to pass the following resolutions :

Resolved, That the letter of the postmaster general, as president of the senate, stating that the only reason why he had not sent an answer to a previous resolution, was because it was not ready, is considered by the senate as disrespectful to this body.

Resolved, That said letter with the resolution to which it purports to be an answer, be laid before the president of the United States for such action as he may deem proper.

These were immediately forwarded to the president, who, in a short time sent in a message, with the following letter of the postmaster general, viz :

"Post office department, March 1, 1839.

SIR: In reference to the resolution of the senate, adopted this day, and by you just communicated to me, expressing the opinion that a communication made by me on the 27th ultimo, in reply to their resolution of the same date, was disrespectful to that body, I have only to say, that no disrespect was intended or felt. Their resolution of the 12th ult. called for the names of removed postmasters, designated no specific time within which the information would be wanted; and as it did not appear to look to any immediate legislative or executive action on their part, the necessity of great expedition in preparing and communicating them, to the delay of other pressing matters, was not appreciated by me so highly as it appears to have been by the senate, or as perhaps it ought to have been. As to the reply to the resolution of the 12th, was already in the hands of the messenger, and would accompany the reply to that of the 27th, showing that no disposition existed to withhold the information called for, it did not occur to me that any detailed explanation why it had not been sooner sent, was necessary or would be expected. Hence it will be perceived, that the letter complained of, was written hastily, (the messenger having been in fact detained until it could be written and recorded,) and but for the hurry of the moment, not allowing time for consideration, I should probably have given the more full explanation contained in this letter.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
AMOS KENDALL.

"To the president."
With this explanation the senate appeared to be satisfied.

It is possible that the postmaster general's reply to Mr. Tallmadge's resolution of the 27th, may have been more brief than it otherwise would have been in consequence of the tone of that resolution, which appeared to many to be quite as susceptible of an offensive construction as the reply.

TWENTY-FIFTH CONGRESS.

THIRD SESSION—SENATE.

February 27. In addition to the proceedings inserted on page 12, we give the following :

Mr. McKean presented a memorial from the Philadelphia board of trade, asking an appropriation for the erection of a light house on Brandywine shoals.

Mr. Benton presented a memorial from numerous citizens of Louisiana, asking a repeal of the naturalization law, and to prevent the increasing influx of foreigners.

Resolutions were introduced giving to the messengers, pages, and persons connected with the capitol, (such as the watchmen, doorkeepers, &c.) a certain sum in addition to their salaries.

Mr. Benton, from the committee on military affairs, reported the bill from the house to provide for the protection and defence of the western frontier.

Mr. Robbins introduced a resolution calling on the mayor and city councils of Washington to prepare a plan for an institute under the bequest of Mr. Southton, of London.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. Tallmadge, was taken up.

This resolution called for a statement of deputy postmasters dismissed since May last, and asked at the same time for the reasons why the resolution of the same nature which had before passed the senate had not been answered.

Mr. Tallmadge said he had offered, about two weeks since, the first part of the resolution that had just been read; it had passed the senate at once, and, although that time had elapsed, there had been no return made from the department. The information sought for, any competent clerk could prepare in the course of a day. If the statements were to be furnished, it was desirable that they should be forthcoming with as little delay as possible, and if they were not, Mr. T. desired to have the reasons why.

Mr. Niles was not heard in the first part of his remarks, but was understood to say that the postmaster general was not afraid or ashamed to show to the whole world what he did in the discharge of his duties. He did not think the resolution treated that officer with proper respect. Asking the reasons why he had not furnished information, implied censure on the conduct of the head of the department, which he was by no means prepared to admit.

Mr. Tallmadge was not aware that the resolution was expressive of censure; there might be good and sufficient reasons why the response had not been made, among which could be instanced press of other business, &c. He thought, however, that the postmaster general, in justice to himself, should state the causes why it had not been furnished. Mr. T. was desirous to have the information, and as there were now only two or three days to the close of the session, it must be manifest to every senator that if it were not sent at once it would be too late.

Mr. Wright did not know, but there appeared to him, to say the least of it, that there was something novel in such a proceeding.

Mr. Preston said there did indeed appear something novel in the matter. Here was a piece of plain information asked for, that any clerk, ay, any clerk in the department might furnish in a third of a day, and yet weeks had been suffered to elapse without its being sent. He must confess that this looked like an act of contumacy on the part of the officer. When a resolution was presented, and the senate adopted that resolution, it became the property of the body; and he thought it necessary that a proper sense of its own dignity should be preserved. The thing asked for was entirely unobjectionable in itself, and he hoped it might be passed without further delay.

Mr. Norvell said that the sense of the senate had already been expressed by the passage of that resolution, some days since. He did not see the necessity of again acting on it, and he should therefore move its indefinite postponement.

Mr. Tallmadge expressed a hope that the resolution would not be postponed. More than fifteen days ago, he had asked for the information, and the senate had sanctioned the call. There was no trouble or investigation necessary; it was merely to take from the records of the office a plain statement of facts, which any one clerk might collate and prepare at once. His political life was short, and he desired to have the answer before his close.

Mr. Foster said it was with difficulty he could restrain his feelings on such an occasion. Here a plain call had been made on a department by the senate, and after sufficient time had elapsed to answer it, none had been received; and when an honorable senator sought for the reasons, there appeared a disposition to withhold the resolution.

Mr. Norvell withdrew his motion, affirming there was no disposition on the part of the senate to have the information withheld.

Mr. Benton said, in the first of the session, he had offered a resolution, calling on the secretary of the treasury for information in relation to the fishing bounties, which resolution had been amended at the suggestion of a senator from Massachusetts, and yet that information had not reached the senate. He had never thought of calling by resolution for an answer why its provisions had not been complied with; he knew too well the numerous calls made on the departments of the government, which were, on an average, six times more than could be answered within any reasonable period. He mentioned this merely to show what had been his own rule of conduct in such matters.

Mr. Tallmadge insisted that the delay in sending the information called for from the post office department could not be owing to the want of clerks or time, for to make out the whole information required would not occupy one of the clerks more than a single day. Since the late elections in New York there had been removals of postmasters throughout the state; and Mr. T. having been requested to ascertain at the department the reasons for some of these removals, on his application there, he had been promptly refused the privilege and opportunity of seeing the papers. Gentlemen on the other side had gone to the furthest point in vindicating and recommending the interference of office holders in elections; but that interference must be on the right side, or even their casting their votes would not be tolerated. The report of the senator from New Jersey on this subject said a great deal of the horrors of an electoral inquisition, that should prevent interference in elections. But what inquisition could be greater or more detestable than this, where the master inquisitor sat at the head of the whole machinery, and instantly struck off the heads of all those who would not obey his will in the exercise of their political functions? These persons in New York were removed the very moment the elections were over, and most palpably removed, because they exercised the privilege of voting against a member of the other house, who had most evidently himself gone against the will of his constituents. And when Mr. T. who was equally a representative of the state, asked to look for the reasons of the removals, he was told that he could not see the papers. He wished the country to know this, and to know, also, that while some of the friends of the administration were devoutly contending that office holders had a right to interfere in elections to any and every extent, others on the same side were instantly punishing in the severest manner the simple casting of a vote in opposition to their wishes.

Mr. T. had formerly moved a resolution calling on the postmaster general, not for his reasons for removals, but for a simple statement of facts; and now fifteen days had passed without an answer, and no reason even had been assigned for the delay. And now, when Mr. T. offered a resolution asking him for the reasons of this delay, it was gravely objected to. Mr. T. wished the country to know also that this grand inquisitor would not only at will strike off the heads of his refractory officers, and proudly sit without ever assigning a reason; but when called upon by the competent authority to say at least why he would not assign to them his reasons, and when he refused or neglected to do even this, there were enough here ready to spring up and screen him from all question whatever.

Mr. Niles argued at considerable length that these office holders who were removed had not been honest as politicians, and that there was no better cause for removing a public officer than his political dishonesty.

Mr. Bayard said, as the principal objection to the resolution was that it might be looked upon as casting censure on the postmaster general for delay, he would suggest the propriety of striking the words "without delay" from the resolution.

Mr. Benton moved, as a test of the sense of the senate on this subject, that the resolution be laid on the table; which motion was negatived by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Clay, of Alabama, Clayton, Hubbard, Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Wall, Williams, of Mississippi, Wright, Young—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Foster, King, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Nicholas, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Smith, of Indiana, Swift, Tallmadge, Walker, White—21.

Mr. Calhoun said, when there was a call on a department, it was right there should be an answer, and it was equally clear, when an answer was not given, that it was right to know the reason why. This government was a government of responsibility; it had, besides, justice to the country and to the officers themselves required that their conduct in office, and the reasons for it, should be known. On this ground, Mr. C. would vote in favor of the resolution.

Mr. Sevier said he had voted to lay it on the table only on account of the protracted debate. He should now vote for the resolution.

The resolution was then agreed to by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Foster, Fulton, King, Knight, Linn, Lyon, McKean, Merrick, Nicholas, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Robbins, Sevier, Smith, of Indiana, Swift, Tallmadge, Walker, White, Williams, of Mississippi—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Hubbard, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Smith, of Connecticut, Wall, Wright, Young—15.

The senate again took up the bill to prevent the interference of officers and agents of the United States government in elections.

Mr. Crittenden spoke at large in favor of the bill, and especially in opposition to the doctrines of the report on this subject from the judiciary committee, adducing documentary proof, at Boston, that office holders had been largely "doomed" to pay a pro rata tax for the purposes of elections.

Mr. Wall spoke largely in vindication of his report, declaring that its doctrines had not even been assailed, because they had been misunderstood and misrepresented, and that all the descriptions of them made by their opponents in the senate were quite imaginary.

Mr. Niles spoke long and strongly in vindication of the practice of levying a tax on office holders, to be used in elections, declaring it to be quite as justifiable as for any private citizen to use money for that purpose. He spoke also in reply on various points to Mr. Crittenden and Mr. Rivers.

A discussion followed, chiefly politico-personal, by Messrs. Crittenden, Wall, and Niles. Mr. Crittenden now offered his substitute which he had at first proposed for the original bill, omitting the fine, and restricting the penalty to a mere disability for office under the government, confining himself to the words of Mr. Jefferson, and declaring that he preferred the substitute, but, if that should be rejected, he would vote for the original bill.

This substitute was lost by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Foster, Knight, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, Rivers, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith, of Indiana, Swift, Tallmadge, White—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Clay, of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Walker, White, Williams, of Maine, Williams, of Mississippi, Wright, Young—25.

Mr. Tallmadge offered a substitute precisely like the substitute of Mr. Crittenden, except that the punishment of dismission from office was to be inflicted only on those who should in any way, either directly or indirectly, pay or advance any money for purposes of elections.

Mr. Norvell suggested that banks should be embraced by the substitute, as well as office holders.

Mr. Tallmadge was perfectly willing; he had not the smallest objection to the dismission of banks from office the moment that they should contribute money for electioneering purposes.

This substitute was rejected by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Crittenden, Davis, Foster, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, Rivers, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith, of Indiana, Swift, Tallmadge, White—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Clay, of Alabama, Clayton, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Walker, Wall, Williams, of Maine, Williams, of Mississippi, Wright, Young—26.

The question now recurring on the original bill,

Mr. Smith, of Indiana, said: As the vote on the bill is about to be taken, I must detain the senate a few moments, while, in a very brief manner, I explain the vote which I am about to give.

I would contented myself with a silent vote, were it not that my vote may be misunderstood. Mr. President, I shall vote against this bill. This vote, unexplained, might imply a sanction of the doctrines of the report of the committee. I cannot for a moment suffer, ever by implication, such an inference to be drawn from a silent vote.

The report, in my opinion, clearly justifies the interference of federal officers with elections; nay, more, stimulates them to active exertions in the political conflicts of the day. Sir, this doctrine I wholly repudiate. I concur entirely in the doctrines of Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Clinton, and general Jackson, on this subject; in a word, that "the patronage of the federal government ought not to be brought into conflict with the freedom of elections."

I fully and entirely concur in the sentiments that pervade the whole of the document on this subject written by these distinguished men, that the federal officers should not use the powers vested in them, or the influence of their official stations, to prevent a free and unrestrained exercise of the elective franchise on the part of the people.

I have voted for the different amendments which have been offered to the bill, because they recognized the principles which I have stated, because they severally condemned so much of the doctrines of the report as I have referred to, and because I was willing and desirous to express my utter condemnation of those doctrines.

The amendments have been in succession rejected, and the question now arises, whether the bill before the senate should command my vote. I have already said, sir, that I cannot vote for the bill. It may be asked, as I have already said, why I do not propose a remedy? It was principally to answer that question that I arose.

Sir, I admit the evil. I do not concur with the committee that no such evil exists. The proof is to the contrary. The fact is otherwise. I have little doubt but that it is expected, in the party operations of the times, that those who participate in the favors of the government shall use their exertions to perpetuate the official existence of the party in power; and so far as their rights can be exercised in their votes fairly and independently, I cannot object. But when such exertions proceed to that point where they bring into conflict with the freedom of elections the patronage, power, and influence of official station, I repudiate, I condemn it. The same may be said of the press; it is a still more powerful weapon in the hands of the executive in the perpetuity of his official existence, than even the office holders with all their influence. The press, sir, in many cases, pensioned. It is not free. It is all over the country fed by the patronage of the government, to the amount of thousands upon thousands annually.

It is from a press thus circumstanced, that many of the people receive their political doctrines, as well as the character and conduct of their public servants. It is to such a source that many look for the truth. The press is licentious; the federal officers bring the patronage of the government into conflict with the freedom of elections. Admit all this; repudiate, condemn, and censure as we may, still the question arises, are not these things the necessary consequences growing out of our free institutions? May we not, in other words, say that this is only the effluence of freedom? Who would place a legal censorship over the press because it is licentious? Sir, I have ever contended for the most unlimited freedom of speech and of the press, leaving reason free to combat error of opinion in the one case, and the good sense of a free people to evicerate truth from falsehood, orthodox from heterodox doctrines, in the other. I may abridge those great principles that lie at the bottom of our free institutions, by regulating or punishing this licentiousness by law. I would rather bear the evils of which we complain, than fly to a remedy that may prove worse than the disease, even if we had the constitutional power to pass it, of which, candor compels me to say, I have great doubt. I have listened most attentively to the whole argument, and I should have given a silent vote, would it have explained itself. I duly appreciate the motives of those of my political friends who support this bill; I am satisfied that they have been actuated by the best motives, but I cannot go with them. I believe the remedy they propose is inefficient as well as inexpedient, to say nothing of constitutional objections. If a remedy for the evil could be enacted, it should include the press which receives the patronage of the general government, and from the licentiousness of which we have even more to fear than from the interference of the federal officers. It should also reduce the salaries and perquisites of the federal officers to the standard of the state officers. Let this be done, and you will disperse the crowds of hungry applicants for federal appointments, you will remove the powerful stimulus that gives impetus to the army of office-holders and office-seekers, and you will purify the elective franchise. But while your federal officers receive salaries greatly disproportioned to the salaries of the state officers, how can you anticipate any other result than that the office-holders will hold on by every means in their possession, and the office-seekers do all in their power to recommend themselves to the appointing power? And as the doctrines are maintained that to the victors belong the spoils, and as victory is to be obtained in this government only at the ballot boxes, I know little of the human mind who does not see that the vigor of the man and the energies of the office-holders and office-seekers will be in proportion to the value of the spoils. Diminish that value, and in the same ratio you remove the evil complained of; increase it, and a corresponding result may be expected. I have no doubt but that there are honorable exceptions to the principle I have just stated. I speak of the principle without reference to any party or persons. But, sir, I cannot concur in the opinion that any legal remedy can be found to meet the evil contemplated by this bill. The remedy must be left to public opinion, and the executive action as proposed by Mr. Jefferson, by holding a wholesome restraint over the conduct of the federal officers. I would have been pleased to have said more on this subject; but as I rose merely to explain a vote, I will not depart from that purpose. I am now ready, Mr. President, to vote against the bill, as my vote will be understood in the light in which I wish it to be.

Mr. Rives moved to recommit the bill to the committee on the judiciary, with instructions to report to the senate, by bill or otherwise, in conformity with the principles of certain resolutions heretofore laid on the table by Mr. Rives, which resolutions were based mainly on the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions of 1798 and 1799.

This motion was negatived by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Crittenden, Davis, Foster, Knight, Merrick, Penick, Preston, Rives, Ruggles, Smith, of Indiana, Swift, Tallmadge, White—13.
NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Cutbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Walker, Wall, Williams, of Maine, Williams, of Miss., Wright, Young—25.

The original bill, on the question of its engrossment, was now rejected by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Crittenden, Foster, Merrick, Preston, White—5.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Cutbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Smith, of Indiana, Walker, Wall, Williams, of Maine, Williams, of Miss., Wright, Young—25.

A message was received from the president of the United States, transmitting a copy of a memorandum signed by the secretary of state of the United States and her Britannic majesty's minister plenipotentiary, of the terms upon which collision on the northeastern frontier can be avoided; which, after some remarks from Messrs. Williams, of Maine, Preston, Davis, Ruggles, Webster, Brown, Walker, and Calhoun, was referred to the committee on foreign relations. And the senate adjourned.

February 28. The President submitted a communication from the secretary of war, in compliance with a resolution of the senate of the 12th inst. in relation to the mode of furnishing supplies for the Indian department, which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the secretary of war, transmitting a communication from the commissioner on Indian affairs relative to the number and description of persons employed as agents by the Indian office; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the treasury department, in answer to a resolution of the senate of the 21st instant; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the secretary of the treasury in relation to the operations of the branch mints; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the secretary of the treasury, transmitting a letter from the register and receiver at St. Stephens, Alabama; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Williams, of Mississippi, presented the joint resolutions of the legislature of Mississippi on the subject of certain mail routes; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Several committees were discharged from the consideration of memorials, &c. which had been referred to them.

Mr. Denton, from the committee on military affairs, to which was referred various memorials from officers of the line of the army, praying equalization of pay with the officers of the staff, made a report thereon, that the request of the petitioners was reasonable and ought to be granted, but that the present was not a favorable time to accomplish the object; the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. Webster, from the committee on Indian affairs, to which was referred the petition of a number of half breeds of the Sac and Fox Indians, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. S. from the same committee, to which was referred an act for the relief of the Brotherton Indians, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. Buchanan, from the committee on foreign relations, to which was referred the president's message, and accompanying documents, in relation to the existing difficulties on the northeastern frontier, made a report thereon, which was read, as follows:

The committee on foreign relations, to which was referred the messages of the president of the United States of the 26th and 27th instants, and the accompanying documents, in relation to the existing difficulties on the northeastern frontier of the United States, report the following resolutions, and recommend their adoption by the senate:

Resolved, That the senate can discover no trace, throughout the long correspondence which has been published, of one or the other party, Great Britain and the United States, of any understanding, express or implied, much less of any "explicit agreement," such as is now alleged, that the territory in dispute between them on the northeastern boundary of the latter shall be placed and remain under the exclusive jurisdiction of her Britannic majesty's government until the terms of a peace shall be ascertained. It appears that there was, and is, a clear subsisting understanding between the parties, under which they have both acted, that, until this question shall be finally determined, each of them shall refrain from the exercise of jurisdiction over any portion of the disputed territory, except such parts of it as may have been in the actual possession of one or the other party.

Resolved, That, whilst the United States are bound in good faith to comply with this understanding, during the pendency of negotiations, the senate cannot perceive that the state of Maine has violated the spirit of it by merely sending, under the authority of the legislature, her land agent, with a sufficient force, into the territory in dispute, for the purpose of expelling lawless trespassers engaged in impairing its value by cutting down the timber; both parties having a common right, and being bound by a common duty, to expel such intruders from a territory to which each claims the taking care, however, to retire within their acknowledged limits when this single object shall have been accomplished.

Resolved, That, should her Britannic majesty's government, in violation of the clear understanding between the parties, persist in carrying its avowed determination into execution, and attempt, by military force, to assume exclusive jurisdiction over the disputed territory, and to exercise, by force, what is rightfully belongs to the state of Maine, the exigency, in the opinion of the senate, will then have occurred, rendering it the imperative duty of the president, under the constitution and the laws, to call forth the militia, and employ the military force of the United States, for the purpose of repelling such an invasion. And, in this event, the senate will cordially co-operate with and sustain the president in defending the rights of the country.

Resolved, That, should the British authorities refrain from attempting a military occupation of the territory in dispute, and from enforcing their claim to exclusive jurisdiction over it by arms, then, in the opinion of the senate, it would be the duty of the president to pursue a course of similar forbearance. And should she refuse to do so, and determine to settle the controversy for herself by force, the adjustment of which is entrusted under the constitution to the federal government, in such an event there will be no obligation imposed on that government to sustain her by military aid.

The report was ordered to be printed, and made the special order for to-morrow.

Mr. Wall, from the committee on the library, reported a joint resolution for the distribution of the Madison papers; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. Walker, from the committee on the public lands, to which was referred an act granting to the territory of Iowa a quantity of land for the erection of public buildings, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. W. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the joint resolution for the relief of Edward Beatty, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. Webster submitted a resolution for the distribution of certain books; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. Clay of Alabama, submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the secretary of war be instructed to report to the senate, at the commencement of the session in December next, or as soon thereafter as may be, what measures have been taken since the last report of Messrs. Crawford and Balch, in settling the claims of the purchasers of reservations growing out of the treaty of 1825, and particularly what further action has been taken, or may hereafter be taken, in the settlement of J. C. Watson and Co. as conditionally ratified by the late president of the United States, and upon the assents of the individual reserves to that contract, purporting to have been taken by captain John Page, what charges have been made impeding those assents, together with the evidence thereon. Also copies of all correspondence on the subject of referring said contract to the examination of a commissioner or commissioners, with the instructions given to said commissioner, and his decision thereon, as to the legality of said contract under the treaty, and the validity of the assents so taken, particularly whether any assents purporting to be signed by the individual reserves, and that the jurisdiction of the reserves whose lands are included in the Watson contracts, and who are marked on the register of the certifying agents as being dead; and also a list of those Indians entitled to reservations who died and were killed in the Florida war, and of those who died on the route from Alabama to their destination west of the Mississippi, as appears from the report of the officers in charge of the different emigrating parties.

Resolved, further, That the secretary of war be instructed to issue no patent in confirmation of the Watson contract, nor to make any final decision adverse to private claimants, and in favor of said contract, until the same required in the preceding resolution shall be submitted to the examination of the senate.

On motion by Mr. Wright, the senate took up the bill making appropriations for the support of the army for the year 1839. After some amendments had been made, Mr. Webster offered an amendment appropriating the sum of $272,000 in payment for the services of the Massachusetts militia during the last war with Great Britain.

After a short discussion, in which Messrs. Wright, Webster and Davis took part, the amendment was rejected—yeas 17, nays 18.

After the adoption of several amendments, the bill was reported to the senate, and Mr. Davis renewed the motion of Mr. Webster, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 19, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Knight, Linn, Merrick, Norvell, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith, of Va., Swift, Tallmadge, Webster, White, and Williams of Me.—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Cutbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Roane, Smith of Connecticut, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—16. So the amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were then ordered to be engrossed.

A number of private bills from the house, were taken up, read a third time, and passed.

The senate then adjourned.

March 1. After the passage of several bills, the chair submitted the following communication from the postmaster general, which was read, and is as follows:

Post office department, Feb. 27, 1839.

Sir: Just as my messenger was about to start for the capital with several communications, including my reply to the resolution of the senate, adopted on the 12th inst., I received their resolution of this day, asking you the information then called for has not been communicated.

In reply, I have the honor to state, that the only reason I have to give why it has not been before communicated, is, that it was not ready.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
Amos KENDALL.
Hon. R. M. Johnson,
Vice president and president of the senate.

Mr. Sevier moved that the communication be sent to the president of the United States, with a request that he would dismit that officer; whereupon, quite an animated discussion took place, in which Messrs. Tallmadge, Sevier, Foster, Walker, Crittenden, Buchanan, Webster, and Rives were named the disrespectful and insulting character of the letter, and Messrs. Niles, Allen, Benton, and Smith, of Connecticut, defended or palliated the letter of the postmaster general. The resolution was finally so modified as to read as follows:

Resolved, That the letter of the postmaster general to the president of the senate, stating that "the only reason why he had not sent an answer to a previous resolution was because it was not ready," is considered by the senate as disrespectful to this body.

Resolved, That said letter with the resolution to which it purports to be an answer, be laid before the president of the United States for such action as he may deem proper.

The question being divided, the vote was taken on the first resolution, which was adopted, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Foster, Fulton, King, Knight, Linn, McKean, Merrick, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, Webster, White, Williams, of Maine, Williams, of Mississippi—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Hubbard, Niles, Pierce, Smith, of Connecticut, Wright, Young—3.

The vote on the second resolution was as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Foster, Fulton, King, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Walker, Webster, White—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Hubbard, Linn, Morris, Niles, Pierce, Smith, of Connecticut, Wall, Williams, of Maine, Williams, of Mississippi, Wright, Young—15.

The senate then took up the resolutions from the committee on foreign relations, as published above.

Mr. Buchanan said the resolutions had already been so much discussed, that he should now offer no further explanation of them, though he would be glad to reply to any questions that might be suggested.

A considerable debate [to be given hereafter] ensued in the course of the proceedings on these resolutions, in which Messrs. Buchanan, Williams, of Maine, Clay, of Kentucky, Norvell, Clay, of Alabama, Calhoun, Allen, Niles, Benton, Davis, Preston, Walker, Webster, Young, Linn, and Ruggles participated.

Mr. Williams, of Me., suggested various changes in the resolution (indistinctly heard,) and moved to strike out the whole of the 4th resolution, relating to the support of Maine by the government; which motion, after some debate, he withdrew.

On the suggestion of Mr. Norvell that it was the constitutional duty of the government to protect all the states in any and every case against invasion,

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, demanded that the question on the 4th resolution should be divided, so that the senate might vote, 1st, on the expression of a mere opinion that Maine ought to withdraw her troops from the disputed territory if New Brunswick should do so; and 2d, on the want of obligation on the government to sustain Maine in case she should not follow such an example of forbearance.

Mr. Williams, of Maine, moved to strike out the last clause of the fourth resolution, which related to this hypothetical want of obligation on the general government to sustain Maine, and demanded the yeas and nays on this question, which were ordered.

Mr. Norvell suggested the substitute for this last clause of the fourth resolution, the declaration that Maine should have the ultimate adjustment of her grievances to the government of the United States, to which it rightfully and constitutionally belonged.

The vote was taken on the motion of Mr. Williams to strike out the last clause of the fourth resolution, and it was decided in the negative by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Clay, of Ala., Davis, Foster, Hubbard, Knight, Lyon, Norvell, Pierce, Ruggles, Smith, of Connecticut, Walker, Webster, White, Williams, of Maine, Williams, of Mississippi, Young—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Fulton, King, Linn, Merrick, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Ind., Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Wright—25.

Mr. Webster now moved to strike out the last clause of the fourth resolution, as above, and insert the substitute of Mr. Young, declaring that Maine "should leave the ultimate adjustment of her grievances to the government of the United States, to which it rightfully and constitutionally belonged."

On the suggestion of Mr. Norvell, Mr. W. so modified his amendment as to strike out "the adjustment of her grievances," and insert the vindication of her rights.

This modified, the amendment, after some debate, was agreed to by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Clay, of Alabama, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Foster, Hubbard, Knight, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Ruggles, Smith, of Connecticut, Walker, Webster, White, Williams, of Maine, Williams, of Mississippi, Young—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, King, Linn, Merrick, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Wright—21.

The three first resolutions of the committee on foreign relations on this subject were taken together, and agreed to by yeas and nays, as follows:

NAYS—Mr. Young—1.

The fourth resolution, modified as above, was unanimously agreed to, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Ala., Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Foster, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Knight, Linn, Lyon, Merrick, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Walker, Webster, White, Williams, of Maine, Williams, of Mississippi, Wright, Young—45.

Mr. Ruggles offered as a fifth resolution a declaration that the great and unaccountable procrastination in settling this question was a cause of much regret, and that this government owed it to the United States and to Maine to require its immediate adjustment.

Mr. Davis offered as a substitute for this the declaration that the treaty of 1783 pointed out distinctly where this boundary lay, which boundary it clearly designated, or designated nothing; and that the question upon it could not remain unsettled without endangering the peace of the country.

At the request of Mr. Buchanan, and others, Mr. Davis consented to insert "long" before "unsettled." Mr. Linn said he would like something more pointed.

Mr. Preston said he did not see the necessity of this resolution, after the decisive proceedings of this evening.

On the call of Mr. Niles, the resolutions of congress at the last session on this subject were read, and appeared so strong and decisive (calling for an immediate adjustment of the question) that Mr. Davis withdrew his proposition, as not likely to give any additional force to the injunction.

March 2. The senate having taken up the bill from the house making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the government for 1839, and Mr. Benton having moved to strike out the appropriation of $5,602 to pay Clarke & Force in part for their documentary history of the United States, published under a law of congress—

Mr. Benton spoke at much length in opposition to the appropriation, declaring that he would rather the bill should be lost than that this appropriation should be made. Mr. Southard spoke in reply, insisting that this sum was due to a contract which was a law of the land; and that congress, before withholding appropriations, ought to declare that contract null and void, which no one dared to propose in direct terms, or else they ought to make a compromise, and allow Clarke & Force suitable damages. After a few remarks by Mr. Benton, mostly inaudible to the reporter, Mr. Calhoun said he should be happy to vote for this appropriation, but a sense of duty would not allow him to vote in favor of giving books to members of congress. He agreed, however, if Clarke & Force should suffer damage on account of a failure in congress to fulfil a contract, they ought to be remunerated.

On the call of Mr. Foster, the question was divided so as to ascertain, first, whether the senate would make such appropriations; and second, whether the books should be distributed as provided for by the bill.

The former of these questions was decided in the negative, thus striking out the appropriation of $5,602, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, Hubbard, Linn, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Walker, Williams, of Miss., Wright—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Foster, Knight, Merrick, Robbins, Smith, of Ind., Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Webster—13.

The other question, on the distribution of the books, was now generally regarded as falling, of course, by the negative on the first question; but some of the opponents of the appropriation insisting that the vote should be taken, the question of distribution (without payment) was negated by yeas and nays, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Davis, Southard, Webster—3.

The senate also voted to strike out that provision of the bill which required the public printing for the executive departments to be let out on proposals, and executed by the lowest bidder; and having made some other minor amendments—

The bill, so amended, was ordered to a third reading, and, by consent, read a third time and passed.

This bill was subsequently returned from the house, with the information that the house concurred in the two above principal amendments made by the senate.

On motion of Mr. Wright, from the committee, the senate voted to insist on striking out the provision of the other house for letting out the public printing of the executive departments to the lowest bidder.

Mr. Wright also moved that the senate recede from their amendment, striking out the $5,602 appropriation for Clarke & Force. This motion was agreed to by yeas 23, nays 6.

Mr. Wright, from the committee, moved that the senate insist on their refusal to authorize the distribution of these books as provided for by the bill. Mr. Webster hoped the senate would do no anything in that way.

The senate determined to insist on their refusal to authorize the distribution, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Davis, Foster, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Indiana, Walker, White, Williams, of Me., Williams, of Miss., Wright—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Davis, Ruggles, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Webster, Young—7.

The senate proceeded to consider the bill from the house for the protection of the northern and northwestern frontier.

Mr. Benton, from the military committee, reported various amendments to the bill, making an aggregate of $1,240,000, viz. $740,000 for fortifications much advanced, and $500,000 for others not much advanced.

Mr. Ruggles moved to increase the appropriation for fortifications in Maine, from $100,000 to $200,000.

This motion was briefly advocated by Messrs. Williams, of Maine, and Ruggles, and opposed by Messrs. Wright and Clay, of Ala., and negated without a division.

The appropriation of $100,000 for Maine fortifications, was also negated by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Calhbert, Davis, Foster, Fulton, Knight, Linn, Lyon, Norvell, Pierce, Ruggles, Smith, of Connecticut, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, Webster, Williams, of Maine, Young—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Clayton, Hubbard, King, McKean, Merrick, Nicholas, Niles, Penning, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Ind., Southard, Swift, White, Williams of Mr. Wright—22.

The appropriation of $80,000 for the western frontier, was briefly advocated by Mr. Fulton and Mr. Benton, and opposed by Mr. Calhoun, and it was carried in the affirmative by yeas and nays, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Calhoun, Hubbard, King, McKean, Merrick, Nicholas, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Rane, Robbins, Smith, of Conn., Southard, Swift, Wall, Wright—17.

The appropriations of $740,000 for fortifications and other military defenses on the Atlantic and Gulf coast, were now taken up, and advocated by Mr. Benton and Mr. Davis, who stated that there was recently not a gun at Boston in a condition to fire a salute, which he supposed was generally the case; and opposed by Mr. Calhoun, who said there was always ready money by hundreds when he was connected with the department; and if the millions recently appropriated had been thus wasted, this pittance would do nothing; and then this whole appropriation was negatived by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Clay, of Ala., Davis, Fulton, Knight, Nicholas, Robbins, Ruggles, Walker, Wall, Webster, Williams of Maine—11.
NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Ky., Crittenden, Chambers, Foster, Hubbard, Lyon, Merrick, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Smith, of Va., Swift, White, Williams, of Mr. Wright, Young—23.

The bill, as amended, was now reported to the senate, and after a brief conversation the appropriation of $30,000 for the western frontier, made in committee, was non-concurred in, or lost, in senate, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Fulton, Lyon, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Webster, White, Williams of Maine—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Calhoun, Davis, Hubbard, King, Knight, Merrick, Nicholas, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Smith, of Conn., Southard, Swift, Wall, Wright—13.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading, and by consent read a third time and passed. The bill giving to the president of the United States additional powers for the defence of the United States in certain cases against invasion, and for other purposes, was received from the other house, the 16th joint rule in the way of its reception was suspended, and the senate proceeded forthwith to consider the bill.

A very animated and earnest debate followed, (to be given hereafter,) in which Messrs. Buchanan, Talman, Williams of Maine, Merrick and Hall, spoke in favor of the immediate passage of the bill as it was, and Mr. Southard in favor of some little delay, or at least of modifying it so far as to strike out the provision for 50,000 volunteers. Mr. Southard accordingly moved that the bill be referred to the committee on foreign affairs, to whom, so far as this subject had been entrusted; which motion was promptly and strongly negatived.

Mr. S. after some remarks, moved to strike out the contingent provision for 50,000 volunteers, which motion was forthwith decided in the negative, as follows:

YEA—Mr. Southard—1.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Davis, Foster, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Lyon, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Smith, of Indiana, Swift, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, Webster, White, Williams, of Me., Williams, of Miss., Wright, Young—33.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading by a unanimous vote, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Crittenden, Davis, Foster, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Knight, Linn, Lyon, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, Webster, White, Williams, of Maine, Williams, of Mississippi, Wright, Young—41.

And, by unanimous consent, the bill was forthwith read a third time and passed.

On Sunday—

Mr. Ruggles asked leave to withdraw the memorial of Thomas Jefferson Smith, presented by him a few days since, for the reason that he had discovered it to contain language derogatory and offensive towards W. A. Whitehead, another memorialist, on the same subject, whose memorial had been withdrawn for a similar reason by the senator from Michigan. He certainly would not have presented it had he been aware of the indecorous language it contained, to which his attention had since been called.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, Feb. 28. The house met at 10 o'clock this morning, pursuant to its order of yesterday.

The unfinished business of the morning hour was the motion to print the report made yesterday by Mr. Hall, of Vermont, from the select committee appointed on the 24th of January to inquire into the character and amount of proof which is required by existing laws and regulations to establish claims on the United States for revolutionary services in the Virginia continental and state lines and navy, and whether any, and what, further legislative provisions be necessary in regard to the mode of adjusting and allowing claims for such services; and which report was adverse to further appropriations for the satisfaction of said warrants.

The pending question being on the motion to print, Mr. Briggs, from the said committee, now moved the printing of 5000 extra copies. And Mr. B. made some explanations in relation to the proceedings in the committee. Mr. Mallory also made a statement in relation to the organization of the committee, and the proceedings therein in relation to the report, and in opposition to the motion to print. Mr. Hise called for the reading of the report; and the clerk commenced the reading, which was not concluded when, the hour having elapsed, the house passed to the orders of the day.

On leave, Mr. Thomas offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the committee of accounts be instructed to settle and certify the accounts of the members of the committee of investigation into the defalcations of Swatow and others, on the same principle as regulated the settlement of the accounts of the investigating committee of the late Bank of the U. States.

Mr. De Graff, at the request of Mr. Morris, of Pa., immediately moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the said resolution was agreed to.

The motion was considered at this time; and, after a few remarks from Mr. Johnson, of Va., in favor of the reconsideration, the question was taken, and the motion to reconsider was negatived, yeas 56, noes 57.

The bill making appropriations for the protection of the northern frontier of the United States, was ordered to a third reading, and then passed.

The house then took up the bill making appropriations for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities in Florida for the year 1839—the question being on the final passage thereof. When Mr. Belt moved his amendment moved in committee, for paying the value of horses and equipage of the Tennessee and other volunteer troops who have been in service in the Florida war, &c. which amendment, having been modified, was agreed to. Mr. Crane, of Va., in favor of the amendment, moved by inserting the following:

“For refunding to the state of Georgia money expended for the pay and subsistence of the troops called into service by the executive of that state to repel the invasion of Indians in the neighborhood of the Oketonek swamp, the sum of $45,323.”

The letter from the war department, read last evening, was again read.

After some explanations from Mr. Mason, of Ohio, Mr. Petlin demanded the previous question, which was seconded.

The main question was ordered to be put, (thus cutting off Mr. Grantland's amendment,) and the bill was ordered to a third reading, and was forthwith read a third time and passed.

Mr. Cumbeleg moved a suspension of the rule to enable him to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, (with the concurrence of the senate,) That the 16th joint rule of the two houses, which provides that no business shall be passed one hour shall be sent to the concurrence to the other either of the next two days of the session, is hereby suspended, so far as respects bills of the house of representatives of the following title: A bill making appropriation for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities for the year 1839; and a bill making appropriation for the protection of the northern frontier.

The yeas and nays were called, but not ordered; and the question having been taken, the rules were suspended. Mr. Adams urged that the suspension be made general. Various motions were made to include other bills. Mr. R. Garland moved to include the bill providing for taking the next census. Mr. Cumbeleg accepted this as a modification. Mr. Williams moved to amend the resolution so as to make the suspension general. Mr. Randolph inquired whether the effect of the amendment would not be to compel the house to sit all day on Sunday? The Speaker was understood to reply in the affirmative.

Mr. R. said he should then object, and asked the yeas and nays on the adoption of the amendment. The yeas were ordered, to the whole scheme, and inquired of the chair whether the suspension would not require a vote of two-thirds. The Speaker said the house had decided that the two-thirds principle applied to its own rules, and not to the rules of the senate. Mr. Pickens proceeded to say that there would be a contest of mere physical strength as to what bills should be passed; when the Speaker intimated to Mr. P. that the question was not debatable. Mr. Shields protested against the amendment of Mr. Williams, and demanded the previous question, which was seconded.

The main question was ordered, and taken, and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. Howard, from the committee on foreign relations, on leave, reported a bill, accompanied by a report, giving additional powers to the president for the defence of the United States, the proceedings on which were stated in the last “REGISTER.”

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. Thomas having moved a resolution for the compensation of the investigating committee in a manner corresponding to preceding practice on that subject; which was agreed to—

Mr. Morris, from the committee of accounts, made a statement in excuspation of that committee for having refused to allow a certain account presented to them by the chairman of the investigating committee.

The committee then resumed the consideration of the bill for taking the next census. Mr. Loomis, of New York, moved an amendment proposing to add certain items to the returns of the marshals relating to the ages of unmarried persons. It excited no little merriment in the committee, and was rejected. The bill was further amended, and finally ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

During the discussion Mr. Hise made explanations in reply to certain statements of Mr. Morris, and in defence of the investigating committee.]

On motion of Mr. Grant, the house then went into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Briggs, of Massachusetts, in the chair,) and took up the bill for the continuance of the Cumberland road through the states of Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri—yeas 70, noes 55. The bill having been read, Mr. McKenna offered an amendment appropriating $20,000 for the erection of guard fences on that portion of the road lying east of the Ohio, and $500 for widening a certain turn in the road on the side of Laurel Hill. The amendment was rejected. Mr. W. Cost Johnson moved to appropriate $50,000 for the extension of the road from the Montgomery to Rockville, in Maryland. This also was rejected. Mr. Robertson of Virginia, moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill. It was negatived—yeas 54, noes 70. Mr. Yell moved to amend the bill by appropriating $65,000 for a road from Memphis to Little Rock, in Arkansas. Mr. Elmore moved to amend the bill by striking out the clause which provides that the cost of the road be reimbursed out of the two per cent. fund. On this motion a highly animated debate arose, in which Messrs. Elmore, Mason of Ohio, Thompson, Thomas, Dawson, Robertson, Garland of Louisiana, and Herold participated; when, at about 10 o'clock, the committee rose (yeas 63, noes 60) and reported progress.

The census bill was read a third time by its title, and passed. When the house, on motion of Mr. Elmore, adjourned.

Friday, March 1. The following senate resolution and bills were reported upon by Mr. Boudin, and all passed, viz:

Joint resolution authorizing the opening of an alley and the execution of certain deeds in the city of Washington; the bill to extend the jurisdiction of the corporation of the city of Washington over the Potomac bridge; and the bill to incorporate the Georgetown college in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Ewing endeavored to get up the Cumberland road bill; Mr. Graves, to obtain the consideration of a resolution moved by him concerning the accounts of C. J. Ingersoll (late U. S. attorney in Pennsylvania) with the United States; Mr. Mercer, to have leave given to committees to report. All these motions were overruled, two-thirds of the votes being requisite to their success.

The following executive communications were received and laid on the table, viz:

A message from the president of the United States, in obedience to a resolution of the house of the 18th January last, calling for a copy of a despatch from Mr. Stevenson, our minister at London, on the subject of the tobacco trade.

A communication from the treasurer of the United States, transmitting copies of his accounts settled by the accounting officers of the treasury, for the third and fourth quarters of 1837, and first and second quarters of 1838.

A letter from the secretary of war, in obedience to a resolution of the house of representatives of the 19th ultimo, calling for a statement of the proceedings of his department in the execution of the first and second provisions of the fourth article of the treaty of the 1st November, 1837, with the Winnebago Indians.

A letter from the secretary of war, transmitting a report of the commissioner of Indian affairs, and one of the second auditor of the treasury, in answer to the resolution of the 16th ultimo, calling for information in reference to the treaty with the Pottawatamie Indians, of the 25th, 26th, and 27th October, 1822.

A letter from the secretary of war, transmitting reports from the commissioner of Indian affairs and second auditor, in reply to a resolution of the house of representatives of the 28th January last, in relation to the execution of the treaties of 1832 and 1834, with the Chickasaw Indians, and the treaty of 1830 with the Choctaws.

A communication from the secretary of the treasury, in compliance, as far as practicable, with the resolution of the house of the 31st December last, in relation to the condition of the banks in Wisconsin.

The house then resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Lincoln, of Massachusetts, in the chair,) on the bill reported by the committee on foreign relations, in connexion with their report upon the subject of the existing difficulties in relation to the northeastern boundary.

The bill having been read, Mr. W. Thompson expressed the hope that, in a view to give more solemnity to this proceeding, the question on the bill should be taken without debate, and by a vote as nearly unanimous as possible.

This suggestion not being acceded to, a long debate followed, which was participated in by Messrs. Howard, Kennedy, Biddle, and Evans; and, incidentally, by Messrs. Pickens, Elmore, Robertson, Tilghast, Mercer, Menefee, Craig, Adams, and Naylor.

Mr. Evans (who spoke in reply to Mr. Biddle,) had not concluded his remarks, when, the hour of 3 having arrived, the house took a recess.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. Evans resumed his speech and continued to occupy the floor for a considerable time, when he was succeeded by Mr. Fishmore, who urged some provision for the defence of the lakes, and laid on the table an amendment empowering the president to arm and equip as many steamboats as he might deem proper for that end. Mr. Menefee next took the floor, and warmly advocated the necessity of vindicating the national honor. Mr. Saltonstall opposed the bill as premature, and read extensively from the documents to show that Great Britain had no right to claim the existence of any understanding between the two governments for her exclusive possession of the disputed territory, yet the course of our government had been such as to encourage such an idea; and therefore, we ought to give time for explanation. He charged Maine with rashness and indiscretion in the movement which she had made.

Mr. Legare defended the bill, denied it was a war measure, but insisted that its tendency was to peace. He examined the question of right, and vindicated the stand taken by the state of Maine. Mr. Pickens replied to the remarks of Mr. Menefee, and said that national interest ought to be looked at as well as national honor. He deprecated war, and thought peace might be preserved; but was prepared to go any length when war was inevitable. He opposed the second section of the bill, which empowers the president to raise 20 new regiments, &c. Mr. Naylor insisted that it would be an empty bravado to pass the rest of the bill, and not the second section, which gave vitality and force to the whole. He concluded that the country must do something in the case, and supported the bill as fit and necessary. Mr. Prentiss replied to some of the remarks of Mr. Pickens, and treated in ridicule the idea of looking at interest when honor was at stake. He went into an examination of the several parts of the bill—opposed the second section, and wished the residue better guarded, and the discretion of the president more restricted. Mr. Hoffman went into an explanation of the reasons why, although a representative of a great commercial emporium, which must be most sensibly injured by war, should it come, he gave his support to the bill. He then went into a brief examination of the existing difficulty, and insisted on the necessity of supporting the national rights and character at every sacrifice. Mr. Thompson followed in a similar course of remark, commenting with great severity on the injustice and arrogance of the British claims, and the course of the provincial government on this occasion, and pledged his constituents and himself to the whole extent of their means to stand by the government.

Mr. W. Cost Johnson moved the substance of the foandry bill to be inserted as an amendment.

Mr. Wise treated the whole debate as a matter of amusement. Those who talked so much seldom were great doers. The whole danger, as he understood, was like to pass away; but, if not, he opposed giving to any president powers so large as those in the bill. He offered, by way of substitute, the resolutions moved in the senate by Mr. Buchanan, and then moved that the committee rise; but consented to withdraw the motion under a pledge that it should be renewed.

Mr. Evans stated that information had been received through the papers by the evening mail, that a special messenger had passed through Augusta, Maine, with despatches from Sir John Harvey for the British minister here, the contents unknown; but generally understood and believed to be expressive of his determination to take no further step until the reception of the minister's reply. It was not certainly true, though he was strongly inclined to believe that it was.

He then went into a course of very severe animadversion on the speech of Mr. Saltonstall, particularly as coming from a member from Massachusetts, who had been the first to resist British aggression; and, as a contrast to the positions of that gentleman, read a series of resolutions, just received, from the legislature of Massachusetts, fully supporting Maine in all she had done, and proffering for her aid the loan of a million of dollars. He further stated that an agent of Massachusetts had accompanied the agent of Maine in the late transactions, and had concurred fully in all that was done; that the party who went to support the sheriff, though they had arms with them to resist, if need be, an armed body of trespassers which they understood to be collected in a considerable force within the territory, had taken care to carry them boxed up, and had determined not to open the boxes until the actual necessity arrived of a forcible conflict. It was not a military expedition, but strictly a civil one to enforce the execution of a writ. As to the secret session of the legislature, it had been secret to conceal the movement, not from the general government here, or the provincial government beyond our lines, but from the trespassers, whom it was desirable to seize before they could make good their retreat.

After some general remarks on the necessity, whether the pacific intelligence were true or false, of still passing the bill, Mr. E., according to his pledge, moved the rising of the committee, but hoped the motion would not prevail.

[It was now midnight.]

The question being put, it was carried, and thereupon the committee rose and reported progress.

On motion of Mr. Howard, it was ordered that the consideration of this bill be the special order for to-morrow at 11 o'clock, to take precedence of all other business.

Mr. Pelrick moved a reconsideration of the vote on a bill for the benefit of the Georgetown college, but did not press it.

Mr. Wise obtained the printing of his substitute for the military preparation bill; which was as follows:

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That congress can discover no trace, throughout the long correspondence which has been submitted to them, between the governments of Great Britain and the United States, of any understanding, express or implied, much less of any "explicit agreement," such as is now alleged, that the territory in dispute between them on the northeastern boundary of the latter shall be placed and remain under the exclusive jurisdiction of her Britannic majesty's government until the settlement of the question; on the contrary, it appears that there was and is a clear subsisting understanding between the parties, under which they have both acted, that, until this question shall be finally determined, each of them shall refrain from the exercise of jurisdiction over any portion of the disputed territory, except such parts of it which have been in the actual possession of one or the other party.

That whilst the United States are bound, in good faith, to comply with this understanding, during the pendency of negotiations, congress cannot perceive that the state of Maine has violated the spirit of it by merely sending, under the authority of the legislature, her land agents, with a sufficient force, into the disputed territory, for the sole purpose of expelling lawless trespassers engaged in injuring its value by cutting down the timber; both parties having a common duty, and being bound by a common duty, to expel such intruders from a territory to which each claims title, taking care, however, to retire within the acknowledged limits which have been mutually acknowledged.

That should her Britannic majesty's government, in violation of the clear understanding between the parties, persist in carrying its avowed determination into execution, and attempt, by military force, to assume exclusive jurisdiction over the disputed territory, all which they fairly hold, it rightfully belongs to the state of Maine, the exigency, in the opinion of congress, will then have occurred, rendering it the imperative duty of the president, under the constitution and the laws, to call forth the militia, and employ the military force of the United States, for the purpose of repelling such an aggression, the state of Maine, congress will cordially co-operate with and sustain the president in defending the rights of the country.

That should the British authorities refrain from attempting a military occupation of the territory in dispute, and from enforcing their claim to exclusive jurisdiction over it by arms, or, on the other hand, should the state of Maine, on her part, to pursue a course of similar forbearance, and leave the ultimate vindication of her rights to the general government of the United States, to which it rightfully and constitutionally belongs.

That the president of the United States should, in the exigency of war with Great Britain, immediately convene congress of the United States.

That the sum of eighteen thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, for outfit and salary of a special minister to Great Britain; Provided, the president of the United States shall deem it expedient to appoint the same.

The house took up sundry bills on the speaker's table, which had come back from the senate with amendments.

The amendments to the bill for the relief of Joseph M. Hernandez were concurred in, and the bill passed.

The senate's amendment to the bill for the erection of a new jail in Washington, requiring the addition of $1,000 to the appropriation by the house of $30,000 for the erection of that building. The bill was referred to a committee of the whole on the state of the union.

The house bill for the support of the army, with sundry amendments from the senate, was referred in like manner.

The senate's amendment to the bill for the relief of the Springfield Manufacturing Company, having been read,

Mr. Calhoun, of Massachusetts, moved that the said amendment be non-concurred in.

Various attempts were made to get a quorum on this motion, and several motions for adjournment were made, the last of which succeeded: ayes 73, noes 59; and so

The house adjourned at half past 12 o'clock.

Saturday, March 2. On motion of Mr. Noyes, ordered that three additional members be appointed on the committee on enrolled bills.

The unfinished business of the morning hour was the report of the select committee on the subject of the Virginia land claims. Mr. Cobb moved to suspend the rule for the purpose of receiving reports of committees, and of taking up and disposing of bills on the speaker's table; on which motion there appeared ayes 35, noes 37. (No quorum.) Mr. Molloy moved a call of the house; which was ordered. And the roll having been called, 91 members answered to their names. And the names of the absentees having been called, there appeared 114 answering to their names.

Some other members having appeared, and it having been ascertained that a quorum was present, on motion of Mr. Hopkins, all further proceedings on the call were dispensed with. Mr. Hopkins then withdrew his motion to suspend the rule for the purpose above mentioned, but moved to suspend the rule for the purpose of introducing a resolution providing for the pay of messengers for extra services; which motion was rejected. Mr. Mercer moved a suspension of the rule until half-past eleven, for the purpose of receiving reports of committees, and disposing of the business on the table; which motion was agreed to. Sundry reports were made. Among the reports was one by Mr. Howard, from the committee on foreign relations, on the subject of our relations with Mexico. Mr. Howard said that the report concluded with certain resolutions which, in consequence of the want of time, he would not ask the house to act upon. The reports and resolutions were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed. [For the report and resolutions see page 25.] Some other business having intervened, Mr. Biddle rose and made inquiry whether the above report included a certain petition heretofore presented by himself, from New Orleans? Mr. Howard replied affirmatively. Mr. Biddle complained that the report was made in such an obscure way as not to attract attention. Mr. Howard said that the report had not been made in an obscure way, but as usual. The noise, however, was so great that scarcely a word could be heard of any thing that passed. Mr. Biddle said he did not speak with a view to impugn the sense of the chairman of the committee on foreign affairs, but simply in justification of himself for not noticing the report when it was made.

A number of intellectual motions were made to suspend the rule for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of particular bills, &c. On motion of Mr. Thomas, the senate bill in relation to the courts of New Orleans was taken up, read twice, and committed. Mr. Graves asked the house to take up the resolution of inquiry in relation to Charles J. Ingersoll, late district attorney at Philadelphia. Objection was made. Mr. G. moved a suspension of the rule; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. Keim stated it to be the desire of Mr. Ingersoll that the resolution should pass. Mr. K. was authorized so to state. Mr. Graves asked leave to consider another resolution heretofore offered by him; which was objected to. The resolution was agreed to. And the house then passed to the special order of the day.

The house then again resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union on the bill reported by the committee on foreign relations in connection with the existing difficulties in relation to the northeastern boundary. Mr. Cushing was entitled to the floor, but yielded to Mr. Saltonstall for the purpose of explanation. Mr. Saltonstall expressed his fears that, from severe cold, he should be unable to make himself heard. Mr. S. then proceeded to make an explanation in relation to the course of argument adopted by him yesterday, and which had been misapprehended. After Mr. S. had concluded, Mr. Cushing took the floor. Mr. Cambreleng inquired if the gentleman would yield the floor to allow him to make a statement. Mr. Cushing said he would, if the gentleman would be brief.

Mr. Cambreleng then said he perceived that members were preparing to leave the city, and he would give notice that the three most important appropriation bills—the army, the navy, and the civil and diplomatic appropriation bills—were still pending between the two houses with some amendments. If these bills were not acted on this evening, it might be necessary to sit to-morrow. Mr. C. hoped that the house would not be driven to this necessity, and that the discussion now going on might be terminated. In any event, he hoped gentlemen would not leave the city until these bills were passed. Mr. Wise inquired of the chairman of the committee of ways and means whether it was his intention to bring up the sub-treasury bill. Mr. Cambreleng said the gentleman knew that it could not be called up. Mr. Cushing. The gentleman might as well attempt to raise a dead man to life. The debate was then resumed; and the committee was addressed by Messrs. Cushing, Briggs, (in explanation) Cray, Adams, Bell and Everett.

Mr. Smith took the floor, but the hour of three having arrived, the house took a recess until half past four o'clock.

EVENING SITTING.

Mr. Evans addressed the house for a short time in explanation of a portion of his remarks, made on Friday evening, which he admitted to have been so severe on an honorable gentleman, (Mr. Saltonstall), for whom he cherished the highest possible personal respect. He then proceeded to express his entire conviction of the rectitude of that gentleman's motives, and acquitted him of the remotest purpose of strengthening the hands of a foreign power against the interests of his own country and state.

Mr. Adams made a similar explanation in regard to Mr. Biddle, on whom he pronounced a short but beautiful eulogium. He insisted on his own right to combat the arguments of any other member with all the force in his power, and protested against its being interpreted as the slightest reflection against such members; and the strenuousness with which he had resisted the speech of Mr. B. was but a proof in how high a degree he appreciated the talents of that gentleman, and their effect upon the house.

The question being on a motion of Mr. W. C. Johnson to amend the bill by inserting a provision for the purchase of a site for a foundry of cannon,

Mr. J. supported the motion in a short speech, and then, at the request of Mr. Robertson, modified his motion so as to require that the piece of ground purchased should not be less than 50 nor over 100 acres.

The question being then taken, the amendment was negatived.

Mr. Wise moved to amend the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting the following as a substitute:

That the sum of five million of dollars is hereby appropriated and placed at the disposal of the president to employ in any manner which he may deem proper to the employment of the naval and military forces of the United States, and such portion of the militia as he may deem necessary to be called into service, to repress or prevent any actual invasion of the territory of the United States by any foreign power, at any time before Congress can be convened to act upon the subject; to provide for which, the secretary of the treasury is authorized to borrow money on the credit of the United States, and to cause to be issued certificates of stock, signed by the register of the treasury, for the sum to be borrowed, or any part thereof; and the same to be sold upon the best terms that may be offered after public notice for proposals for the same: provided, That no engagement or contract shall be entered into which shall preclude the United States from reimbursing any sum or sums thus borrowed after the expiration of five years from the first of January next; and that the rate annually shall not exceed five per cent, payable semi-annually.

And be it further enacted, That the sum of eighteen thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, for outfit and salary of a special minister to Great Britain; provided, That the president of the United States shall deem it expedient to appoint the same.

Mr. W. expressed his hope that the committee would be brought to a unanimous vote in favor of this amendment. It went to avoid all the disputed questions on the bill, and reduced it in fact to a contingent appropriation of five millions of dollars. This was as far as he could go. The whole measure was, at last, but a menace; and, as such, it would, with such a power as Great Britain, operate rather as an obstacle to negotiation, than an auxiliary to its success. He was willing to vote a declaratory resolution like that he had offered; but he could not make the president a de jure judge of the expediency of peace or war, &c. He was willing to trust the present executive in a matter of that kind as far as he would any man, because he was not of a warlike disposition—but a chief magistrate might hereafter rise, and plead this act as a precedent. He believed the noise about war to be all humbug; but, if a war did ensue, he would not go as far as these resolutions went, but he would go further—he would ask president Van Buren for an office.

A voice. "What will it be?"

Mr. W. did not say; but observed that, if this substitute should not be agreed to, he would then move resolutions generally similar to those which had been submitted to the senate by a senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. Buchanan.)

The question being put, the amendment was negatived: ayes 73, noes 84.

Mr. Wise now moved to strike out the second section of the bill, and after the reading of a substitute for that section, which Mr. McKay desired of offering when in order, the question was taken on the motion of Mr. Wise's motion to strike out and decided in the affirmative: ayes 65, noes 78; so the second section of the bill was ordered to be stricken out.

Mr. McKay (chairman of the military committee) now moved to fill the blank occasioned by the above vote, by inserting the following:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the militia, when called into the service of the United States by virtue of this act, or of the act entitled "An act to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the union, suppress insurrections, repel invasion, and to repeal the act now in force for those purposes in the order of the president of the United States the said interest require it, be compelled to serve for a term not exceeding six months after their arrival at the place of rendezvous, in any one year, unless sooner discharged.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That in the event of actual invasion of the territory of the United States by any foreign power, or of imminent danger of such invasion discovered in his opinion to exist before Congress can be convened to act upon the subject, the president be, and he is hereby, authorized if he deem the same expedient, to accept the services of any number of volunteers, not exceeding fifty thousand, in the manner provided for in an act entitled "An act authorizing the president of the United States to accept the services of volunteers and to raise an additional regiment of dragoons or mounted riflemen," approved May 23, 1836.

A member moved to extend the term of militia service to twelve months, instead of six, but it was negatived. The question on Mr. McKay's amendment was then divided; a question put and so moved as to relate to the term of militia service, it was carried: ayes 105, noes not counted. The question being then put on the residue of the amendment, relating to volunteers—Mr. Wise opposed it as going, in substance, to re-enact the 2d section, which had just been stricken out. Mr. McKay denied this, and spoke a short time in vindication of the amendment. Mr. Briggs moved to amend the amendment by limiting the number of volunteers to 12,000. Rejected. The amendment was then agreed to: ayes 101. So the house adopted both branches of the amendment moved by Mr. McKay.

Mr. Wise offered an amendment limiting the operation of the bill to thirty days after the commencement of the next session of Congress; which was carried. Mr. Howard moved to fill the blank which related to the number of millions which the president was empowered to borrow to carry into effect the purposes of this act, by inserting "ten." Another member (not known by the reporter, in the confusion which prevailed,) moved "twenty." Mr. Wise moved "five." The question being put first on the the highest number, "twenty," was negatived. And the blank was filled with the word "ten": ayes 95, no 84.

Mr. Fillmore moved the following amendment: "And to build, purchase, or charter, arm, equip, and man such vessels and steamboats on the northern lakes and rivers whose waters communicate with the United States and Great Britain, as he shall deem necessary to protect the United States from invasion from that quarter."

Mr. Bronson and Mr. Fillmore spoke warmly in support of the amendment, which was agreed to—ayes 107.

An amendment, empowering the president to arm all the fortifications, was moved by some member not ascertained by the reporter, and negatived.

Mr. McKay now moved to amend the bill by adding thereto the following:

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That in the event of either of the contingencies provided for in the 1st and 3d sections of this act; the president of the United States shall be authorized to apply a part, not exceeding $1,000,000, of the appropriation made in this act, to repairing or arming fortifications along the seaboard and frontier.

And be it further enacted, That whenever militia or volunteers are called into the service of the United States, they shall have the organization of the army of the United States, and shall receive the same pay and allowances.

These sections were both agreed to.

Mr. Pratt offered an amendment for the construction of three steam frigates.

Mr. Pickens warmly remonstrated against such encumbering the bill with amendments, and declared, if it were presented against the bill so amended, he would vote against it. The amendment proposed by Mr. Pratt was rejected. Several other ineffectual attempts were made to amend the bill; when, on motion of Mr. Howard, the committee rose and reported the bill to the house.

In the house, the bill being taken up—

Mr. Howard proposed to concur in all the amendments reported by the committee of the whole; but a division of the question being insisted on, it was put on the several amendments separatim.

The question on concurring in the amendment striking out the second section of the bill (above recited) was taken by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman, Allen, J. W. Allen, Anderson, Arvon, Banks, Beers, Berne, Biddle, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, William B. Campbell, John Campbell, Carter, Chambers, Chaney, Chapman, Chesbain, Clark, Coles, Corwin, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Darlington, Dawson, Daves, Daves, Deberry, Duncan, Edwards, Elmore, Everett, Ewing, Farrington, R. Fletcher, Fillmore, Fitch, Francis Garland, Abraham G. Gibbons, J. Graham, Grant, James Garland, George Griffin, Hanley, Hall, Halsted, Hammond, Hauser, Harlan, Hastings, Hawes, Hawkins, Hopkins, R. M. T. Hunter, Ingham, Jenifer, J. Johnson, William C. Johnson, J. W. Jones, Keitt, Kingensmith, Lewis, Lincoln, Logan, Looney, Lyons, Marshall, Marvin, J. M. Mason, Samuel Mason, McClure, Maxwell, McKay, Abraham McClinton, McClure, McLean, Meade, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Montgomery, Celvay Morris, Murray, Noble, Ogles, Palmer, Pearce, Peck, Pennypacker, Pettikin, Pickens, Pope, Potts, Sergeant S. Prouss, P. nani, Rardin, Randolph, Reily, Rencher, Ridgway, Rumsey, Russell, Saltonstall, Sawyer, Shieler, Augustus H. Shepherd, Shields, Sigsbee, S. S. Smith, Stratton, Tappan, Taylor, Thomas, Thillingslat, Tius, Towns, Wagener, Webster, Albert S. White, John White, Whiteley, Willis Williams, Sherrod Williams, Jared W. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wemy, Word, Worthington, Yell, Yorkie—136.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Beatty, Bicknell, Birdsell, Boulton, Brodhead, Bronson, Buchanan, Bynum, Caldwell, Chesley, Cray, Cushing, Cushman, De Graff, Denis, Drumgoode, Evans, Gallup, Gray, Harrison, Hoffman, Holt, Howard, W. H. Hunter, Thomas B. Jackson, Henry Johnson, N. Jones, Kemble, Kennedy, Legare, Leadbetter, Robert M. Clayton, Miller, Moore, Samuel W. Morris, Taylor, Noyes, Parke, Payne, Ferris, Payner, Fluimier, Pratt, Rives, Robinson, Sergeant, Shepler, Smith, Spencer, Taylor, Thompson, Toland, Touzey, Turney, Vail—56.

So the amendment was concurred in, and the second section of the bill stricken out.

The section extending militia service to six months was concurred in without a count.

That empowering the president to accept the services of 50,000 volunteers to repress or prevent any actual invasion of the territory of the United States, which was negatived—ayes 78, noes 10,000; which motion was negatived—ayes 78, noes 20,000.

[On this question, Mr. Williams, of N. C., demanded the yeas and nays; but the house refused to order them.]

The number standing at 50,000, the section was concurred in, yeas 153, nays 47.

Washington, March 4, 1839.

GENTLEMEN: I note with regret an inaccuracy in the report of the debates of Saturday evening, which it becomes me, more than any other person, to correct. The complimentary remarks of Mr. Adams, there alluded to, however comprehensive they might be deemed, evidently sprung from an impulse which direction was neither given, nor exclusively, towards his own estimable and distinguished colleague, the hon. Mr. Saltonstall. Under any circumstances, I should be pained at such an error, but far more so when the peculiar position of Mr. S. rendered the tribute to him an act of bare justice.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,
R. BIDDLE.

Such was the impression on my mind; but, from a communication which I have since received, I believe that the measure originated with another distinguished citizen of Pennsylvania, the late honorable George Bryan.

NEW YORK MONEY MARKET. The Express of Tuesday says:

The week has opened with an increased gloom. The news from Nova Scotia and the frontier is considered more unfavorable. Stocks it will be seen have declined—some of them very much. The Dry Dock bank, which stood at 105 on Saturday, fell to par. The Bank of Commerce, which was so much sought after, now stands a shade better than par. The depression in stocks is caused more from the apprehension than the knowledge that American securities will decline in the London market.

The condition of our money market, for some time, must depend much, very much, on the turn things take in London. If the war news should not be much thought of in England, and if there should be no serious decline in American securities, money matters will recover here. If, however, they should fall off there, stocks may decline further here. The fall in stocks in the first thirty has been very severe, yet none of the operators have been so seriously affected as not to make good their contracts.

MORE SUSPENSIONS. The Michigan State bank and the Detroit City bank have suspended specie payments; the first on Monday, the 25th ultimo, the latter some days earlier.

The Southwark Savings Bank, and the Pennsylvania Savings Bank, both in Philadelphia, have suspended the redemption of their notes. Neither of these institutions was incorporated by the state.

Tuculosa, Alabama, March 1st.

The private bank at Wetumpka and Selma has suspended specie payments.

A statement of the condition of the Wetumpka trading company sets down its liabilities at $3,000. Assets, $239,000, making a difference of four to one in favor of the institution. The cash on hand was $10,000, real estate mortgaged $100,000. [Int.]

THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA. A rumor at New York the beginning of this week, that Plattsburg had been captured by a body of British and Indians, doubtless had its origin in the circumstances mentioned in the following:

Plattsburg, N. Y. March 5, 1839.

"By a letter received in town last evening, and also from a citizen direct from the east side of the lake, we learn that the British authorities in Canada have taken formal possession of the strip of land in dispute on this frontier, including the site of the old fort at Rouse's Point, by erecting a flag and stationing armed patrols within the jurisdiction of this state, as heretofore acknowledged; and, what is still worse, have embodied 400 Indians on this line."

The New York Commercial Advertiser, in reference to the above, says: "The old fort alluded to was built by the United States during the last war at great expense. It was never of any use, however, to this country, as it was soon after discovered that the engineer had placed the fort some half a mile within the territory of Great Britain. It was immediately abandoned, and from that time has been known as 'Fort Blunder.' We passed it a few months ago, and observed that the walls were nearly in ruins."

In allusion to the above report, the Plattsburg Republican of the 9th says:

"We have it from persons who were there yesterday, that there are no troops at the fort, or on the 'strip of land in dispute.' All was quiet at our last advices."

COAL VEIN ON FIRE. During the severe cold in January, two persons were destroyed in Mr. L. C. Dougherty's works at Coalcastle, (Penn.), from incautiously placing a fire in the dirt. We regret to state that the flames on that occasion communicated to the breast and proppings, and have been ignited ever since; and up to this time the element has baffled every exertion to subdue it. It would surprise some of our friends who think that white ash coal cannot burn without a strong draught, to see a whole mine in flames which cannot be smothered; and to stop which Mr. Dougherty will eventually be compelled, Cyrus like, to turn the course of some stream, and drown it out. [Pottsville Journal.]

NAVAL. The Norfolk Beacon of the 13th inst. states that the broad pennant of Commodore Claxton was hoisted on board the U. S. ship Constitution on Tuesday.

The same paper says:—"We understand that a letter was received by steambot mail yesterday which states that it was confidently rumored that the U. S. frigate Constitution, com. Claxton, at present at the navy yard, Gosport, would proceed to New York, and sail thence with a special minister to Great Britain."

NORTH EASTERN BOUNDARY. Our pages contain a number of articles relating to the movements, doings, &c. on the frontier. Since they were in type, we have received the following; from which it will be seen that the agreement entered into between Mr. Forsyth and Mr. Fox, has been received, and that though satisfactory to sir John Harvey, it has not been received so favorably by gov. Fairfield.

House of representatives, Augusta,

12 o'clock M. Tuesday, March 12.

A message from the governor in relation to the memorandum of Mr. Forsyth and Mr. Fox. The governor considers the arrangement unsatisfactory and unequal, and advises that the military force of the state should not be withdrawn, unless the lieutenant governor of New Brunswick shall withdraw his force, and the government of Maine be satisfied that he entirely abandons the idea of expelling its forces. Gov. Fairfield also resists the recommendation to allow Gov. Harvey concurrent jurisdiction in measures of protection to the property on the Aroostook, and advises that, in case sir John abandons his position, and withdraws his military force, the military force of Maine shall also be withdrawn, and a sufficient armed or unarmed civil posse be left on the Aroostook for its protection.

In a postscript to the message, the governor says that he has received a note of a pacific character from sir John Harvey, in which he intimates his willingness to enter into arrangements upon the basis of the memorandum of Mr. Forsyth and Mr. Fox. The message and sir John Harvey's note have been committed to the committee on the northeastern boundary, and 5,000 copies ordered to be printed.

The Oxford and Cumberland militia still remain in town, and have been this afternoon manoeuvring in front of the state house. Gen. Scott is in town, and will, I understand, continue here at present. He is acting the part of a pacificator; and it is to be hoped that his efforts will prove successful. Notwithstanding the belligerent aspect of affairs here, I am still of opinion that war will not result. But I still see no probability that Maine will recede one iota from the position she has taken.

Correspondence of the Atlas.

State house, Augusta,

Wednesday, March 13, 1839.

Colonel Charles Jarvis, our temporary land agent, who has command of our forces on the Aroostook, arrived here last evening. He left his encampment, which is at present near the mouth of the Aroostook and about two miles from the line of the state, on the 9th instant. Not apprehending any attack from the trespassers or the authorities of New Brunswick, colonel Jarvis has discharged about four hundred of his men.

Those that remain are engaged in constructing a boom across the Aroostook, for the purpose of stopping the timber that may come down. Colonel Jarvis visits Augusta, at this time, I learn, to communicate to the executive some local information he has obtained, and to recommend that the forces, to be retained on the Aroostook territory, should be employed in constructing roads.

Gen. Hodson has been ordered to the Aroostook. His head quarters will be on the Aroostook, at the mouth of the Presque Isle, and about ten miles from the encampment of colonel Jarvis. The Kennebec troops are ordered to No. 4, on the Aroostook road, and there to wait for orders from general Hodson. The detachments from the Oxford and Cumberland divisions are yet here. I understand they will remain here until there has been some action by the legislature on the governor's message.

I have no doubt the legislature will sustain the views of the governor, and authorize him to keep a sufficient force on the disputed territory to protect the timber from depredations. If sir John Harvey consents to this, and it is generally supposed here that he will, there will then be an end to our present difficulties.

We copy the following from the Globe of this afternoon:

Government House,

Frederickton, (N. B.) March 7, 1839.

Major general sir John Harvey presents his compliments to governor Fairfield, and, with reference to a communication which he has just received from Her Majesty's minister at Washington, transmitting a "memorandum" under the joint signatures of Mr. Forsyth, secretary of state, and Mr. Fox, containing terms of accommodation, recommended by the secretary of state and Her Majesty's minister plenipotentiary, to governor Fairfield, and himself respectively, begs to say, that he will be happy to enter into such amicable communication with governor Fairfield upon the subject as may conduce to the attainment of the very desirable and important object thereby proposed to be effected.

Sir John Harvey has answered Mr. Fox's communication by expressing his entire readiness to give effect to the proposed agreement so far as may be dependent upon him.

His excellency gov. Fairfield, &c.

THE MAINE BORDER TROUBLES. The Boston Atlas, extra, contains accounts from H. Hillax (Nova Scotia) to the 27th ult. The late movements on the part of the government and people of Maine have occasioned great excitement, and the Halifax papers regard the event of war between the United States and Great Britain as almost inevitable. The legislature of Nova Scotia met on the 26th, on the receipt of the news from the borders, and voted a sum of one hundred thousand pounds to be at the disposal of the governor to raise men to go to the aid of New Brunswick, and eight thousand men were to be immediately raised.

Extract of a letter dated

Halifax, Feb. 27th, 1839.

The late news from the state of Maine has such a wretched appearance that it is the general opinion that war cannot now be averted, and that the good countries. We should particularly lament if the good and kindred feeling that ought to prevail should now be broken up, and hope that it may still blow over. Our legislature yesterday immediately on the receipt of the intelligence, voted a sum not exceeding one hundred thousand pounds, to be at the disposal of the governor, to assist the mother country to raise volunteers to go to the assistance of our sister province, and eight thousand men will be raised immediately.

The vote was followed up with long and hearty cheers for New Brunswick and the queen of Great Britain.

As an evidence of the loyal and highly excited feeling which prevails in Halifax, we call attention to the extraordinary fact that after the resolutions were adopted by the house of assembly, three hearty cheers were proposed by one of the members, which was responded to by all present. The Royal Gazette says—

"Never have we before witnessed such a heart-stirring scene, nor ever before were such cheers heard in our house of assembly."

Journal office, Halifax, }
Tuesday, Feb. 1839. }

Highly important from New Brunswick.

The Frederickton Sentinel, received this day, confirms the accounts given on Monday, of hostile movements by the state of Maine, and in addition gives the message of the governor to the legislature commanding a levy of 10,000 men, for the purpose of taking possession of the territory in dispute, and to enable him to carry this measure into effect, the legislature have voted the sum of eight hundred thousand dollars, and passed resolutions calling upon the state of Massachusetts to aid them in the measure.

Immediately on the receipt of this important information, the legislature of this province resolved itself into a committee for the defence of the province, and for assisting the inhabitants of New Brunswick to repulse the invading foe; all other business was stopped until the committee should report, which was done at 5 o'clock.

Never, perhaps, in the history of Nova Scotia, has there occurred such an outbreak of deep impassioned feeling, as was given expression to, when the committee reported their resolutions.

Notwithstanding the suddenness of the measures adopted by the house, when the doors were opened at half past five o'clock, the lobby and gallery were filled to overflowing, by the crowds of inhabitants who had been waiting for admission. The report was then read, after some preliminary observations, by the hon. Mr. Dodd, chairman of the committee. It consisted of a series of resolutions, empowering his excellency the commander-in-chief, to call out and employ volunteer and draft companies of the militia, to the number of 5000 men, between the ages of 15 and 45; and authorizing the expenditure of £100,000, if it should be required, to repel the aggressions on the sister province.

The resolutions provided also, that in addition to the same allowance as the regular troops from the military chest, the militia should receive pay from provincial resources authorized to be expended in the service. The house received the report unanimously, after an motion of the hon. Mr. Dodd, the whole house and the assembled multitude arose and united in three times three hearty and brave inhabitants of New Brunswick, and three times three for her most gracious majesty queen Victoria, which were given with such rapturous and tremendous effect, that the solid walls of our province building seemed to shake to their foundation, and the sound was heard in the adjacent streets.

The house are to wait upon his excellency to-morrow, with a copy of the resolutions.

On the following day the legislative council concurred in the act of the assembly, and the lieutenant-governor approved of the whole proceedings. H. M. ship Crocodile, with a division of the 69th regiment, had sailed from Halifax for New Brunwick—also, the Eliza, and Numa, transports, with another detachment.

From Augusta. A letter from Augusta, under date of 7th, says—

"No communication has been made by the governor to our legislature in relation to the late movements at Washington on our border troubles. We shall probably have something to-morrow from the governor, when we may expect some action on the subject by the legislature. The feeling is very strong among the people through the state that our troops ought not to be withdrawn from the disputed territory until the line is settled."

In the house a bill to incorporate the county of Restook, with Houlton for the same town, has been laid on the table and ordered to be printed. It embraces within its limits the disputed territory."

General Scott remained at Augusta on Friday the 8th. Governor Fairfield had yet made no communication to the legislature on the recent proceedings at Washington. On Thursday, Gen. Scott met the citizens of Augusta, representatives and soldiers, in the legislative hall. The correspondent of the Portland Argus says:

"The hall was full and the galleries were crowded. Many could not get places. The greeting of the general to the soldiers and officers introduced to him, was peculiarly hearty. In one of the representatives, Mr. Frost of Bethel, he recognised a fellow soldier in the 1st war. They were both wounded in the same battle. The interview was enthusiastic. The general seemed hardly willing to part with his band."

After a half hour spent in these mutual interchanges of friendship, Mr. Allen of Bangor, in a few remarks, welcomed general Scott among us; to which welcoming he replied, by thanking the audience for the hearty reception they had given him in the capitol of Maine, and by expressing his happiness at being enabled, face to face, to see so many of his sons—and should war come he should be glad to be found shoulder to shoulder—breast to breast—with such soldiers."

The troops of the 5th division arrived in Augusta on Sunday. They were enthusiastically welcomed by the cheers of the people as they passed.

A letter dated at Augusta on the 8th inst. says—

"The Cumberland and Oxford troops have been reviewed to-day, by the governor. They appeared to be well prepared for the arduous service on which they are ordered. After the review the troops were formed into a hollow square, when they were addressed in a happy, appropriate and patriotic speech, by the governor."

I understand they will receive orders to march for the frontier to-morrow morning. They will be sent forward in small divisions for the convenience of getting quarters on the road.

The news advices from Houlton are of the 6th, evening Nothing new. The Maine papers and letters persist in declaring that the 11th regiment had arrived at Madawaska on the 4th; when we know that the two advance companies only reached Quebec on that day, from Sorel, on their way to New Brunswick.

From Bangor the only news we have is that, on the 8th, six companies of the Kennebec detachment or division took up the line of march for Houlton.

Mr. Senator Wilhaas addressed a small number of the citizens of Portland on the 8th instant, at the district court room. In reply to the question, whether the special minister would be appointed immediately, and what section of country he would probably be taken from, Mr. Wilhaas observed that no appointment would be made until time was allowed for our present duties to reach England, and intelligence received from our minister already there; and that when the appointment was made, some one out of New-England would probably be selected as the minister.

The St. John (N. B.) Courier of the 2d instant, reports the arrival, that morning, of H. M. ship Crocodile from Halifax with six officers and 190 men of the 69th regiment. They were to proceed to Fredericton as soon as the necessary conveyance could be procured. The transports Eliza and Numa, with the remainder of the regiment had not arrived.

The New York Star says: Mr. Buchanan, who has been with Sir John Blakey, gives it as his opinion that Sir John will make no hostile movements unless receiving positive orders to that effect from his government.

The president, we learn, instructs general Scott to insist upon the withdrawal of the Maine troops.

Correspondence of the Boston Atlas.

Bangor, Saturday, March 9, 1839.

The news from the frontier to-day is of the most exciting character. The vidette express arrived about one o'clock this afternoon, having left Houlton at eleven o'clock last night, with despatches from general Hodson to governor Fairfield, which were immediately forwarded by express to Augusta. The vidette stated verbally that Sir John Harvey had despatched a body of engineers to take possession of Mars Hill, to choose a location for fortifications, and spot out a road, and that they were immediately to be supported by eight companies of regular troops, two of which had already arrived at Fredericton. The principal elevation of the highlands, called Mars Hill, is within the state of Maine, being west of the boundary line; but those highlands extend beyond the line into the province of New Brunswick. The statement is, that this judgment of the British forces is to be made west of the line, and of course on our territory. I cannot think the news will prove to be true to this extent. It is not so improbable, however, that Sir John will plant himself upon or near the line at Mars Hill, as it is at this point that the undisputed course of the boundary terminates, the true direction, according to the American claim, being due north-west, and the British contending that from Mars Hill the line should diverge in a southerly direction, and run between the head of the St. John and those of the Penobscot and Kennebec.

That there is some foundation for the story cannot be doubted, as it is also communicated in a letter from the secretary of gen. Hodson, and by him stated to be the cause of the express to the governor. True or false, this intelligence has excited the liveliest interest, and much agitation in our community—extras from the Whig and Courier office are sought with the greatest avidity, and the demand for the last hour has exceeded the supply.

I have seen a letter dated yesterday, from one of the officers at Houlton, brought by the same express as the above news, but probably written before this information reached there, as it makes no reference to it. It states that four companies of general Hodson's detachment were to march that day, and the remaining five companies on Monday at 8 o'clock. Their destination was the mouth of the Presque Isle, a stream that flows into the Aroostook on letter G, about ten miles higher up than the lowest position taken up by Mr. Jarvis. Several companies had already reached there, and huts for the accommodation of the troops had been erected at that point, beyond which they will not proceed for the present. The forces had been detained longer at Houlton than was expected, in consequence of the difficulties and delay necessarily attendant upon furnishing provisions, clothing and other munitions of war for men so unexpectedly obliged to march into the midst of a desert forest to take up their position.

The writer says he had been informed by a gentleman who left Fredericton on Wednesday, that 200 regular troops left there that day, which would arrive the day before direct from Halifax. 500 regulars had reached Grand Falls from Canada some days before.

There had been three or four regimental parades of our forces at Houlton, and their appearance was in the highest degree creditable to them, and honorable to the state. The state of their discipline and their soldier-like deportment excited the surprise of all who saw them, especially of many provincials who were present. He particularly designates the Dexter rifle company, the Bangor rifle company, the Bangor Independent volunteers, and major Smith's battalion of artillery from Bangor, as deserving of all praise, and thinks they would not suffer in comparison with many bodies of regular troops. They have made great progress in drill and discipline since they left here. They owe this improvement to being constantly under arms, and being drilled, and firing at a target, four hours each day, in pursuance of a general order, by companies. To excite their emulation in target firing, the names of those who made the best shots are recorded on the detachment orderly book.

Correspondence of the Atlas.

Augusta, Sunday, March 10, 1839.

The detachments of troops from the Oxford and Cumberland divisions are yet here. I learn they received marching orders yesterday morning—but before any of them had left the orders were countermanded. It is now understood that governor Fairfield will send in a message to the legislature to-morrow, and the probability is, that the troops now here, will remain until there has been some action in the legislature on the subject of our border troubles.

Important, if true. The Boston Courier's correspondent, under date of Houlton, American head quarters, March 8th, says:

The 11th regiment from Canada, for several days have been at Madawaska. A respectable gentleman from Woodsto k states that a special message from gov. Harvey passed up through that town night before las , with orders for the troops to remove from Madawaska, that being a part of the disputed territory. There is no doubt that gov. Harvey is sincerely desirous of peace, and that he is willing to comply to the letter with the arrangement of Mr. Fox. We have nothing new from the militia on the disputed territory—they are building block houses in several places, out of the timber which was cut down by plunderers, and are said to be in excellent spirits.

Extract from Bangor, Saturday evening, March 9: Gentlemen just from the Aroostook confirm the former reports that we have had, that the British are concentrating Aroostook force upon the St. John, near the Grand Falls. Any attempt by Maine to exercise jurisdiction north of St. John, would undoubtedly be resisted by the British, with arms. They have an arsenal filled with all kinds of munitions of war, on the Tennessanota lake.

The greatest panic and alarm exists in New Brunswick, both from fear of invasion by our troops and the disastrous consequences that must follow from the disturbances. Almost the entire capital of the province was invested in these plundering operations.

The civil forces under Jarvis are disbanded, only a few are retained to complete and protect the boom across the Aroostook, that two acres were cleared, and a substantial fort erected which would withstand any attack of the enemy—that Fishberri's house has been razed to the ground, as it was in their way—that they anticipated an attack, not from the regulars out from a mob—that he did not hear any thing about "fortifying Mars Hills—the enemy, amounting to 400 or 500, were within four miles of the camp—that the day before he left, they destroyed four or five camps, and took 20 tons hay, 100 bushels oats, 20 barrels of pork, and their utensils, all of which were taken into our camp. They took about seventy thousand boards, which were very convenient in constructing their camps.

From the Mechanic and Farmer, extra—Saturday evening. The new draft in this division to make up nine. Hudson's complement, will assemble at Bangor on Monday or Tuesday, and leave soon to Houlton, under command of lieu. James Dunning, who arrived here yesterday.

Extract of a letter from an American officer, dated Houlton, March 8.

The last of our detachments moves on Monday morning. Four companies start to-morrow morning. We have now a prospect of business enough. We have received intelligence that the British engineer and men were to start this morning to spot out a road, and select a site for a fortification on Mars hills. Two companies of regulars arrived in Woodstock this afternoon. Six more are said to be moving up river. God grant that no pacific measures may retard us. Our troops are in the best possible temper for action, and with few exceptions, evince unabated ardor. The express waits.

New York legislature—The boundary troubles. On Thursday the 7th governor Seward transmitted the following message to the New York legislature. In the house it was referred to a select committee: Albany, March 7, 1839.

To the legislature:

The Congress of the United States, having had under consideration immediately previous to their adjournment the serious mis-understanding which has arisen between the state of Maine and the province of New Brunswick, passed an act giving to the president of the United States additional powers for the public defence against invasion and for other purposes. By this act, the president is authorized to resist any attempt on the part of Great Britain to enforce by arms her claims to exclusive jurisdiction over that part of the state of Maine which is in dispute between the United States and Great Britain, and for that purpose to employ the naval and military forces of the United States, and such portion of the militia as he may deem it advisable to call into service, and to increase the military and naval forces of the Union in the event of invasion, or imminent danger of invasion. Provision is also made or sending a special minister to Great Britain, to treat with the government of that country upon an amicable adjustment of the matters in difference between the two nations.

While the several state governments should carefully abstain from any act that might in any degree interfere with the constitutional duties of the Federal government, it is obvious that occasions may arise in which they ought to make known to the government, to foreign nations, and to any aggrieved sister state, that we are an united people, jealous of our sovereignty, and determined to resist aggression upon the rights or territory of the union. The passage of the act of congress to which I have referred provisionally contemplates that the country may, during the recess of that body, be compelled to assume an attitude of defence against a foreign power, and seems therefore to present one of those occasions which call for such an expression on the part of the several states.

The measures adopted by congress seem to me to have been wisely designed to preserve the existing inestimable relations of peace between this country and Great Britain, as well as to vindicate the rights of the state of Maine, and to maintain the honor and dignity of the nation. It can scarcely be believed that enlightened and Christian nations, bound to each other in peculiar relations of feeling and of interest, will necessarily suffer the harmony existing between them to be interrupted. The governments of both, as well as their individual citizens, are under the strongest obligations to cultivate every disposition to amity, and to repress all tendencies to hostile action. At the same time, peace is seldom the lot of any nation which does not, on all proper occasions, manifest that it knows its rights, and will at all hazards maintain them. I respectfully call your attention to the subject, under the expectation that an expression on our part of concurrence in the policy of the general government will contribute to avert the calamities of war, and secure the speedy and honorable adjustment of the existing differences between this country and Great Britain.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

CANADA AFFAIRS. A letter from gen. Skinner to governor Seward, dated Plattsburg, Feb. 26th, states that the building occupied by the United States troops at Rousse's Point, together with the dwelling house of Messrs. Norton and White, were consumed by fire on Sunday night. A considerable quantity of the military stores were also destroyed. The writer says—

There appears to be some cause for believing it may have been the work of one or more of a party of volunteers stationed in Oiletown. Several of this party came on Sunday to Comer's store, situated directly on the line, partly in Canada and partly in the United States, and raised a British flag, with much cheering, &c. Several others were at Merchon's tavern, some mile and a half this side the line, and in the immediate neighborhood of the barracks, Sunday afternoon and evening, drinking and carousing until a late hour, and immediately after the alarm of fire was given, an individual resembling the volunteers in dress and appearance, particularly in the large cap worn by them, was seen running through the fields to the north.

Despatches have reached sir John Colborne, brought by the Great Western, confirming his suspension of judges Bedard, Panet, and Sir R. B. and clearing their issue of writs of habeas corpus illegal.

The power of the special council to alter the criminal law of the province, is asserted by the law officers of the crown, the special council being held to possess the same authority as the superseded legislature.

The proceedings of sir John Colborne in constituting the court-martial, and of that court in trying the prisoners, are sanctioned and approved.

[Express.

The Montreal Herald of the 21st ult, states that one hundred and eighty persons had been sentenced to death by two courts martial—137 at Fort Henry, and 43 at London—the time and place of execution to be left to the lieu. governor, and twenty four of the condemned recommended to the merciful consideration of the lieutenant governor. Three persons tried before the court at Fort Henry, and one at London, were acquitted of the offence of which the rest were convicted—that of "having been unlawfully and traitorously in arms against our lady the queen."

From Upper Canada. We learn from the Kingston Chronicle that another duel has been fought at Sandwich, between col. Prince and Charles Baby, esq., in which the latter was shot dead. This is the second duel in which col. Prince has been recently engaged, in consequence of the disapprobation felt and expressed at his shooting of the prisoners. In the other, his antagonist, Mr. Wood, was wounded in the face. It is said that several other duels are in prospect, col. Prince have challenged a number of persons, and on account of the same matter.

We have received a copy of the speech of sir George Arthur, at the opening of the provincial parliament, on the 27th ultimo. It is a public document of considerable interest. Nearly four columns are devoted to general remarks upon the late rebellion and invasion.

Governor Arthur congratulates the legislature upon the present tranquillity of the province and security of the frontier, but declares his belief that the dangers are far from being entirely at an end. He maintains that the motives which caused those dangers are still existing with unabated force; and that henceforth the province must chiefly rely upon its own ability to repel and punish hostile aggression. He therefore recommends early attention to such amendments of the militia laws as shall place that force on the best possible footing.

The agitating question of the clergy reserves is earnestly commended to the early action of the legislature.

An intimation is thrown out that the prisoners now under sentence of death will be transported to a penal colony. [N. Y. Com. Ado.

FROM MEXICO. From the New Orleans Bulletin, Feb. 26. The United States sloop of war Levant, Hiram Paulding, esq. commander, touched at the Balize on Sunday last, on her way from Vera Cruz (whence she sailed on the 14th inst) to Pensacola. She brings about $40,000 specie.

The federal party appears to be triumphing throughout the principal states of the Mexican republic.

Gen. Arista, who was made prisoner by the French at the time an attempt was made to force them to quit the harbor of Vera Cruz, has been liberated, and was expected to arrive in the city of Mexico about the 5th February. Gen. Santa Ana left Vera Cruz on the 12th inst., for the seat of government, to enter upon the duties of president ad interim, while Bustamante at the head of a strong force, marched against Tampico—and as our advices from that place represent Gen. Urrea determined to cut his way into the thickest of the central party, we may soon expect to have tidings of a bloody and probably decisive battle being fought somewhere in the vicinity of San Louis Potosi.

The blockade of Vera Cruz was still vigorously enforced.

We likewise have an arrival from Matamoros, but no news of interest. An American sloop of war was off that place on the 12th inst.—supposed to be the Warren.

A gentleman who sailed from Tampico on the 15th February states that the intelligence from the frontier was favorable to the arms and progress of the federal party. The port of Tampico was not blockaded by any ships of war, nor was there any restriction upon commerce with the interior. Heavy gales of wind were experienced in the Gulf between the 1st and 12th of February, but no shipwrecks were reported.

FLORIDA. An officer of the army who reached Savannah on the 5th instant, informs the editor of the Georgian that lieutenant Mackall, of the 1st artillery, was shot at a few days before by Indians, while on Biscayen beach, and received two balls through the body; but we are pleased to learn that the wounds are not considered mortal. He was in company with captain Tathen, of the steamer Pointsett, and his men were about two hundred yards distant at the time. The savages fired from a thicket, and escaped.

We regret to state also that major Noel, of the 5th infantry, shot himself accidentally with his own pistol a few days since, while on a scouting party against Indians, a few of whom were taken prisoners. Major N. had his pistol cocked, and going off unexpectedly, it inflicted on him a dangerous wound.

Extract from a letter dated Tallahassee, (Florida,) on February 20.

On Monday night last, the house of captain White, twelve miles from this city, on the Magnolia road, was attacked by Indians, who killed one man and two children, and wounded a man and woman, and burned the house. The same night, a house near Monticello was also burned by them; and on Thursday of the same week, another on the St. Marks road, nine miles from Tallahassee, when they murdered a man and his wife and their children. The inhabitants of St. Marks and Tallahassee turned out in pursuit, and had a fight with a party of Indians, when one of the Tallahassee Guards and one Indian were killed, and seven Indians wounded. Since writing the above, I have learned that the Indians have seized on several wagons on the St. Augustine road, about twelve miles east of Tallahassee, and killed the drivers. Thirty volunteers have just started in pursuit of them. The country appears full of Indians, and we know not when we are safe from them."

LIABILITY OF SHIP CAPTAINS. In the common pleas, yesterday, Judge Ingraham presiding, captain F. McLean, master of the British bark Colchester, was acquitted in a verdict for $134 37, at the suit of James Farish; and another for $77 18, at the suit of David Dobie. The suits were separately brought by the plaintiffs, for recovery of the above sums paid (interest deducted) by them to capt. McLean for three passages to England in the Colchester—for Dobie, Farish and his sister. It appeared from the testimony that the Colchester was advertised to leave this port for Liverpool on the 14th of October last, on which day these plaintiffs and other passengers went on board, and the vessel was towed round to the North river. Owing to unsettled business of the ship, and bad weather, the ship did not drop down to quarantine till the 9th, and during that time the captain was laid up at Washington hotel with sickness, the 2d mate was taken from the ship by warrant, and the crew mutinied, but were pacified by the mate by means of ardent spirits and brandy. At the quarantine, on the 14th, capt. McLean came on board, and the vessel put to sea, but he left her to the pilot, and in consequence of his leaving, the plaintiffs in due season left her also at the same time, being afraid to venture the voyage in her, unofficered as she was, and with a crew not to be relied upon. The captain refused to refund their passage money; they brought these suits against him, with the results above stated.

Besides these parties there were other passengers who went out in the Colchester, one of whom was an acquaintance of ours, who has since written us an account of the passage. The first mate, (the only officer on board,) is well spoken of by our correspondent, but the voyage is described by the writer as one of the most protracted, hazardous and unprosperous in every respect, that we have read of not terminating in shipwreck, actual starvation and death. MISSOURI—HER TRADE WITH MEXICO. The message of Gov. Libbitt W. Boggs, of Missouri, is a very able document. The finances of the state are in good condition—the state bank not so well, and requiring amendments to its charter. A geological survey of the state is urged; the entire New York school system seems to have been adopted by its excellency. The point, however, of the most moment, is a recommendation to petition congress to grant at once to land traders the same drawbacks on exports of foreign goods, cottons, &c. to Chihuahua, a central city of Mexico, as is allowed to shipping merchants from New York for Vera Cruz, &c. The governor says, if this plain principle of justice were accorded, Missouri would employ 600 wagons and 1000 men annually in this trade, made doubly valuable by the city above mentioned, annually a specie business of three millions. The greatest city, too, is about equal distance from Vera Cruz and St. Louis, and from the latter there a capital wagon road the whole route. The city has 15,000 inhabitants. [Boston Morning Post.]

RUSSIA—THE GRAIN TRADE. The Philadelphia Commercial List republishes from Bell's London Messenger the following document on this subject:

Alaska, December 20. The governor general of the Russian colonies, general Fiederoff, and also the commander-in-chief of the military colonies, count De Witt, have received an imperial rescript, the substance of which is as follows, viz: "The emperor, desirous to assist foreign nations who are in want of corn, and at the same time to enable Russian merchants to satisfy without loss of the orders for corn which may have been, or might hereafter be, addressed to them, has ordered that three-fourths of the corn now stored in the government reserve magazines, and those of the military colonies, may be lent to Russian merchants, and they could show that they had received orders for corn from foreign countries. "That the loan of this corn should be completely gratuitous, but on the condition that the borrowers should restore it in kind in the space of six months."

FRENCH ARSENALS. France has eight arsenals of artillery, at Douai, Metz, Strasbourg, Auxonne, Grenoble, Toulouse, Rennes, and Fere; two military depots of saltpetre, at Chalons-sur-Mare and Vizignou; three canon foundries, at Douai, Strasbourg and Toulouse (the latter belonging to a private individual—they furnish annually from 450 to 600 pieces of cannon of different calibres); six iron foundries, at Mezieres, Metz, Besancon, Toulouse, Rennes, and Nevers; five manufactories of arms, at Chatelleraut, Klingenthal, Mulzig, St.

Etienne, and Tulle; eleven powder mills, which annually furnish from 1,500,000 to 2,000,000 kilograms of powder, at Esqueres, St. Ponce, Metz, Vouges, St. Chamans, Toulouse, Angoulême, St. Medard, Pont de-Buis, Le Bouchet, and Le Ripault; seven saltpetre refining establishments, at Lisle, Nancy, Toulouse, Marseilles, Bordeaux, Paris, and Le Ripault.

FORGERIES IN FRANCE ON ENGLISH BANKS. An individual named Raimond d'Henard appeared the day before yesterday before the court of assizes, on the charge of having presented various forged bills upon London and Manchester, in the year 1835, at the banking houses of Messrs. F. Perre and Chanks de Laffitte, and having by such means realized the sum of 220,000*l.* It appears that the confidence of the Paris bankers was due principally to the circumstance that the prisoner had been an acquaintance of count d'Orsay. Since the period when the offence had been committed, d'Henard had been travelling under fictitious names in different towns of England, and had afterwards proceeded in succession to Rotterdam, Hamburg, Switzerland, Italy, &c. He was finally arrested at Florence on the charge of forging and travelling with a false passyort, and his extradition was ultimately obtained. In his defence, he stated that he was the victim of an adventurer, who had assumed the name of the English banker Drummond, and who had enclosed to him in a letter the forged bills to obtain cash for them. He added that he had met this individual by appointment at the cafe des Panoramas, and placed in his hands 210,000 francs, which he had obtained for the bills. He was found guilty, and sentenced to twelve years hard labour at the hulks, to live in the pillory, and to a fine of 100 francs. [Gulligan.]

SUMMONING THE QUEEN. Yesterday as the new police was made into yards of the Queen-square police office, Stowell the informer, ordered the driver to stop. The van at this office has only been in operation for three or four days, and the policeman who drove it refused to draw up. The informer then produced from under his arm a large quarto volume, containing statistics of every description, and pointed out to the astonishment of the constable, the act of William IV., by which he was, in the first instance, empowered to lay information against the proprietor, driver, or conductor, of any "carriage, van, or other vehicle," upon which the name and address of the owner did not appear in legible characters. He was only pointed upon this vehicle the letters V. R.; and Stowell, after producing the act, told the driver that he would immediately told him his name he should give him into the custody of one of his brother policemen. He had laid information against the present king of Hanover, lord Melbourne, etc., in which he had obtained convictions; and he did not see why the queen should be spared. The driver gave his name, and the informer, after detaining the van for about a quarter of an hour, applied for a summons, which was granted by Mr. Grogote, the sitting magistrate. [London paper.]

AMERICAN CUTLERY. It is highly creditable to the mechanical genius of this country that it is able, after the experience of only a few years, to furnish to the nations of Europe articles for the supply of which we were previously dependent on them. The following instances mentioned in the New York Courier, is a pleasing case in point:

If any person had suggested twenty years ago that at this time we would be sufficiently advanced in the mechanic arts to rival in workmanship and elegance the most difficult branches of the English manufactures in iron, he would have been put down as a fool or a madman. And yet such is the fact. We have recently had exhibited to us a pair of tailor's shears, manufactured by Robert Ward, of this city; for a fashionable tailor in London, which exceeds in finish and beauty of workmanship any article of cutlery that we have ever seen. The iron used was from the Elizabeth works, New Jersey, and the patent screw of brass, and all was manufactured at the works of Robert Hoe & Co. of this city. Mr. Ward, the manufacturer of this beautiful specimen of American skill, received the first premium on his cutlery at the fair of the American institute last autumn.

THE IRON STEAMBOAT. The friends of internal navigation will be pleased to learn the success of the first experiments made by the "Robert F. Stockton," a small iron steamboat built in England, for towing on the Delaware and Raritan canal. The Liverpool Albion gives the following account of her performances:

"We are gratified in giving the result of some of her first experiments on the Thames. On Saturday week she was on the river with a party of about thirty gentlemen, invited to witness her performance, all of whom were astonished at her speed, nine miles being run with the tide in about five minutes. Suppose two and a half miles allowance for the tide, there would be left full twelve miles an hour for the speed of the boat. But her triumphant experiment was made on Wednesday last, when she was put to the task she was designed for, showing her power for towing. Four loaded coal-barges were made fast to the Robert F. Stockton, making, in all, 59 feet 1 inch beam with square ends and upright sides, besides the steamer. All ridiculed the idea of attempting, with so small a boat, to tow such an immense, ugly mass, and the coal heavers swore they would "eat her" if she moved them at all." In less than one minute from the starting of the engine, it was at the speed of 49 revolutions in a minute, and actually towed the whole one measured mile in eleven minutes, the water being perfectly still."

An iron steamboat, 145 feet long and 25 feet wide, was launched at Dumbarton on the 22d of January. She is intended for South America, and is fitted up for passengers only, of whom she can carry 1000. When launched she drew only 18 inches water, and with her machinery and cargo is to draw but three feet.

STEAM VESSELS OF WAR. A correspondent in England has favored us with the annexed statement of the steam force of England, France, and Russia, copied from sir John Burrows's life of lord Anson:

Steam govern-ment ships.	Ordinary mission.	Build-Total.
England, - - - 5	2	5
On foreign stations, - - - 13	-	13
Post office packets 28	-	28
Total	-	53

Of which twelve are ships of war.
France, - - - 22	6
Russia, - - - 8	9

Be it remembered that on this 25th day of February, 1839, the United States of America, to oppose the above 93 steamships, have one whole steamboat, of all of which is in commission. Some weeks ago a committee of congress was instructed to inquire into the expediency of constructing a few more, but we have seen no mention of their report. Perhaps they find it difficult to determine whether any more are wanted. In case of a war with either of the above mentioned powers, the understanding of the gentlemen will be enlightened.

ATLANTIC STEAM NAVIGATION. An interesting letter on this subject, from an American citizen in London, is contained in a late number of the New York Courier. The writer furnishes the following list of steam vessels now employed in navigating the Atlantic, and also those which are being built for that purpose:

Great Western—1350 tons, 450 horse power, built in Bristol.
British Queen—1800 tons, 560 horse power, built in London.
Liverpool—1050 tons, 464 horse power, built in Liverpool.
President (Am'n.) 2400 tons, 600 horse power—London.
United States—1250 tons, 420 horse power—Liverpool.
United Kingdom—1250 tons, 420 horse power—Liverpool.
Atlanta—1250 tons, 350 horse power, (iron)—Liverpool.
New York—to be built in Bristol of iron.

He then proceeds in the following interesting train of remark:

This in the course of two years there will be employed between England and the United States no less than eight British steam ships; and allowing each to perform eight voyages per annum, we shall have a steam conveyance at intervals of every six days; thus we shall be indebted to British enterprise and British ships for the means of communicating between these two great countries. Surely the Americans are not to be satisfied with this state of things? Hitherto they have displayed an enterprise unparalleled—an ardor in the pursuit of commerce unequalled—and will they see this great branch of their trade wrested from them without to effort? If there are not the means at present in the United States for making engines equal to the enterprise, they can obtain them in England, and in a very short time it will be found that the American engines will be at least equal to any in the world. Our machinery has hitherto been adapted finished when new species were undescribed in my hands? All that was in my power has been accomplished. All Dr. Townsend's species, and some received through other channels, have been published. To him I am indebted for the valuable notes which he has forwarded to me.

EXPLORING EXPEDITION.

Extract from a letter to the secretary of the navy, from lieutenant Charles Wilkes, commanding the United States South sea surveying and exploring expedition, dated on board the United States sloop Vincennes, harbor of Rio Janeiro, November 27, 1833.

I proceeded with the squadron for Madeira. We continued our cruise with light, favorable winds, without any occurrence of importance until the 6th of September; when, being near a shoal, laid down on the chart as St. Anne's shoal, I deemed it fulfilling instructions to delay sufficiently for the purpose of examining the same; and having fully explored the locality in and near its supposed neighborhood, by spreading the vessels of the squadron to embrace a large circumference of the ocean, nothing of it was discovered. A few hours, however, after leaving this vicinity, we fell in with a large cotton wool tree, 120 feet in length and 15 feet in circumference, which was at first reported as a shoal; and if the sea had been at all rough, it might, in passing, have been mistaken for one.

I have little doubt but similar trees have occasioned the frequent reports of vigias or shoals being in existence hereabouts. Our position at this time was in latitude 32° 03' 37" north, and longitude 40° 41' 54" west, and where any floating bodies were in the gulf stream would probably have been deposited, as there is little or no current, and that variable.

We arrived at Funchall, in the island of Madeira, on the 16th of September, after a pleasant passage of twenty-nine days.

I directed a party of officers to make an excursion to Pico Ricivo, the highest point in Madeira, for the purpose of ascertaining its barometrical measurement, in regard to which doubts have existed, owing to a disagreement of those who have preceded us.

Our observations were conducted with great care, and the barometers used were of the best manufacture of Thouglton and Simus. Simultaneous observations were made at the residence of the American consul at Funchall, who was kind enough to afford us every means within his reach to facilitate our various duties.

The party remained on the summit of the mountain over four hours, which afforded us an opportunity of making a number of simultaneous observations, the result of which, in giving the height of Pico Ricivo, was as follows:

The highest point of the peak above the consul's garden, was 6,181 feet.

The cistern of the barometer at the garden above half tide carefully levelled, was 56-6237 feet.

I feel much confidence in our result, although, from the high standing of captain Sabine, R. A. I feel some hesitation in putting it forth; but the fact of my being supported by such high authority as Dr. Bowditch and Dr. Heineker, with whom we have differed only seventy-three feet, and one hundred and sixty-three feet, induced me to believe that some accidental error must have occurred in captain Sabine's observations, or that he was misled by his guides, and stopped short of the summit of the mountain as they attempted with our party.

It appears, also, that the different results made at three separate periods, and by different persons, approaching so near each other, would be more correct than that of captain Sabine, who makes a difference of nearly seven hundred feet.

We made, also, a series of magnetical observations on shore for dips and intensity, and established the rates of our chronometers by a portable transit. We made by them the longitude of the consulate at Funchall, in 16° 54' 11" west, and found the latitude by observation to be 32° 33' 11" north, all which assured me that our chronometers had been performing well since our departure from the United States.

On the 25th September, having completed all that was deemed necessary, we sailed from Madeira, and stood to the southward, intending to pass over and search for the different shoals and vigias laid down on our track. After passing the latitude of the Canary islands, we experienced a northeasterly current of about half a mile an hour, until we reached the latitude of Bonavista, one of the Cape de Verdes, which sets in an opposite direction to the current said to prevail between these islands, in the longitude from 19 to 21° west. We have too, and tried the current morning and evening, and always found the same result. The current flow was two knots, with a distance line of five fathoms between them, the lower one being just loaded sufficiently to sink the air light one under the surface of the water, with the usual log line attached to the centre of the distance line, precluding the possibility of its being a surface current; besides which, the dead reckoning of the ship, and our observations gave the same result.

On the 29th of September we passed into colored water, quite as green in appearance as that of fifty fathoms in depth, on soundings. On entering it, the temperature decreased one and a half degrees, and rose two degrees on leaving it.

We continued in it until the 2d of October, having run a distance of four hundred and fifty miles. The vessels of the squadron repeatedly sounded with from one to three hundred fathoms of line, but no bottom was found.

The first reported shoal laid down on our route upon the charts was the Maria rock, in latitude 19° 47' north, and longitude 20° 50' west, which we stood for, and bore very near the position, until we had ascertained our position correctly, by careful observations. The vessels were then spread, and the course marked to run directly over the spot, the surface of the ocean visible at the time from the squadron, was not less than sixty miles in circumference, with every opportunity which the clear weather could afford, and sufficient swell of the sea on, to have caused breakers on any shoal within fifteen feet of the surface. Nothing, however, was discovered, and no bottom could be found with three hundred fathoms of line.

The next position examined, was Bona Felix shoal, said to be within thirty miles of Maria rock; this we searched for in the same manner, but were equally unsuccessful.

We then stood for the place assigned the Bonetta shoal to the eastward of Bonavista, said to be in latitude 16° 32' north, and in longitude 20° 37' west. We, in like manner, hunted for this, and, after exploring the locality of its position on the chart, I steered on the course of its reported bearing east by north from Bonavista until nearly up with the Hart reef, lying in sight of Bonavista, which has, without doubt, been taken for and reported as the small cille Bonetta.

Our inquiries at St. Juan assured me that the Madeline (the vessel last wrecked) was cast away on the Hart reef, which they have reported as the Bonetta shoal.

I am well satisfied that the positions assigned the above three shoals on the chart, and their vicinity, are free from all dangers.

I am of opinion, also, that the particular and indefatigable search made by capt. Bartholomew, of her majesty's ship Leven, and the opportunities afforded me of covering, with the squadron of five vessels, so large a space, at the same time, ought to be sufficient evidence that no such dangers exist as are laid down in those positions, and should cause them to be obliterated from the charts.

From Port Praya, we steered for Patty's overfalls, as laid down in the chart, in latitude 11° north, and longitude 24° 30' west, and had a good opportunity of examining their locality. A few reefs were observed within a degree of the situation assigned them, but little or no current was found; and I feel confident in asserting that no danger exists in this vicinity, as we were becalmed in the position, and in close proximity to it for forty-eight hours, the squadron, as usual, being spread apart, and having a broad expanse of ocean under view.

Owing to light contrary winds, it was some days before we reached Warley's shoal, said to be in latitude 5° 4' north, and longitude 21° 25' west. This point was also carefully examined, but no shoal or appearance of shoal water, or any danger discovered.

Our next examination was of French shoal, said to be (as laid down) in latitude 4° 5' north, and longitude 20° 35' west. This was also examined, and no danger or appearance of shoal discovered.

From this point, I took advantage of the south easterly wind, and proceeded east; which, according to the position assigned the shoal by the French hydrographers, to enable me to cross the equator eastward of the seventeenth degree of west longitude.

We succeeded in crossing the equator in that longitude on the 5th of November, and then stood for Triton's bank, said to be in latitude 00° 32' south, and longitude 17° 46' west. When within a short distance of its position, the squadron hove to for the purpose of ascertaining our position accurately; after which a course was steered nearly west. Being at the time well to the eastward, we ran on a line the east and west over it; the vessel of the squadron being spread about three miles apart, on a line north and south. We did not, however, find it in our progress, or any bottom or indications of soundings; no discoloration of water was visible, or change of temperature, although the line extended thirty miles east and west of its reported position; after which we again stood to the north, and ran over a vigia as laid down on the charts, but none such was found in existence.

Our next examination was for Bonert's Sandy island, which was in like manner carefully searched after, in and around its position as laid down on the charts, but our search was equally unsuccessful.

Finally, search was made in and about latitude 2° 43' south, and longitude 20° 35' west. Extending to the north, northwest of this point a distance of thirty miles herabouts, having been reported as the situation of the submarine volcano assigned by Minira Krusinstien, which it was supposed might have left a shoal. This locality was twice run over in different directions, and carefully examined with the squadron in open order, but none such was found in existence.

Lieutenant Hudson, of the Peacock, having separated from me on the 16th of October, proceeded on a different course in search of the same shoals which we were looking for, but was equally unsuccessful in finding any, as appears by the following extract from his report to me, which affords further evidence, if it were needed, of their non-existence.

"Having separated from you on the 16th of October, I was not until the 23d that I had worked up to directly on the spot where it was laid down on the chart. We placed good lookouts, and kept our patent lead going for fifty miles before reaching the location of this shoal as laid down on the chart; also observing our drift at night, in hopes of sweeping over it at early daylight.

"I continued cruising in this vicinity various directions, getting casts of lead in from 50 to 100 fathoms, without finding bottom.

"I now continued my examination, and after having swept over a circle of 40 or 50 miles in different directions, am perfectly satisfied that Warley's shoal exists nowhere in the neighborhood laid down on the chart.

"I then proceeded for the French shoal with the wind ahead, (south by west,) where I arrived on the 25th of October, and continued cruising all the following day, with a fine breeze, immediately over the location of the shoal as laid down, and in every direction for miles in its vicinity. I then threw the anchor, searching the English shoal, and directed my course for the French position, seventy six miles distant, making nearly an east course, with lookouts, and the lead going, until I had run immediately over and around the spot, sailing in various directions, a distance of forty miles, without effect.

"I then made the best of my way for the Triton bank, with the wind veering and hailing from south southwest, to south southeast, and passed the equator on the night of the 3d of November, in longitude 17° 40' west, and continued over and around the locality of that bank, until the morning of the 5th, getting casts of the lead during the time in from fifty to two hundred and fifty fathoms, up and down, without finding bottom.

"I have, in our search, fully satisfied myself, and hope our examination will prove equally so to you, and all others, that these shoals do not exist."

Thus, sir, we have effected the examination of the supposed position of eleven shoals or dangers, which have occupied their places on the charts, much to the alarm of navigators. And I sincerely trust that the result of our endeavors and diligent search, with the exertions heretofore made by others, will be sufficient to cause them to be obliterated from the charts, as there are already real dangers sufficient to awaken the watchfulness of the navigator without his being harassed with imaginary ones.

LATEST FROM MEXICO.

From the New Orleans Commercial Bulletin, Feb. 28.

From Matamoros. The U. S. sloop of war Vandalia, Urah P. Levy, commander, arrived at the southwest pass on the morning of the 26th instant, from Matamoros.

Several of the officers of the Vandalia, with money, and twelve Mexican passengers, have come to town in the towboat Tiger.

The Vandalia sailed from Matamoros on the 21st instant. The city was garrisoned by the government troops under gen. Cavalizo, and was strongly fortified. An army of 700 federalists were encamped near, awaiting the arrival of gen. Urea with a large reinforcement of federal troops. His arrival would be the signal for the commencement of hostilities. Regular siege would then be laid to Matamoros, and vigorously prosecuted till the garrison surrendered or the assailants were repulsed. From the interior, no news had been received, communication having been interrupted by the turbulent state of the country.

We are under obligations to the politeness of Captain Nicholas, of the United States government packet Woodbury, (arrived last late evening at the southwest pass, seven days from Matamoros.) for files of the Diario del Gobierno, Mexico, and El Telgrafista, Tampico. Their contents are of varied interest, but not particularly important, the same dates having been previously received. In the Diario it is gravely affirmed that the lifting of the blockade from the port of Tampico is the result of the conduct of general Urea in favor of the French. Serious apprehensions, it appears, were entertained by some that the holders of Mexican bonds in London had some idea of taking possession of the public domain. To this, however, there are undoubted objections.

A commercial house in this city had the kindness to favor us with the perusal of several very interesting letters from Mexico. We give the following extract:

"Vera Cruz, Feb. 7.

"The same state of affairs continues; nothing is known positively, but, for the last four days, an opinion is gaining ground that matters will soon be arranged, at least so as to allow the discharge of the cargoes now in port. Santa Anna, by a process, it is said, not unprecedented in his political career, has suddenly declared for peace, and says the government can accept the plan proposed by Mr. Pakenham. They await his approval. He has started for Mexico, and says that within three days after his arrival there, a decision will be come to. About thirty merchant vessels are lying in the harbor and at Sacrificios. Vera Cruz is still deserted, although a number of foreigners have returned. I do not suppose there are 500 souls inside the walls."

From the New Orleans Courier, Feb. 28.

Later intelligence from Mexico was received in this city yesterday. It appears that Mr. Pakenham, the English minister, is exerting himself to induce the Mexican government to make peace with France, and on the 12th of February it was believed in the capital he would succeed.

In the mean time, we are told of the march of troops in various directions; and the federal party seem determined to strain every nerve to put down their opponents. The wretched manner in which Bustamante has conducted the war with France, and the embarrassments occasioned by the blockade, will weaken the influence of the central party; but we still think they will finally triumph, as the priests and old Spaniards are opposed to the federalists, and in the capital and many other parts of Mexico their influence is irresistible. The most that can result from the efforts of Urea, Mexico, and others, may be the separation of one or two states from the central government. The good understanding between general Urea and the French admiral, and the disposition evinced by the latter to meddle in the intestine quarrels of Mexico, are not calculated to make either very popular with the thinking and patriotic portion of the Mexicans.

In a month's time we may expect to have something definitive from Mexico. An arrangement of the dispute with France seems very probable, and we hope will take place. Her internal harmony could then be left to purge themselves, without interfering with or interrupting the trade and business of other people.

DOCUMENTS RELATIVE TO MEXICO.

From the Louisianian, March 1.

The following documents have been placed in our hands for publication. The first is an interesting letter from admiral Baudin to the generals Urea and Mexico; the second is worthy of perusal, at affording a faithful description of the present condition of Vera Cruz and the country round about. All its statements may be implicitly relied on:

His majesty's frigate the Neride.

Anton Lizardo, January 15, 1839.

EXCELLENCIES: I received yesterday your letter which I had the honor to address to me the date of the 6th of this month, accrediting to me the commandant Reiband, of the national Mexican navy.

I had great satisfaction repeating verbally to commandant Reiband what I had already the honor of making known to his excellency, general Don Jos Urea, to wit: that France is not hostile to whomsoever is not hostile to her.

So soon as I was informed that the French brig Fanny, detained in the river Pannco, was released and that the decree of expulsion issued against the French by the government of Mexico had not been promulgated within the limits of the states which have declared in favor of the federal constitution, that, on the contrary, my countrymen found security, kindness, and justice in these states, I hastened to give orders to my cruizers to leave the entrance into Tampico unobscured.

I am disposed to do the same thing by all the ports of the Mexican states which shall adopt the same principles and pursue the same conduct.

Your excellencies will no doubt understand that in order to complete the generosity and equity o your system, it will be proper to admit the French flag, like all others, into the ports which acknowledge the federal government.

There is no war, in fact, existing between the Mexican and the French nations. The inconceivable obstinacy and the evident bad faith of the cabinet that direct the affairs at Mexico last month, forced me to take as a pledge the fortress of San Juan de Ulloa, and to disarm Vera Cruz. But I now de- clare, as I did when I arrived on this coast two months and a half ago, that France never entertain- ed the slightest intention to oppress or insult the Mexican people—never had a thought in mind of the independence of Mexico and the integrity of her territory. The jealous and hateful passions, the interests of cupidity and ambition, which now ex- cite and agitate the insidious intrigues and decep- tion in the Mexican nation, and excite to war, against France by the most infamous falsehoods, are precisely the interests and passions most op- posed to the prosperity and honor of Mexico: con- trary to her prosperity, because they ruin the re- sources of the country by augmenting beyond mea- sure its expenses; contrary to its honor, because nothing could be more honorable to Mexico than frankly to acknowledge the wrongs she has done, and to repair them in such manner as to prevent all motives of complaint in future. The day is not distant, I trust, when reason and truth will triumph over imposture; when the Mexican people will see how greatly they have been deceived, and for the promotion of what projects of despotism they have been kept in the dark. They will find that, notwith- standing temporary disputes, they have no more sincere and disinterested friends than my country- men. I am happy in believing that this opinion is concurred in by your excellencies, and that you will exert your kind influence to diffuse it among the Mexican people. In the mean time, I present to your excellencies the assurance of my high con- sideration.

Rear-admiral commanding the naval forces of France in the Gulf of Mexico:

CHARLES BAUDIN.

Vera Cruz, January 14.

A fact which shows that government is an enemy to truth is, that the Mexican general Arista, who is now a prisoner in the French squadron, having written to some of his aids de camp and to pre- sident Bustamante himself to make known to them what took place on the 5th December, and to open their eyes to the true intentions of France, his let- ters were sent back to write no more of the same kind for the future.

The admiral thought that general Arista would be glad in his captivity to receive visits from some of his friends, and transmitted a safe conduct to those among them who should choose to see him. The boats of the squadron were placed at their dis- posal to receive them at the port of Anton Lizardo and take them back to the shore. General Arista made a party and preparations to receive the visits of his countrymen, but the government formally prohibited them from going to see him. In this, the govern ment probably acted under the influence of Santa Anna, who fears, above all other things, that a ray of truth should be thrown upon the events of the 5th December, to destroy the popularity which he has acquired by means of the falsehoods which have intoxicated the Mexican people. He calculates on that popularity to open the way to supreme power through the overthrow of Bustamante.

Mr. Pakenham, minister plenipotentiary of Eng- land, who lately landed at Vera Cruz, visited Santa Anna, whose plantation is situate on the road to Mexico. He spent there three hours, and was so shocked at the ambition, the vanity, and the pre- sumption of Santa Anna, that he could hardly (as it is said) restrain himself from expressing his disgust.

One of the principal aims of Mr. Pakenham's visit was to prevail on Santa Anna not to oppose the benevolent views of Admiral C. Baudin, who proposed to sail north into Vera Cruz, and to make it a neutral port, until the differences between France and Mexico should be arranged. That measure forms no part of Santa Anna's plan. He wishes to wait till his wounds shall be suffi- ciently healed to permit his reaching the supreme power. He will then put his creatures in office, in order to enrich himself with the custom-house duties on the cargoes which are now prohibited. It is by means like these that he has amassed his large fortune. So long as he is not pressed to his help, he will do every thing in his power to prevent others from profiting by a source of riches which will be opened the moment that the commercial re- lations of Mexico with foreign nations shall be established. In no hands like these have fallen the destinies of this unfortunate country!

You cannot imagine the dreadful misery that afflicts a population of 6,000 or 7,000 inhabitants, who have emigrated from Vera Cruz and its vil- lages, all of whom have sought refuge in small vil- lages, at the distance of three or four leagues from this place. Their cabins of reeds, exposed to the heat of the sun and to the burning sands, can hardly be used to protect them. The greater part of them contain the half of their families in the shade of trees, exposed to the diseases and insects which abound on this coast. But this is not all. The means of existence are waiting to these unfortunate emigrants. The whole population of Vera Cruz depended on commerce, and those of the environs depended on Vera Cruz. You will easily under- stand how much want and distress will be produced in a country where economy is wholly unknown, from the ordinary ease of gaining a livelihood. Some courageous Mexicans having gone to expose these evils to Santa Anna, in order that he might re-open Vera Cruz, he basely answered, never! that re was no concern of his, and that he could do noth- ing else than execute the orders of the govern- ment.

The government ordered him to destroy Vera Cruz and in fact they have already begun to blow up all the forts; but here again behold the barbarous ignorance of these people! They know not even how to perform this work of destruction.

I have just been informed by several of my friends returned from Medellen, three or four leagues from this place, that the greater part of the people who had begun to feel the weight of misery, and who had begun to complain both of the government and Santa Anna, as many of them begin to understand that their misfortunes are not owing to the French, and express themselves openly.

COMMODORES PORTER AND ELLIOTT.

From the National Gazette of the 25th ult.

The following communication, explanatory of the part taken by the signers in the dispute between commodore Porter and commodore Elliott, has been handed to us for publication:

To the editors of the National Gazette:

We observed that the nota bene to the publication at Baltimore, on the dispute between commodore Elliott and the late commodore Porter, does not contain any facts in relation to the part taken in it as heard by us, as the advisers of commodore Elliott. The notice of Justice assigns all the prominent ob- jects we gave for our advice. It may have been ob- served in the course of the discussion by some one of us, as a reason for the moderation which ought to control commodore Elliott on the occasion, that it were proper that the infirmities and bad health of commodore Porter may have had a deleterious effect on his mind, so far as to induce his course towards commodore Elliott; as they were not, from their former knowledge of commodore Porter, that he would be amongst the last to depart himself unjustly, or give credence to reports which might prove groundless.

So far from any one of us having asserted that commodore Porter was not in his proper mind, even were it the case, it could not have been known to us; one of us never having seen commodore Porter, and another not within the last nine years. Con- sequently we could not give a certificate, or assert a fact unknown to us. We give below a correct copy of our letter to commodore Elliott, which com- prises in it all the occasion required, as had been promised him.

CHARLES STEWART,
W. C. BOLTON,
J. B. QUINCY.

Philadelphia, 25th Feb., 1839.

Philadelphia, 15th Feb., 1839.

Sir: In reply to your note of the 15th instant, I state that, under date of the 27th December, com- modore Porter, then at Chester, addressed a let- ter to you, then at Washington, asking, as a favor, to be regarded "as a stranger," &c.

Under date of the 29th December, a copy of said letter was sent by you to me, in haste, to deliver with a challenge to the fleet, to be executed accompanied by commodore Porter; and an injury to any terms of com- bat, that I was to accept promptly any terms of com- bat, and that commodore Porter might indi- cate, by your letter to me, and a copy of the challenge, any possession.

I thought that the affair was one of great respon- sibility, and that it admitted of delay; and that should the challenge be persisted in after my seeing you, such delay would not change your attitude; consequently, I deferred taking any decisive step until I could have a conference with you; for which purpose I wrote to you to come to Philadelphia, and you did so immediately.

I felt myself to be the personal friend both of commodore Porter and yourself, and did not deem a result to the "ultima ratio;" as applicable to the case, level amount or offence. This conclusion was approved of by the opinions of commodore Stewart and J. B. Quincy, esq. They and myself, upon full consideration of the whole subject, on which we bestowed the deepest attention, advised that your letter of the 2d January should be substituted for the challenge.

I am, sir, very respectfully,

W. C. BOLTON.

Commodore Elliott.

We corroborate the foregoing statement.

CHAS. STEWART,
J. B. QUINCY.

MADAME AMERICA VESPUCCI.

From the Globe.

This lady, it is well known, presented a petition to congress, asking two things—first, to be admitted to the rights of citizenship in the United States, and secondly, to be given a "corner of land" out of the public domain of the country which bears the name of her ancestor. The committee to whom her petition was referred, reported against both ap- plications, but on grounds in no way personal to the petitioner. The citizenship could not be granted, because, under the constitution of the United States, congress can only make general and uniform rules of naturalization, applicable to all persons alike, and not to any one in particular. The "corner of land" could not be granted, because there was no personal service from the petitioner, for which it could be a compensation.

In reporting against her application, the committee on the public lands did justice to the per- sonal character of madame Vespucci, her intell ec- tual and moral qualities, her liberal principles, and her descent from the celebrated American Vespucci; and recommended her to the American peo- ple for that asylum and establishment which it was not in the power of congress to grant. The follow- ing are extracts from the report:

"A descendant of Americans is now here; a young, interesting, dignified, and accomplished lady, with a mind of the highest intellectual class, and a heart beating with all our own enthusiasm in the cause of American and of human liberty. She feels that the name she bears is a prouder title than any that earthly mortals can bestow, and she comes before us as a small corner of American soil where she may pass the remainder of her days in this the land of her adop- tion. She comes here as an exile, separated forever from her family and friends, a stranger, without a country and without a home, except in the hearts of the free institutions, and an ardent desire for the es- tablishment of her country's freedom. That she is indeed worthy of the name of America; that her heart is in- deed imbued with American principles and a fervent love of human liberty, is proved, in her case, by toils and perils, and sacrificial labors, and by her own ex- perience, when the Roman and the Spaniards were ever ready to surrender life itself in their country's service."

"The petitioner desires the donation to her of a small tract of land by congress. With every feeling of respect and kindness for the memorialist, a majority of the committee deem it impossible for them to consent to make the grant. They think such a grant would be a precedent, and that it would violate the spirit of those compact by which the public domain was ceded to this government. It is the unanimous and anxious desire of the committee that the petitioner should receive all the benefits and recognition that this government can bestow. What this government can do for her is to give her the power of the American people. They feel at least an equal pride and glory with us in the name of Ameri- ca. Throughout our wide extended country, among all classes, this feeling is universal; and in the humblest cottage the poorest American feels that this name, the name of his beloved country, is a prouder title than any that adorning his brow, or adorning his robe, or adorning his property, his name, with all its great and glorious associations with the past, and hopes for the future, is an all-sufficient heritage to transmit to his chil- dren. This generous, patriotic, and enlightened peo- ple will take into their own hands the care of America Vespucci. They will procure for her that home which she desires, and they will do all that congress is authorized to do, and infinitely more than she asks or desires, and to demonstrate to the world that the name of America—our country's name—is dear to us all, and shall be honored, respected, and cherished in the per- son of the interesting exile from whose ancestor we derive the great and glorious title."

Immediately after the report was read in the senate, a national subscription was commenced for the bene- fit of madame Vespucci, and a resolution passed pro- curing her a home, and support in the United States, $5000 from every quarter of the union subscribed. The amount was received by Mr. Haight, the ser- vant-at-arms of the senate, and presented to her. Many others placed in the hands of Mr. Haight other sums to be presented to her; among whom we have heard the names of the judges of the supreme court, several members of the house of representatives, and some citizens. This is the commencement of the address which I recommended by the report of the committee on public lands, and which, we presume, is now open to all citizens who, in the language of the report, may wish to aid in procuring that home which Madame Vespucci desires among us, and which congress could not grant.

BILL FOR THE RELIEF OF PE FERBARGY.

When Mr. Cambreleng moved, in Saturday night's sitting, that the house go into committee of the whole on the bill of the union, to take up certain appropriation bills:

Mr. Chambers asked him to withdraw the motion to enable him, (Mr. C.) to make a statement; and Mr. Cambreleng having withdrawn his motion, Mr. Chambers said the statement he wished to make related to a mother affecting himself, in some degree, and would therefore barely submit it to the house to do in the matter what might seem right and proper. He said he had for some weeks past, and during the last session, been waylaid about the roads, and on the stairs and passage of the capitol, by a lean, hungry, starved-looking man, who met him at every turn, and the vision of whose ghastly face haunted him even in his hours of rest. This man had been one of the real laboring men—a sub-contractor—who had macadamized the beautiful avenue immediately in front of the capitol, during a period of deep calamity and distress in the city, when the cholera prevailed. The superintendent of the work having reserved the right to abrogate the contract for any delay or suspension of the work, refused to permit the contractor to suspend it, but sent physicians among the laborers to alleviate them not to work early in the morning or late in the evening, and not to work hard at any time. Disease, death, and alarm dispersed the greater part of the operative force, the contractor was ruined, and the sub-contractor was involved in all the worst consequences of the failure, and in debt for a great part of the labor. He had repeatedly been imprisoned for debt, and separated from an interesting family for want of bread to feed them; disease had followed, and the man was now, and had been, for many months here soliciting justice at the hands of the government, in a state of actual suffering for the comforts of life, while this government owed him upwards of five thousand dollars, which for years he had been begging for—yes, begging for justice—for he is broken in spirit, and suffering has almost made him mad. The senate, (Mr. C. said,) had at last passed a bill for his relief, and this day, while the house was in session, the committee over which he had the honor to preside, (and it was a high honor to preside over that committee, for they earned their daily bread,) had examined the bill, and ordered him to ask leave to report it without amendment, and ask a departure from all the rules which might obstruct its commitment to a committee of the whole; and he would even ask that it should go to the committee of the whole on the state of the union.

Mr. C. begged leave to add that he had some doubt whether this man had not to day committed a breach of the privileges of the house, for when the committee of claims emerged from their room, the poor fellow, as usual, was in waiting at the door in fear and trembling, and on being told the committee had decided to recommend to the house to pass his bill, and that every effort would be made to get it through, his yellow face turned pale as death, and the fontanelles of his eyes overflowed, and the members of the committee, without exception, though not greatly given to "the melting mood," joined in the poor fellow's undigested expression of feeling. He, unfortunately man, again saw in prospect his suffering wife and little ones assembled around him, and himself free from the danger of a return to his prison—it depended upon the house whether it should be so or not.

[The good feeling of the house was manifested by a general cry of "have, leave." The bill was afterwards specially taken up in committee, reported to the house, and passed after four o'clock in the morning.]

MAINE BOUNDARY.

OFFICIAL PAPERS OF THE MAINE BORDER SUBJECT.
Letter from the secretary of state to the governor of

Department of state,
Washington, February 26, 1839.

SIR: In acknowledging, by direction of the president, your communications to him of the 15th and 19th instant, on the subject of recent occurrences in the disputed territory, and the proceedings of the authorities of Maine and New Brunswick growing out of them, I have the honor to communicate to your excellency copies of a message this day transmitted by the president to congress, and of a note from the British minister, with my answer.

From the last mentioned paper, it will be perceived that the president entirely concurs with your excellency in denying the existence of any such agreement between the United States and Great Britain as that appealed to on behalf of the latter, and supposed to give her, pending the boundary question, exclusive jurisdiction over the territory in dispute. It is hoped that, in consequence of the representations upon this head, conveyed through my note to Mr. Fox, to the authorities of New Brunswick, any further advance of British troops towards or into the territory will be suspended; that this will be the signal for the cessation of all military array and movements on both sides of the line, and for the simultaneous release of the agents of the respective parties now in custody; and that the renewed efforts now making to effect an amicable adjustment of the principal difference, will at an early day be successful.

If, unfortunately, the president should be disappointed in this expectation, your excellency may rest assured of the disposition and readiness of the executive branch of the government of the United States to perform such further duties as may be imposed upon him by circumstances.

Looking, in the mean time, to a satisfactory termination of present difficulties, the president intimates an express to your excellency the expediency of a mutual understanding between the authorities of Maine and those of New Brunswick, for the prevention of further encroachments upon the territory in dispute. Such an understanding, dictated by a proper spirit of forbearance, and the mutual desire for the preservation of peace which is supposed to prevail on both sides of the line, might, it is believed, be easily effected, with an express reservation that it should not be so construed as to impair the right of the parties, whether to the actual proprietary title or the temporary jurisdiction of either over the disputed territory, or any portion of it. No objection is perceived to this course. Should the governor of New Brunswick be disposed to acquiesce, it may be, as to its duration, until the decision of the British government in the matter can be obtained; and if, for reasons which cannot be apprehended, an arrangement of the character referred to should prove impracticable with the local authorities, the president, on being informed thereof, will use endeavors to make such an arrangement with the government of Great Britain. It would be lamentable, indeed, and presents a singular spectacle, if, while the parties to whom it belongs to adjust the main point in controversy are engaged in discussions with a sincere desire to bring them to a satisfactory result, the peace of the country, and the real and best interests of the people more directly concerned, were to be involved by disagreements between the local authorities upon points of secondary importance, and susceptible, as well is believed, of being easily reconciled. It would produce consequences which the nation at large could not but deplore, and which the president believes, the government and people of Maine are as anxious as he is to use every effort to avert.

I have the honor to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

JOHN FORSYTH.

His excellency John Fairfeld,
Governor of Maine, Augusta.

Mr. Fox to Mr. Forsyth.

Washington, February 23, 1839.

SIR: I have this day received a despatch from major general sir John Harvey, lieutenant governor of the province of New Brunswick, containing the enclosed proclamation, issued by his excellency on the 13th instant, and conveying to me the information of an unjustifiable incursion into a part of the disputed territory, situated on the Restook river, by an armed body of militia from the state of Maine, acting, to all appearance, under the authority of the government of the state.

The professed object of this incursion is stated to be to capture or drive away a party of persons who are alleged to be trespassing and cutting timber on lands in the neighborhood of the Restook river. But it is well known that all that part of the disputed territory is placed under the exclusive jurisdiction of her majesty's authority, and that it is bound to remain so, by explicit agreement between the governments of Great Britain and the United States, until the final settlement of the question of the northeastern boundary.

Her majesty's officers, therefore, cannot permit any act of authority, such as is now attempted by the state of Maine, to be exercised within the territory in question; and it will be become the bounden duty of the lieutenant governor of New Brunswick to resist the attempt, and to expel by force the militia of Maine, if the present incursion be persisted in.

Under these circumstances, I invoke the immediate interference of the general government of the United States, to prevent the threatened collision, by causing the authorities of Maine to withdraw voluntarily their militia force, and to desist, in obedience to the agreement subsisting between the two nations, from their present unwarrantable proceeding.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew to you the assurance of my high respect and consideration.

H. S. FOX.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Fox.

Department of state,

Washington, Feb. 25, 1839.

SIR: Your letter of the 23rd instant, calling upon the general government to interpose to prevent a collision between the governments of New Brunswick and the state of Maine, which you apprehend will be the consequence of a recent attempt made by the state authorities to expel trespassers upon the public lands in the territory in dispute between the governments of the United States and her Britannic majesty, has been laid before the president, who, after a careful examination of its contents, has instructed me to reply, in your own name, and the proclamation of sir John Harvey, the lieutenant governor of New Brunswick, which was sent with it, have been both prepared under erroneous impressions as to the facts of the transaction to which they relate.

Communications from the government of Maine enable me to state to you, that the recent movement in the disputed territory was founded upon a resolution of the legislature, a copy of which is herewith enclosed. You will perceive that no military occupation of the territory was contemplated, the sole object having been to remove trespassers, who, in violation of the right of property, to whomsoever it may belong, and the declared intentions of both governments, were gradually and adroitly diminishing its value. From the authority given to the agents of the state of Maine, and from information of undoubted authenticity, it is known that the persons engaged in this affair, although armed, from an apprehension of resistance from the large body of armed lawless aggressors on the public domain, were not detailed from the militia of the state for that purpose, but were employed by the kind agent of Maine and one of her sheriffs, who were to direct and control all their movements. Had the sole and avowed object been accomplished, the party would have immediately withdrawn, leaving the territory in all other respects in the condition in which it was found by them. This termination of the enterprise has been thus far suspended by the unexpected seizure and detention of the kind agent of Maine, who was arrested by the trespassers when in the act of putting himself in communication with the agent of the government of New Brunswick, appointed by the government to watch the trespassers, and had thus far been directed to arrest or drive off. Her majesty's government cannot be surprised, however, much as it may regret, with the president, that Maine had thought herself compelled to adopt some decisive movement on the subject, when it is recollected that, as long ago as the year 1829, Mr. Clay, then secretary of state, apprised the British minister, sir Charles Vaughan, on the occurrence of similar but less extensive violations of the property in question, alleged to have been authorized by the colonial government, that if such trespassers were authorized or countenanced on the disputed territory, it was not to be expected that the state of Maine would abstain from the adoption of preventive measures. It is true that, in the present instance, the trespassers were not believed to have been either countenanced or authorized by her majesty's colonial government; but that circumstances would itself lead to some course at the discretion produced by an act equally required by the interests of both nations. Sir John Harvey has, indeed, subsequently taken measures which prove his own conviction of the necessity of interference on the part of one or both governments to arrest a systematized plundering of the public domain. The president hopes, therefore, that as you will perceive that there was no military occupation attempted, that the object in view was perfectly lawful, the necessity of it being acknowledged by the act of sir John Harvey; that as soon as the purpose is accomplished, the agent and his assistants will, as heretofore on like occasions, be withdrawn, that you will not find it difficult to satisfy the colonial authorities that there can be no occasion for collision with Maine, growing out of this renewed exercise, on her part, of an oft asserted right due to herself, and useful, in this instance, to her majesty's government, whatever may be the result of the pending negotiation, especially on the supposition that the territory in question should be hereafter found to belong to the British provinces.

In that event, the president persuades himself, from the known disposition and long tried forbearance of the state authorities, that he will find it easy to prevent any military array on the territory on the part of Maine, or procure the voluntary abandonment of any militia that may have been brought together from the apprehension of a collision with the Great Britain. The propriety of the prompt release, on each side, of the agents of the state and colonial governments who have been arrested, as the president believes, under a mutual misapprehension, is so obvious, that he takes it for granted they will be respectively set at liberty, if that has not been already done.

It would give me pleasure to be able to conclude this communication without further remark; but there is another error in your letter, of so grave a character, that, to avoid all possibility of misapprehension, the president has made it incumbent upon me to call it to your especial notice. It is the assertion that "the title to the territory in question is placed under the exclusive jurisdiction of her majesty's authority; and that it is bound to remain so, by explicit agreement between the governments of Great Britain and the United States, until the final settlement of the question of the northwestern boundary." That Great Britain has sought, on several occasions, to prove, argumentatively, that the exclusive jurisdiction rested with her until the final settlement of the question, I shall not controvert; but the question of title and of the right of jurisdiction as consequent thereon, or as resulting from the previous exercise thereof, has been a subject of continued controversy between the two governments, in respect to which neither has released or waived its claims. So far from any relinquishment of right of jurisdiction having been made, or any agreement, either express or implied, entered into on the part of the government of the United States, of the nature alleged by the lieutenant governor of New Brunswick, and affirmed also in your note of the 23d instant, it will appear from the whole course of the correspondence between the two governments, extending through a series of years, that that of the United States has throughout, and on frequent occasions, solemnly protested as well against the existence of the right of the exclusive possession and jurisdiction, as to the exercise thereof; and has, upon every proper occasion, asserted that both belonged to Maine and to the United States. The assertion now made, therefore, appears to your president to be so extraordinary, that I am instructed to ask from you a full explanation of the ground upon which it is placed, as the president owes it in duty to the general and state governments that the error may be traced to its source, and that the two governments may know distinctly, and without delay, the true extent of their understanding on this point, that no unfortunate or fatal consequences shall spring from any misconception on either side in respect to it. In the present state of the intercourse between Great Britain and the American continent, and the rapidity with which her majesty's government can be consulted on all questions arising with this government, or in her majesty's possessions, the president believes that this state of the question should, of itself, furnish an amply sufficient reason to prevent any hasty action on the part of the colonial governments which may lead to results fatal to the good understanding, and eminently harmful to the prosperity of the two countries.

I cannot take leave of this subject without adverting to the delay of her majesty's government, in making some decisive proposition to advance the final settlement of the question of boundary, thus exposing the two governments, as the present condition of things on the frontier too clearly shows, to consequences which neither can look to without pain, and full of mortification to that one to whom any unnecessary procrastination may be justly attributable.

I avail myself of the occasion to offer you assurances of the high respect and consideration, with which I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,
JOHN FORSYTH.

Mr. Fox to Mr. Forsyth.
Washington, February 25, 1839.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this day's date, written in reply to a communication which I addressed to you on the 23d instant, upon the subject of the dispute that has arisen between the governments of New Brunswick and Maine.

With reference to that portion of your letter which treats of the question of the actual jurisdiction, pending the negotiation for the settlement of the disputed boundary, I deeply regret to find that the government of the United States is now placed directly at variance with the government of her majesty, in its understanding of that question.

I shall lose no time in transmitting your letter to her majesty's government, in order that I may be able to convey to you, if necessary, a full knowledge of the views and intentions of Great Britain upon this part of the subject. I confine myself, for the present, to protesting, in the most formal manner, against the views set forth in that part of your letter to which I am referring. I adopted this course, in preference to entering at once into a detailed discussion of the matter, because, in the first place, I shall best be able to do so after a direct communication with my government; and, in the second place, because I entertain the hope that an early settlement of the general question of the disputed territory may render this subordinate point of no importance of little moment.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew to you the assurance of my high respect and consideration.
H. S. FOX.

The hon. John Forsyth, &c. &c. &c.

THE MAINE CONTROVERSY.

In senate, February 27, 1839.

A message from the president of the United States, with a memorandum of a specific character, signed by the secretary of state and the British minister. (The former of which was published in page 14, and the latter in page 16, of the "REGISTER"), together with various other documents on the subject of the Maine and New Brunswick difficulties, having been received and read in the senate—

Mr. Williams, of Maine, spoke for some time, but in a voice so low, and accompanied with so much noise, that the reporter could understand almost nothing of what he said. He especially insisted that, however much the consequences that might be apprehended were to be deplored, still the rights of Maine were in no case to be sacrificed.

Mr. Preston said that he would not allow himself to participate in the despondency with which the senator (Mr. Williams) regarded the condition of affairs on the Maine frontier, or to believe that the recommendations suggested in the memorandum signed by Mr. Forsyth and Mr. Fox would be inefficacious in suspending the hostile proceedings in the disputed territory. We have been suddenly and unexpectedly hurried into an attitude menacing the most serious results, and placing us at once, without any previous action of this government, upon the very edge of war. Indeed, nothing could have been more unexpected to the public mind, or to the constituted authorities of this government, than the startling events which have attended us for the last few days. We may well judge from our own excitement how much more intensely agitated are the feelings of those who are in the immediate presence of those events, and participants in them. It is, therefore, most desirable that there should be a moment of pause allowed for our own deliberations, and some time given to the angry parties on the frontier to consider of their position, and to right themselves, if, in a moment of heat, either has fallen into error. The moment of heat, either has fallen into error. The moment of heat, either has fallen into error. Messrs. Forsyth and Fox seems to have in view, and if received by the governors of Maine and New Brunswick in a corresponding spirit, will leave the adjustment of their differences to the dispassionate discussion of the governments of the United States and Great Britain, to whom properly and exclusively belongs the decision of the great question of war or peace.

Nothing could be more improper in every point of view, or more to be deplored, than that a foreign war should be superinduced by a precipitate collision of countermining authorities, superseding the cautious deliberations of the great nations whose destiny will be so deeply implicated in the result. The question of foreign war belongs to this government, and I being assured the honorable senator that, wherever the interest or honor of his state shall, in the opinion of this government, make an appeal to arms necessary for their vindication, I, and I believe the state of South Carolina, will as freely take them up in her defence as if the affront or injury had been suffered by ourselves. I know, sir, that the state of Maine has been subjected to much justly calculated to agrieve and excite her, and I cannot forbear to add that, in my judgment, the negotiations for her relief have not been urged with sufficient earnestness, or her rights insisted on in a tone as pre-emptory as their unequivocal character fully justified. Her title to the disputed territory is unquestionable, and obtained, at the last session, the unanimous sanction of this body, after a most careful examination. It is would have authorized the most decisive demands if in our government had not been urged, Maine may have cause of complaint. But as her claims were the subject of actual negotiation, and her territory, in regard to which that negotiation was pending, was subject to provisional arrangement by an understanding between the governments, it is certainly due to this government that it be consulted, if possible, upon any matters affecting these relations; or, if this was not deemed proper, I could have wished, at all events, that it had been thought advisable by that state to have notified the British authorities of the trespass of which she complains, and of the mode in which she intended to court it. This might have produced mutual explanations, and perhaps co-operation in the correction of any error; or, if not, the British authorities, by their contenance of the marauders, would have been placed flagrantly in the wrong. That this was possible, may, in some degree, be inferred from the prompt and high tone of the British correspondence, and from the preposterous assertion of the claim to exclusive jurisdiction over the disputed territory.

This unwarrantable and most extraordinary assumption in regard to exclusive jurisdiction, may perhaps itself furnish the grounds of a future amicable adjustment of these offences. Sir John Harvey is clearly mistaken. His government, it may be hoped, will correct his error, and avow that he has misunderstood the orders of the British government, and will not have the harshness to set up such a pretension; and as the military operations of Sir John are founded on this mistake, it is clearly the part of wisdom to pause until his government has an opportunity to rectify it.

However this may be, the recommendatory convention before us is calculated to put the parties in the condition in which they occupied before the occurrence of these untoward events; to put the rights of Maine again in the keeping of this government, where the constitution and the progress of the negotiation deposited them; and, above all, to leave upon the two governments themselves the high responsibility of peace or war.

I cannot, Mr. President, refrain from commending, in emphatic terms, the spirit of moderation and fairness which has characterized the conduct of the administration in the difficult emergency upon which we have been thrown. It has my hearty approbation, and I cannot but hope, as I most ardently wish, that a policy commenced under such favorable auspices may eventuate in the re-establishment and consolidation of pacific relations. But if, unhappily, it should be otherwise, why then I pledge myself to the senator from Maine, and to the country, that I will not stop to count the cost when duty and patriotic demand, as they will then demand, a solemn appeal to the last reason of nations.

Mr. Davis said: I believe, Mr. President, I feel as much on this subject as the senator from South Carolina, who has just exerted to the utterance, patience, and to bearance, on this question shall be addressed. But I wish to call the attention of the senator for a moment to some portions of the history of this negotiation, that we may see where we now stand. The proposition for a mutual understanding was, that the two parties should remain as they were, and that each should continue to hold jurisdiction and possession of the disputed territory just so far as they had already been obtained by the parties, respectively. And now, what is our attitude in regard to this whole business? I took some pains, in the course of the discussion at the last session, to examine this matter through, to see what was the true condition of our diplomatic arrangements, and it will be found that this must be the result of the whole: That Great Britain, on her part, has decisively refused to comply with a demand for a negotiation on the question as to where was the boundary by the treaty of 1783. The government of the United States has again and again urged that certain marks, monuments, and boundaries, pointed out by that treaty, were to be ascertained; but she says the negotiation on that topic is exhausted, and, though she is willing to negotiate for a conventional line, she will not negotiate in regard to the line of that treaty. Here the matter rested, and Maine was consulted by the United States government, whether she was willing to have the question settled by determining on a conventional line. To this proposition Maine gave a flat refusal. She would not, in any case, consent to a conventional line, but she was willing in any way, to determine and settle the line of the treaty. The United States government was determined that, unless Maine would consent, they had no power to negotiate away any portion of Maine. That is where the diplomatic correspondence places it, as it then showed by letters of Mr. Vaughan, Mr. Forsyth, and of the 2d march convened in the negotiation; and Mr. Forsyth declared, in regard to the negotiation, that it was perfectly useless to renew it, because the British government had again and again said that they would not negotiate on the treaty of 1783, which was the only one which Maine would agree to; and whoever will examine the correspondence will see that I am borne out in these statements.

Sir, I am not about to oppose this proposition, or any propositions which may be presented of a pacific character, and which are merely to bring Maine and New Brunswick back to where they stood. But, without regard to that proposition, I will proceed to one conclusion further. Although the plan now proposed may put off, for a time, the evil day; although it may relieve our present embarrassments, and may place us for the time out of the beligerent attitude, yet, I ask, what is the prospect that we will bring this matter to a close, and that we shall see:—an ultimate collision? Suppose the two countries now go back to this confining jurisdiction, and proceed in the manner in which they have heretofore proceeded, as I have already said, the conflict there grows directly out of this dispute about jurisdiction. These conflicting jurisdictions run into each other; they have no ascertained boundaries or limits, and hence it is that citizens of Maine have again and again been arrested and dragged to New Brunswick by her civil authorities, and there convicted, and pardoned, and sent back. Through all this it has happened that, whenever it was necessary to preserve the peace of the country, the United States government has stepped in as a mediator, the citizens of Maine have been released, and peace and harmony for the time restored as far as they could be. In that course things have gone on till they have created a public feeling, a sense of wrong and indignity which, I think, cannot much longer be endured. Sir, they cannot go forward in the present state of things. If the two governments think that they can maintain peace and harmony without great zeal and energy, in settling this question, they flatter themselves with hopes that will prove vain and groundless.

I have risen, Mr. President, to make these remarks, and to present this piece of diplomatic history, to show the senate that, if the proposition now before us is not followed up by speedy and efficient measures for a final settlement of the question, we should be just as well off without that protocol (the memorandum) as with it. The conflict must come, and these difficulties cannot be adjusted unless the main question is finally settled. The only desire by which I have now been actuated is, that the senate should be acquainted with these facts, and when they comprehend them, I am fully persuaded that they will arrive at the same result at which I have arrived. I concur fully with the senator from Maine, who preceded me, that unless something effectual should be done in the settlement of the principal question of territory, the citizens of Maine cannot be quieted, and such an arrangement as that now before us can never preserve the peace of the country.

Ruzzles said Maine could have no inducement to rush herself, or to draw the country needlessly into a war; for it is evident that she would herself receive the first, the second, the third, and the last blow in such a conflict. She was on the very frontier that was menaced, and the war would be chiefly on her own borders. Her commerce and all her interests on the ocean would be destroyed at once on the declaration of war. It was impossible to conceive the extent of the mischief that would be done to her interests; and could it, therefore, be supposed that she had set herself in such a position as she now occupied without great consideration, or without being compelled to take it for the preservation of her honor and her rights?

Sir, (said Mr. R.) what is the aspect of this matter as it now stands? Maine claims the jurisdiction over that portion of the country which is now the scene of the contest; not over the whole disputed territory, but over that particular part of it; or, if she does not claim exclusive jurisdiction, at least, she claims a right to that sort of jurisdiction which she has held for many years past, and of which she has never been dispossessed. In maintaining that sort of jurisdiction she found it necessary to arrest a band of depredators, for the purpose of preventing the destruction of her property. In this attempt she was resisted by them, and by them her agent was seized and carried away; and this act of violence on their part was ratified by the New Brunswick authorities, by whom, also, the demand was made that the exclusive jurisdiction over the territory should be conceded to Great Britain. The demand cannot be complied with unless yielding a right of Maine which this government has recognized; that is a right to a mixed jurisdiction, or the right to be there, at least, to protect the property in dispute from ravages by a third party. Sir, she has done no more, but has exercised her authority precisely as she had done before, for on several occasions she has driven our depredators from this territory. Maine, therefore, cannot consent, on such a demand as has been made, to withdraw her forces. Yet it seems that the government is now prepared to require it of her; and by what right do they require it? Sir John Harvey is now declaring that he will, by a military force, arrest every person that he may find in that territory, and bring them to punishment. Is there any authority for this from this government? The government of Maine now calls on this government to aid her in defending territory rightfully belonging to Maine; and I ask if this is not a case when we may ask the president to call out the forces of the country to repel invasion? That is precisely what the governor of Maine has done. But the president appears not to apprehend that that case has arisen in which he is to defend the territory of Maine, though he has done so if New Brunswick persists in asserting that she has a right to exclusive jurisdiction, he would then consider it an occasion in which he would be required to repel invasion. Sir, this is not to recover a territory, but the object is to repel invasion; or, now that invasion is loudly threatened, it ought to be to go against the territory being invaded at all.

As it respects what the president now proposes, I do not know but it may be regarded as a wise measure. Maine is anxious that the whole question should be settled, and she has again and again urged it on this government. Her citizens in the mean time have been often arrested and imprisoned, her property has been destroyed, and she is now required still to submit to the outrages. If there was any probability that the question would be brought to an adjustment in any reasonable time by negotiation, Maine would not have assumed her present attitude. But it is because she has no confidence in negotiation, that she has at last found it necessary to take the remedy into her own hands; and I now ask, will this government require her to withdraw her troops after all that state has endured, and the people have been roused to a just sense of their rights and wrongs? And I ask further, whether this government has a right to call on Maine to withdraw her troops? I do not know but this right may be claimed as within the constitutional powers of this government to control a state in respect to the necessary order of territory. But it is on record that this territory belongs to Maine, by a unanimous vote of this senate, and from this I believe the executive does not differ; I believe the whole country are united on this point; I do not know of an individual who has the least doubt that the right to the territory is in Maine. And, yet, when we undertake to maintain our rights alone, we are requested to withdraw our troops under a threat. If they can be withdrawn, and the honor and the rights of Maine be sufficiently respected, I am willing that it should be done.

I am this moment informed (said Mr. R. with much concern) that there has been an actual collision in the disputed territory, and that bloodshed has taken place. News has arrived that a battle has been fought, and that 500 of the Maine men have been killed, and 90 of the English.

[Great sensation and silence for some moments.]
 Genl. Webster said: I hope, Mr. President, that this rumor will turn out to be incorrect. It would be melancholy, indeed, if it should be true that a hostile meeting has taken place, followed by such consequences as have been stated. But not under the influence of any impression from that rumor, I will make a few remarks on the general subject, and on this communication from the executive government; and painful as it is, I must say that I cannot approve of the conduct of the executive on this important measure since the last session. I will even go a little beyond that, and say what I did not mean to say till the certainty should be ascertained whether there would be any collision between the two parties, because I do not desire to make this controversy with England a matter of party. At the last session, and whenever there was an occasion, I endeavored to sustain the right to the territory as our own, and not to complain of any administration for the manner in which that right had been either neglected or enforced. But there are two or three things that ought to be stated; and without going at this time further back than the last session, I wish to know what reason has been assigned to congress why this negotiation has not been pressed to some practical result, or finally broken off. As to the expression of the opinions of congress in both its branches, nothing could be more desirable than a resolution of the last year. And what do we learn to have been done in consequence of those resolutions? I ask if there has any thing been communicated to congress at this session in the form of a report of a reason why this matter has not been brought to some sort of a conclusion, or made some degree of progress? When we ask what onward steps have been taken, the answer given to the question is, that nothing has been done; but why, we are not informed. And while nothing has been done here or in London, Maine has undertaken to examine the question whether the lines of the treaty of 1783 are an ascertainable boundary. She has explored the territory by commissioners, and her commissioners come back and tell us that there is no more difficulty in running that line than any others which run due north from a given point. They have found the treaty lines (the highlands) to be as visible and tangible as the Allegheny mountains, or any other highlands, though, of course, less elevated; so that the boundaries of Maine are as clear and as easily ascertained as other lines of division in the country. And yet a negotiation has been going on, year after year; and when we ask what has yet been done, even down to this hour, we learn that nothing has been accomplished; that, to all appearances, the dispute is as far from a termination as ever.

And now what Maine has done is to supersede, New Brunswick and Maine are to withdraw, and all things are to return to the state in which they were ante bellum, and then we are again assured there is to be a speedy settlement of the controversy by negotiation! And so said Spain on a certain occasion, when she did not settle the question for fifty years. Sir, this important matter cannot go on, or rather it cannot stand still, in this manner. Maine cannot be kept, and ought not to be kept, thus in a state of dissatisfaction and neglect.

Sir, I think this matter must be settled, and that it will not permit delay; and I must say that a strong administration here, and another in England, might long ago have brought it to a close.

The time must come when, if the controversy cannot be terminated by some sort of negotiation, it must be settled otherwise. I believe our right is clear; and although I am willing to concede much for peace and good neighborhood, I am not willing to delay a final adjustment indefinitely, or at the hazard or in the face of the certainty of border conflicts. I do not wish that Maine should take possession of the territory. The territory is ours. But if this negotiation is to be prolonged and delayed, postponed and put off, without reasonable prospect of ever seeing an end of it, then I am for ascertaining the treaty boundary by an examination of our own, and, if we are satisfied we are right, for that that boundary be the line of our possession, and seeing whether we can hold it. When negotiation becomes procrastination, and serious dangers in the mean time are impending, a more decided course ought to be assumed. Depend upon it, the peace of the country is more endangered by these unnecessary and unjustifiable postponements and delays, than it would be by holding a more decisive language, and manifesting a more resolute spirit. I do not believe there has yet been collision; I hope there will be none. But I do not wish to see Maine humiliated or disgraced. I believe that if something of her own spirit and feeling had pervaded us here, we should have now been through the controversy. There is yet, I have no doubt, time for pacific adjustment; but England must learn that she has nothing to gain by delay. Delay, while it can be of neither party, every day endangers the peace of both.

I only wish further to say, in regard to Maine, that she did obtain from congress, at the last session, a unanimous concurrence of opinion in both branches strongly in her favor, on the question of her right to the territory. Further negotiation, however, was still contemplated; and now, at the end of another year, she finds that not one single step not an inch of progress has been made. I do not blame her for being both dissatisfied and excited.

It is to be considered also that, in the mean time, Maine has established, to her own entire conviction, the truth of what we have been contending for, that is, the perfect practicability of ascertaining the treaty boundary.

Sir, there is no motion before the senate but that of referring the message and documents, which will be done of course. I devoutly hope that nothing has transpired to prevent a settlement of the question without a resort to arms; and I hope that what has occurred will lead the two governments, instead of contriving how to put it off by a system of shuflage, to meet it at once, and to decide it; or else the time must certainly come when we shall be obliged to act upon our own conviction of our rights, to take possession of what we think belongs to us, and leave to those to dispossess us who think they have the right and the power.

Mr. Brown said he could not agree with the senator from Massachusetts, that there had been any fault or omission of duty in this matter on the part of the president, or that he had been endeavoring to procrastinate the negotiation in which he had been engaged; but, on the contrary, he had made every effort to bring it to a successful issue which he could make consistently with a pacific attitude. What could the executive do? He could have taken possession of the territory, but that would have been an act of war. At the last session of congress, if this step ought to have been taken, gentlemen ought to have brought forward a proposition authorizing him to take possession of the disputed territory. The senator had intimated that there was not nerve enough in the administration. But Mr. B. thought there had been complaint of rather too much nerve in this administration; at least in the case of our difficulties with France and Mexico, there was no accusation brought against them that they had not nerve enough. But Mr. B. would say that if the president could not, by pacific measures, maintain the rights of the United States, there was no one more ready than he to adopt such measures as would be effectual.

Mr. Webster said he would only ask the senator, since he had spoken of consent, in regard to the present administration, could he tell of one individual step taken in this negotiation since the last session of congress?

Mr. Brown said the administration had taken no step, for the very obvious reason that Great Britain had declined further negotiation, and therefore no step could be taken, unless it was that of war.

Mr. Walker said he trusted this would not be made a party question, but one in which the whole country would be united. If there must be a contest with a foreign power, he trusted that, instead of finding fault with what had been done, they would endeavor to be unanimous in both houses of congress, and that there would be no division of the people of the United States.

Without therefore entering into the discussion of any of what ought to have been done by the administration, there was one thing in which Mr. W. most heartily concurred with the senator from Massachusetts; that the time was soon to come when a power here ought to be assumed to settle this question, as Great Britain had declined further negotiation as to the only point really at issue, which was to ascertain what was the boundary of the treaty of 1783. Then have we not, said Mr. W., already avowed what must be the consequences, when we asserted the right of Maine to this territory by the unanimous voice of the congress of the country? And it becomes us now to declare that, if Great Britain will not negotiate on paper, it is our duty to negotiate on the field of our cannon, and by the authority of the two houses of congress.

In regard to the withdrawal of the troops from this territory, it is precisely what Great Britain desires, for this Maine will be kept out of this country, and, so long as that is the case, Great Britain will not negotiate. But if Maine continue in actual possession, as I trust she will, then Great Britain will be compelled to negotiate, or determine whether she will yield or assert her right to a portion of one of the states of this union by force of arms.

Sir, I hope this will be no party question, but one which will command the power and result in the honor of the whole country.

Mr. Williams, of Maine, said he was happy to say that the rumor which had alarmed the senate a few minutes before was without foundation. But Mr. W. would not now have risen but for the remarks of the senator from South Carolina, (Mr. Preston,) who seemed to suppose that this arrangement, (of Messrs. Fox and Forsyth,) would be sufficient. Mr. W. now read and commented on various parts of this arrangement, and came to the conclusion that, as Maine should have withdrawn her troops, she would not be authorized by the arrangement to remove trespassers from the disputed territory, which was a right that she would not be likely to surrender.

Mr. Calhoun said he did not think this was an occasion to look at the past, or to declare what ought to have been done, but what was to be done or three propositions on which all would agree, and one was, that a war between this country and Great Britain would be among the greatest calamities that could befall either us or them, or the civilized world. The next was, that it ought to be avoided if possible. And the third was, that, if it must come, it should come after full deliberation, and a cautious exercise of judgment, both as to the time and as to the consequences. And now, what was our condition? We were on the very edge of a war; and how should they remove the present difficulty? If Mr. C. might express an opinion, he would say that the executive, in whatever respect he might or might not be blamed in regard to his other proceedings, had, in this emergency, manifested great judgment, prudence, and discretion. Mr. C. did not think this arrangement could be permanent; but it would get them out of a condition in which they might be compelled to a war without being willing. Mr. C. believed that of this itself would be an advantage; for he did not believe that this country or Great Britain desired a war. But Mr. C. would consent to one for the present, and he would refer the whole case to the committee without a single word more; and giving this arrangement the sanction and that of the senate, he trusted these difficulties would be brought to a peaceful termination, to the benefit of our country and of the civilized world.

Mr. Kuggles adduced further evidence that the rumor mentioned in the course of the debate was unfounded, and that 1,800 of the troops of Maine were on the Aroostook.

The message and documents were referred to the committee on foreign relations, and 5,000 extra copies of them were ordered to be printed.

TWENTY-FIFTH CONGRESS.—3d SESSION.

Saturday, March 2. The following are the proceedings of this day, in continuation of those inserted on page 22.

The bill reported by the committee of foreign relations in connexion with the existing difficulties in relation to the northeastern boundary, being under consideration, the section which authorizes the president to accept the services of 50,000 volunteers, was concurred in, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, J. W. Allen, Anderson, Andrews, Arelston, Daniels, Beatty, Brevint, B. Carey, Beckwith, Bridell, Jordan, Broadhead, Brown, Buchanan, Byrum, Cambreleng, William B. Campbell, J. H. G. Grant, G. G. G. Grant, W. Graham, Grandison, G. ant, Graves, Gray, Grennell, Haley, H. Ised, Hammond, Harter, Harrison, Hastings, Hawkins, Henry, Herod, Hoffman, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, William H. Hunter, Robert M. T. Hunter, Kephau, Thomas B. Jackson, Jenifer, Henry Johnson, Joseph Jones, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, John Kemble, Kennedy, Kingessmith, Leadbetter, Lewis I. Logan, L. Lewis, Malloy, James M. Mason, Martin, Maury, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, M. Clare, McKean, Menefee, Miller, Montgomery, M. Morgan, Sumner, W. M. Morris, Conway, Harris, May, John, Noyes, Ogle, O'Connell, Palmer, Parker, Parmenter, Parris, Payner, Pearce, Pennypacker, Perkin, Plumer, Pope, Pratt, John H. Prentiss, Reidy, Ridgway, Rives, Robinson, Rams, J. Sawyer, Sergeus, Seffler, Augustine H. Shepherd, Shepler, Smith, Southey, Spooner, Smet, Stone, Taylor, Thomas, Tins, Thibault, Towner, Lewis, Martin, Jones, N. J. Wells, Albert S. White, Whiteley, Sierrod Williams, Jared W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Wortington, Yell—153.

NAYS—Messrs. Ayer, G. B. Biddle, Bond, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, Carver, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Davies, Deberry, Everett, Rice Grand, Griffin, Hall, Hays, John Jay, Leane, Lewis, Martin, Sumner, M. P. Moxey, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Peck, Pickens, Potts, Rarient, Randolph, Reed, Rencher, Robertson, Russell, Sabotstall, Shields, Slade, Stratton, Tahiefer, Tillinghast, John White, Lewis Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, Word, Y. Rice—47.

The remaining amendments of the committee having been concurred in, Mr. Grand demanded the yeas and nays question. It was seconded by the house—yeas 102. The previous question being then put, Mr. Wise demanded the yeas and nays; but the house refused to order them. And the previous question was agreed to, (cutting off all further amendments.) The main question then recurring, on the engrossment of the bill, it was decided in the affirmative by yeas and nays, as follows: yeas 201, nays 6. viz. Messrs. Cranston, Davies, Giddings, Maxwell, Stratton, and Wise.

The bill was thereupon read a third time, (by its title,) passed, and sent to the senate for concurrence.

Mr. Adams moved that when the house adjourn, (the senate concurring,) both houses meet to-morrow, (Sunday,) at 10 o'clock, A. M. He said that this was far better than continuing to sit, as the house otherwise would, till 8 or 9 o'clock. If it was a breach of the Sabbath, it would be as great in the one case as in the other, and the business would be half done, in the night, instead of being done understandingly and properly, after necessary rest. Mr. Crockett demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and, being taken, stood—yeas 89, nays 91. So the motion was negative. The rules having been suspended for that purpose, the defence bill was sent to the senate.

Mr. Shields made a strenuous effort to get up the Tennessee land bill, (to issue warrants and grant titles for certain unoccupied lands in that state.)

Objections being made, he moved to suspend the rules, and demanded the yeas and nays; which were taken, and resulted as follows: yeas 80, nays 61. There not being two-thirds, the rules were not suspended.

Mr. Cambreleng moved that the house go into committee of the whole on the state of the union with a view to consider the senate's amendments to the appropriation bills still pending, viz. to the navy bill, the civil list bill, the army bill, and the Indian bill. Mr. McKean moved to amend the motion by adding the Cumberland road bill, and asked the yeas and nays on this motion. Mr. Dromgoole moved the previous question on Mr. McKean's motion. The Chair (occupied by Mr. Ingham) at first pronounced this out of order. Mr. Elmore appealed, and the house got into very great confusion. The Chair subsequently reviewed the decision and reversed it.

The call for the previous question was seconded by the house—yeas 67, nays 60.

The previous question was then put and carried, (cutting off Mr. McKean's amendment,) and the main question being on going into committee, it was carried, and the house thereupon went into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Briggs, of Massachusetts, in the chair,) and took up the senate's amendments to the navy appropriation bill.

Mr. Mercer addressed the house in vindication of captain Tho. as pay Catesby Jones from the charges preferred against him when this bill was in the house. He quoted Mr. Ingham's speech, and then sent to the clerk's table a letter from captain Jones, which was read.

The amendments of the senate were all concurred in.

The committee next considered the amendments to the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill.

Mr. Bond moved to disagree to the senate's amendment proposing to strike out the clause of the bill which requires the public printing for the executive department to be done on proposals and let out to the lowest bidder; and he spoke with earnestness against the existing practice of giving it at printing at extravagant prices as a job to favorites, &c.

Mr. Cambreleng ridiculed the idea of issuing proposals for every separate piece of printing which the departments might need done. The amendment of the senate was negative.

The committee also concurred in an amendment appropriating $6,000 for the salary of a resident minister at Constantinople in place of a charge, as at present.

Another amendment of the senate struck out the appropriation of five or six thousand dollars to comply with the contract of the government with M. St. Clair Clark and Peter Force, for the publication of their documentary history of the United States, and the item for distributing copies of that work to members not supplied therewith.

Mr. Pettin moved that the house non-concur in this amendment. There was a contract; the books were published and must be paid for. They lay rotting in the secretary of state's office, and ought to be distributed. The motion prevailed. So the house refused to concur in striking out this item of the bill. The committee next proceeded to consider the amendments to the army appropriation bill.

There were three sections added to the bill by the senate: one to pay for lost horses of the Louisiana volunteers; one to allow the claims of the state of New Hampshire for the pay of militia; and a third respecting similar claims of Massachusetts.

[What action was had upon them the reporter was unable to hear, the noise and movement in the house being very great. His impression is they were disagreed to.]

Another amendment had been made by the senate, inserting the substance of the fortification bill, appropriating sums of money to complete various forts.

These amendments were concurred in; but not until a very warm debate had taken place on expending $10,000 on the fort at the Pea Patch, below Philadelphia, pending a suit by a private individual who claimed the island on which that fortification stood as his own property. Messrs. Brancher and Rendolph opposed, and Mr. Naylor advocating the appropriation. It was agreed to: yeas 83.

On motion of Mr. Cambreleng, the committee now rose and reported the naval appropriation bill and the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill to the house, with the amendments of the committee.

In the house, the amendments to the naval bill were all concurred in. The civil and diplomatic bill then coming up, Mr. Bond called for the yeas and nays on concurring with the amendment striking out the item for doing the piloting of the departments under proposals. Mr. Harlan and Mr. Smith opposed concurrence. Mr. Cumberleg advocated it, and the question was decided by yeas and nays as follows: yeas 73, nays 99. So the amendment was not concurred in.

The house concurred in the committee's disagreement to striking out the item for Clarke & Force's diplomatic history. Mr. Tillghust proposed a recess till 10 o'clock in the morning, but it was rejected.

Mr. Elmore now moved the following vote of approbation of the course of the speaker:

Resolved, That the thanks of this house be presented to the hon. Jas. K. Polk, for the able, impartial and dignified manner in which he has presided over its deliberations, and performed the arduous and important duties of the chair.

On this resolution a long and excited debate arose, in which Messrs. Elmore, Bell, McKeanan, Carlin, Prentiss, Wise, and Gray took part, and which was terminated by a demand by Mr. Gray for the previous question; it was seconded by the house, and carried by yeas and nays: yeas, 92 nays 73.

The main question then recurring on the adoption of the resolution, it was decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Brady, Berne, Bickell, Birdsall, Bouldin, Briggs, Broadhead, Bronson, Buchanan, Bryant, Canby, Child, John Campbell, Casey, Chaney, Chapin, J. C. Clegg, Connor, Fry, Cushman, J. Dawson, Daves, Elmore, Farrington, Fay, Giddup, James Garland, Grant, Gray, Griffin, H. H. Hammond, Hauser, Harrison, Hawkins, Howard, William H. Hunter, L. L. Hunt, Taos, B. Jackson, Joseph Johnson, N. Jones, J. W. Jones, Keane, Kenley, Kingensmith, Knapp, Lester, Lewis, Long, L. L. Lyons, Lloyd, J. M. Mason, Martin, M. Kay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, M. Cline, Miller, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Samuel W. Morris, Murray, Noble, Parker, Parmenter, Paris, Payater, Pearson, Peckins, Pugh, Pratt, John H. Penton, Poindexter, Kelly, Rives, Saffers, Spencer, S. Swearingen, Taylor, Lewis, E. Vance, Rice Garland, T. G. Tamm, William T. Wagner, Webster, Whiteley, Jared W. Williams, Worthington, Yell—94.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, J. W. Allen, Ayer, B. Bell, Bond, W. B. Caldwell, John Caldwell, W. B. Campbell, Custer, C. Chambers, Cheaden, Giddis, Clark, Corwin, Crab, Craighton, Crockett, Cress, Darlington, Dym, Evans, E. V. King, Rice Garland, L. Goble, William Graham, Graves, Greenell, Halsted, Herold, William C. Johnson, Kennedy, S. Mason, M. McKeanan, Mercer, Mercer, Selway, Mrs. Naylor, Ozle, Peck, Pope, Sergeant S. Prentiss, Renden, Randolph, Reed, Ridgeway, Robertson, Russell, Salmonsall, Augustine H. Seward, Sibler, S. Smith, John W. Smith, W. L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, Ward—57.

So the resolution was agreed to.

The house then went again into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Briggs in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the army appropriation bill.

The noise was great, the efforts of the chairman to preserve order incessant, but in a great degree ineffectual, and it was difficult to tell what was and what was not done by the committee. The reporter made out the following motions:

Mr. Atchey moved to concur in the appropriation for Fortress Monroe, (Old Point Comfort,) and made a speech in support of the motion, but it was negatived. Mr. Yell moved an appropriation for Fort Smith, on the western frontier of Arkansas; but it was pronounced out of order, as inserting another bill into an appropriation bill contrary to the rule which forbids that to be done. Mr. Galtup moved a similar appropriation for some work in New York, which shared the like fate. Mr. Ewing moved to strike out the amendment for the fortifications in Charleston harbor, and went into a speech of very great duration in support of the motion; in which he took occasion to retort with severity on Mr. Elmore, who had always opposed the Cumberland road, and who, he contended, was bound, by his own principles, equally to oppose the work in his own state. The amendment was agreed to. Mr. Petrikin moved to strike out the appropriation for the pay of the visitors to West Point Academy. Lost. Mr. Campbell, of Tennessee, moved to strike out the whole appropriation for the military academy. Lost. The committee then took up the section respecting the pay for lost horses of the Louisiana volunteers, which, after a desultory debate, was concurred in.

The section providing for the payment of the New Hampshire claims for militia services, was debated by Messrs. Cushman, Atherton, Reed, and Smith in favor, and by Messrs. Thomas and Cumberleg against the allowance; when it was rejected, yeas 81.

The section respecting the Massachusetts claim for militia services, came next in order. Mr. Lincoln went at length into a speech in support of concurrence; after which, the committee, on motion of Mr. Lincoln, rose and reported. It being now half past three o'clock in the morning, a motion was made to adjourn, but negatived.

The senate having insisted on its rejection of interest in the bill for the relief of the Springfield Manufacturing Company, Mr. Dromgole moved that the house insist on retaining it in the bill. Lost. On motion of Mr. Calhoun, of Massachusetts, the bill was laid on the table.

The house concurred in the amendments to sundry private bills, and also in a joint resolution of the two houses to adjourn at 10 o'clock.

And then, a little before 4 o'clock on Sunday morning, adjourned to meet again at 10 o'clock.

Sunday, March 3. On leave, the Speaker laid before the house several executive communications.

Mr. Lincoln, (leave having been denied,) moved a suspension of the rule, for the purpose of taking up, on its final passage, the bill providing for the erection of a fireproof building for the use of the post office department. Mr. Cumberleg hoped that the house would pass the appropriation bills and adjourn; and the house having divided, no quorum voted. Mr. Lincoln said, if there was not a quorum for this bill, there was for no other. Another division took place, and still no quorum voted. Mr. Crabb demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend; which were not ordered. The Chair suggested that the count be taken by yeas; which was ordered; and there appeared yeas 93, nays 35; for the house, some remarks followed from Messrs. Crabb and Tulliferro; when Mr. Cumberleg moved the previous question; which was seconded. Mr. Crabb moved to lay the bill on the table; which motion was rejected. And the main question was ordered to be now taken; and, being taken, the bill was passed.

Mr. Lincoln moved a suspension of the 16th joint rule, so far as related to the above bill; which motion was agreed to.

The house took up the bill for the suppression of Indian hostilities in Florida; which had been returned from the senate with certain amendments. The first amendment proposed by the senate was to strike out the appropriation of $5,000 for holding a treaty with the Seminole Indians; and the question being on concurrence, Mr. Robertson demanded the yeas and nays; which were refused; and the question being taken by tellers, there appeared yeas 51, nays not counted; so the amendment was not concurred in; and the other amendment was concurred in. The house then took up the general appropriation bill, which had been returned from the senate a second time with certain amendments. The senate having insisted on their amendment striking out so much of the said bill as provides that the printing, &c. of the executive departments shall be let out by contract, Mr. Bond moved that the house adhere to its disagreement to the amendment of the senate. The Speaker explained the effect of this motion to be, that if both houses adhered, the bill would be lost. Mr. Bond said he was aware of the effect of the motion. After some desultory conversation between Messrs. Petrikin, McKeanan, Lewis Williams, Rice Garland, Tillghust, Killmore, Rives, and the Speaker, on the effect of the various parliamentary motions applicable to this case, Mr. Rives moved that the house recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the senate; which motion the Speaker said was in order. Mr. Bond, (at the suggestion of Mr. Bell,) so modified his motion as to insist on its disagreement without a conference. The Speaker decided that the motion to recede had the priority; and explained that if this prevailed, the effect would be that the amendment of the senate would be concurred in.

Mr. Harlan called upon all gentlemen opposed to quorum, to all together vote against the motion to recede. Mr. Fillmore demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and, being taken, were yeas 80, nays 93; so the house refused to recede. A motion was made to amend that motion, so as to ask a conference; which amendment was rejected; and the motion to insist was agreed to. The senate having struck out from this bill the amendment of the house in relation to copies of the documentary history of the United States, and the house having disagreed, and the senate having insisted, Mr. Toucey moved that the house recede; which motion was rejected. Mr. Petrikin moved that the house insist on its disagreement; which motion was agreed to. On motion of Mr. Cumberleg, the house resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Briggs in the chair.) Some discussion followed as to the business entitled to priority. The Chairman decided that the unfinished business was the consideration of the army appropriation bill. Mr. McKeanan appealed from the decision, but, to avoid debate, withdrew the appeal.

The committee then proceeded with the consideration of the army bill, the pending question being on concurring in the amendment of the senate, making an appropriation to pay the militia claims of the state of Massachusetts. Mr. Lincoln resumed and concluded his remarks, during which he yielded the floor incidentally to explanations from Messrs. Tulliferro, Ingham, and Greenell. (The committee here rose and received a message from the senate, (amongst other things) announced that the senate insisted on its disagreeing vote on the general appropriation bill, and asked a conference. And a committee was appointed accordingly.)

The house then again went into committee, and the debate on the Massachusetts claim was continued by Messrs. Cotes, Greenell, (in explanation,) and Evans. Mr. W. C. Johnson moved to amend the amendment so as to authorize an adjustment of the claims of Maryland on account of money advanced to the general government during the last war; which motion was rejected; and the question on concurring with the senate in the amendment was then taken, (by tellers,) and decided in the negative—yeas 64, nays 73; so the amendment was not concurred in. The committee then took up the Indian appropriation bill, which had been returned from the senate with certain amendments. Mr. Bell moved to amend the amendments by providing that the warriors of the Cherokee nation who were wounded during the last war with Great Britain, should be placed on the pension roll; which was agreed to. Mr. Everett moved to amend the amendments by adding an appropriation of $10,000 for surveying and marking the territory west of the Mississippi. Agreed to. Some debate ensued on the items of appropriation inserted as amendments by the senate, in which Messrs. Bell, R. Garland, Petrikin, Harlan and Cumberleg participated. Mr. Bell explained that most of these items were to fulfil treaty stipulations, and that they were based on estimates from the war department. The debate on the various items was continued by Messrs. R. Garland, D. H. Lewis, Bell, Everett, Cumberleg, Harlan, Dunson, Wm. C. Johnson, Towns, and Murray. When, without going through with the items, the committee, on motion of Mr. Cumberleg, rose and reported the army bill to the house.

The house agreed with the committee in their concurrence with certain amendments of the senate in the said bill.

And the house concurred with the committee in striking out other amendments of the senate.

The bill was not disposed of when, at 3 o'clock, the house took a recess.

EVENING SESSION.

On motion of Mr. Williams of Kentucky, a resolution was adopted to give the little boys an extra compensation of $250 for their services during the last three months. Sundry other resolutions of a similar character were offered, some of which were agreed to, and others rejected. Mr. Lyon moved the house to take up the bill for the benefit of the Selma and Tennessee railroad company. He stated that he would not ask the favor, but, though he had been in the house all day, indisposition would compel him to leave the hall.

Mr. Lincoln objecting, Mr. Lyon moved a suspension of the rules, but it was ineffectual.

The question was then taken on concurring with the committee of the whole in their non concurrence with the senate in the provision to the army bill to appropriate $272,716 to liquidate the Massachusetts militia claims, and resulted in the affirmative—yeas 83, nays 63.

So the house disagreed to the amendment of the senate.

Mr. Downing asked leave of the house to present a communication from the governor of Florida in relation to the barbarous murders recently perpetrated in that territory. Mr. D. also asked leave to make a statement on the subject. He said it was very important, for the houses were in flames from the depredations of the Indians within ten miles of the seat of government. Objection being made, Mr. D. moved a suspension of the rules; but it was ineffectual—yeas 88, nays 54, not two-thirds. On motion of Mr. Cumberleg, the house then went into committee on the union, (Mr. Briggs in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill providing for the payment of Indian annuities and other Indian affairs. Mr. Downing read an extract from a letter of the governor of Florida, setting forth that the condition of that territory was worse than it had been at any period during the war, and that the regular troops afforded no protection at all.

The amendment of the senate providing for the Seneca treaty, was non-concurred in. Mr. Everett moved to non-concur in the section repealing the second section of the act of 1830, which authorizes the president to exchange lands owned by Indians east of the Mississippi, who wish to emigrate, for lands west of the Mississippi. Mr. Bell fully concurred in the amendment, which would have the effect of preventing the multiplying of Indian treaties, and put an end to making these interminable Indian treaties. Mr. Everett withdrew his objection, though he could not flatter himself that the amendment would arrest the evil. The amendment was agreed to; and all the amendments of the senate having been acted on, Mr. W. Cost Johnson moved an additional clause to authorize the president of the United States to accept the services of volunteers, not to exceed five thousand in number, for Florida, and that _____ dollars be appropriated therefor. The Chair, however, ruled the amendment out of order, on the ground that it was an appropriation for which there was no existing law.

On motion of Mr. Cambreleng, the committee then rose and reported the above bill and amendments to the house.

The report of the committee on all the amendments was concurred in, and the bill sent to the senate for concurrence.

Mr. Rariden then moved that the house go into committee on the union or the Cumberland Road bill; upon which motion, Mr. Petrick demanded the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were taken. Before the vote was announced, Mr. Dawson rose, and called the attention of the house to the fact that names were recorded who were not in the list. Among these were Messrs. Thompson, Worthington, and Mason of Ohio; all of whom had left the city, and all voted in the affirmative. These votes were ascertained, if counted, would take up the bill; if omitted, the majority would be in the negative. The Chair suggested that the roll be called again, and the difficulty put an end to. Mr. McKennan objected to this.

The vote was then announced; yeas 74; noes 77.

So the house refused to go into committee on the bill.

On motion of Mr. Rencher, the house took up the joint resolution from the senate, to authorize the purchase of the Pea Patch Island in the Delaware river, and for other purposes, which, having been read a second time, was committed, and Mr. B. moved that the house go into committee on the union, thereon, which was agreed to.

The house accordingly went into committee, Mr. Howard in the chair, and the above joint resolution was taken up and discussed by Messrs. Milligan and Harlan, when the latter gentleman moved so to amend it as to substitute the "president of the United States" for the "secretary of war," and to limit the price to $50,000, subject to the approval of congress.

After a few words from Mr. Kemble, the first amendment was disagreed to—yeas 51, noes not counted.

The second amendment was discussed by Messrs. Hoffman, Pope, Mercer, Naylor, McKay, Graves, and Curtis, when Mr. Lewis Williams moved to limit the sum to $25,000.

This proposition was also discussed by the mover and Messrs. Thomas, Harrison, Kenble, Petrick, Graves, Cambreleng, and Bell, when it was rejected. Mr. Thomas then moved to strike out $50,000, and leave the sum indefinite, subject to the ratification or approval of congress; which was disagreed to—yeas 45, noes not counted. Mr. Harlan's amendment was then agreed to, without a division.

The resolution was then laid aside to be reported. The committee then took up the senate bill entitled, "An act in addition to the act to promote the progress of the useful arts;" but before which progress was made in it, on motion of Mr. Bell, the committee rose, and reported the joint resolution, leaving the bill in committee. The house concurred in the amendment to the joint resolution—yeas 82, noes not counted.

Mr. McKay moved a further amendment, which was agreed to.

Mr. Harlan renewed his first amendment, but it was rejected without a division. The resolution was then ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

On the question of going into committee again on the bill on patents, Mr. Boutin moved to include the bill providing for the building of a jail in the District of Columbia. Agreed to.

Mr. Lewis moved the Florida occupation bill. Rejected.

Mr. Bell moved the bill to continue the Choctaw commission. Rejected.

The house then went into committee, and resumed the consideration of the bill amendatory of the law organizing the patent office. Mr. Petrick moved to strike out the provision for a board of examiners. Rejected. Several other amendments were submitted and rejected. Mr. Petrick moved to strike out the enacting clause; and upon that motion, proceeded to state his objections to several provisions of the bill, the same withdrawing the motion. The bill was then laid aside to be reported.

The committee then took up the amendments of the senate to the bill providing for the erection of a new jail in the city of Washington; and they being agreed to, the committee rose and reported the two foregoing bills to the house. The first bill was ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed. The house then concurred in the amendments of the senate to the bill to provide for the construction of a new jail in the city of Washington.

The house concurred in the amendments of the senate to the bill to provide for taking the sixth census.

The house took up the senate's amendments to the army appropriation bill, and, on motion of Mr. Cambreleng, concurred therein, the house receding therefrom.

The amendments of the senate to the Indian bill were taken up. The house, in the morning, had disagreed to several of the amendments, but insisted upon one of them.

On motion of Mr. Cambreleng, the house now receded from their disagreement; and thus the bill was finally passed. Mr. Lewis moved that the house go into committee upon several bills granting right of way to certain railroad companies. Mr. Bell moved to include the bill to continue the Choctaw commission, but he was not agreed to as a modification. This motion, which was then agreed to only so far as regards the Selma and Tennessee railroad company.

The house then went into committee on various bills.

The bill for the benefit of the Selma and Tennessee railroad company [granting them right of pre-emption to alternate sections, with six years' credit] was taken up, when Mr. Lincoln was proceeding to oppose it; when Mr. Cusey suggested that the gentleman move that the committee rise; for if this bill was to be debated, nothing more could be done. Mr. Lincoln accordingly made the motion, but he did it suspended for suggestions, and then renewing it, the motion prevailed. The Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Graves moved that the Tennessee land bill be taken up. Objections were made all over the house, and Mr. G. moved a suspension of the rules. Mr. Lewis Williams demanded the yeas and nays; which being ordered, were—yeas 81, noes 49. So the rules were not suspended, requiring two-thirds. On motion of Mr. Johnson, of Louisiana, the bill to change the times of holding the federal courts in Louisiana was taken out of committee of the whole, brought into the house, and put on its third reading. Mr. Hoffman moved an amendment in reference to the courts in New York, which was agreed to. Mr. Bronson moved a further amendment, which was agreed to. The bill was then passed.

The amendment of the senate to the joint resolution for the purchase of Pea Patch Island was concurred in by the house receding from so much of its amendment as the senate disagreed to—yeas 109, noes not counted.

Mr. Cushman offered the usual resolution for a joint committee to wait on the president of the United States, and inform him that the two houses were ready to adjourn. Mr. Wise said he should object, for the house had not completed its business. The resolution was agreed to without a division.

Mr. Wise moved to go into committee on the union, on the bill to increase the pay of the sailing masters of the navy. [Cries of "no!" "no!" in terminology with others of "agreed!" "agreed!"] The motion was disagreed to. Mr. Wise asked leave to submit a resolution to pay the clerk of the select committee on defalcations certain extra compensation for his services. Objection being made, Mr. W. moved a suspension of the rule, and the tellers having announced, yeas 77, noes 45, not two thirds, Mr. Wise called for the yeas and nays, but they were refused; and the motion to suspend was rejected without a division. Mr. S. W. Morris asked leave, as a member of the committee of accounts, to make a statement in relation to this matter; but it was refused.

On motion of Mr. Briggs, the usual order was adopted to send a message to the senate notifying that body that the house, having concluded the business before it, was ready to adjourn.

Several resolutions were offered again to give the clerks, messengers, stable-keeper, &c. extra pay, but they were all rejected. Mr. Harlan moved a suspension of the rules, to enable him to submit a resolution that the secretary of the treasury prepare a statement of the defaulters from 1829, and that it be printed during the recess. Mr. H. asked for the yeas and nays on his motion, which, being ordered, were—yeas 64, noes 33.

So the rules were not suspended.

The house concurred in the resolution of the senate to suspend the 16th and 17th joint rules of the house, so as to pass a joint resolution to provide for the distribution, in part, of the Madison papers.

The joint resolution was soon after received, and, having been read twice, Mr. Wise briefly supported it. Mr. Petrick was not opposed to the resolution, but he would take that occasion to remark that the charge brought by Mr. Bell against the senate was now proven to be unfounded. The resolution was then put on its third reading, and the question being on its passage, Mr. Dromgoole called for the yeas and nays; but they were refused, and the resolution was passed without a division. Mr. Cushman, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the president of the United States, and inform him that, unless he had further communications to make, both houses were ready to close the present session, reported that they had performed that duty, and were informed by the president that he had no further communication, but he wished the members all a safe and happy return to their homes. Mr. Cannon then moved that the house adjourn sine die, which was agreed to.

The Speaker rose and addressed the house as follows:

Gentlemen of the house of representatives :

In taking leave of this body, in all probability for ever, emotions are excited which no language can adequately convey. As I look back to the period when I first took my seat in this house, and then look around me for those who were at that time my associates here, I find but few, very few, remaining. But five members who were here with me fourteen years ago, continue to be members of this body. My service here has been constant and laborious. I can, perhaps, say what but few others, if any, can—that I have not failed to attend the daily sittings of this house a single day since I have been a member of it, save on a single occasion, when prevented for a short time by indisposition. In my intercourse with the members of this body, when I occupied a place upon the floor, though occasionally engaged in debates upon interesting public questions, and on an exciting character, it is a source of unmingled gratification to me to recur to the fact, that on no occasion was there the slightest personal or unpleasant collision with any of its members. Maintaining, and at all times expressing, my own opinions frankly, the same right was fully conceded to others. Our discussions were at that time conducted with that courtesy and decorum, and respect for the opinion of others, which ought ever to prevail in a deliberative assembly. For four years past the station I have occupied, and a sense of propriety, in the divided and unusually excited state of public opinion and feeling, which has existed both in this house and the country, have precluded me from participating in your debates. Our duties were assigned me.

The high office of speaker, to which it has been twice the pleasure of this house to elevate me, has been at all times one of labor and high responsibility. Its difficult, and often delicate, duties have been fully appreciated and freely expressed by all my predecessors. They have all borne testimony to the difficulty, nay, impossibility, of discharging its duties with entire satisfaction to all, especially in seasons of high political or party excitement. Whilst they have borne this testimony, I think I may truly affirm that none of them have had a severer ordeal to pass than has fallen to my lot. Frequent have been the occasions when, but for the indulgent and liberal support at all times given to me by this house, I should have been utterly unable to preserve the order and decorum which should ever attend the deliberations of the representatives of the people. It has been made my duty to decide more questions of parliamentary law and of order, many of them of a complex and difficult character, arising often in the midst of high excitement in the course of our proceedings, than had been decided, it is believed, by all my predecessors, from the foundation of this government. This house has uniformly sustained me, without distinction of the political parties of which it has been composed. Our records will show, that upon the numerous appeals which have been taken to the house, I have been sustained by both political parties, and often by decided and large majorities. Though doubtless

I may often have fallen into error in promptly deciding novel questions, suddenly raised, I trust it was not on points material, and I know it was never intended. I return to this house to thank for their constant support in the discharge of the arduous and difficult duties I have had to perform.

But, gentlemen, my acknowledgments are especially due to the majority of this house for the high and sterling evidence they have given me of their approbation of my conduct as the presiding officer of the house, by the resolution you have been pleased to pass. I regard this as the highest and most valued testimonial I have ever received from this house, because I know that the circumstances under which it has passed has made it matter of substance and not a mere form. I regard it as of infinitely more value than if it had been the common matter of course and customary resolution, which, in the courtesy usually prevailing between the presiding officer and the members of any deliberative assembly, is always passed at the close of their deliberations. That is unmeaning—is indistinctly conferred—is a mere act of courtesy, and possesses, comparatively, but little value. I return to the majority of this house, with I sincerely feel, my grateful thanks for this high evidence of their approbation and regard, given, as it has been, at a time of high party excitement, which, in the accomplishment of party and political objects, too often disregards all other considerations. I shall bear it in grateful remembrance to the latest hour of my life.

I trust this high office may in future times be filled, as doubtless it will be, by able men. I cannot, I know, be filled by any one who will devote himself with more zeal and untiring industry to do his whole duty than I have done.

We are now about to separate, many of us, never again to meet. I wish you, gentlemen, a safe return to your families and friends; and whatever our respective future destinies may be, my prayer to a beneficent and overruling Providence is, that our future lives may be useful and happy.

The Speaker then announced that the house stood adjourned without day.

CHRONICLE.

Connecticut. The democratic convention for the nomination of state officers, recently held at Hartford, have nominated the hon. John M. Niles as a candidate for governor, and John Stewart for lieutenant governor.

Louisiana. The senatorial branch of the Louisiana legislature, by a vote of 9 to 5, has passed a resolution declaring that "a national bank, properly constructed, (the regard being had to the rights of the states,) cannot fail to be an important auxiliary in carrying into effect the power of congress to create and regulate a currency of equal value, credit and use, wherever it may circulate, and to facilitate the fiscal operations of the general government."

Mississippi. The bill for the suppression of tiling houses, has passed the lower house of the legislature of this state by a decided majority.

A resolution authorizing the new Union Bank to issue one and two years post note, bearing five per cent interest is passed both houses of the legislature.

The senate of Kentucky, by a vote of 19 to 13, passed the bill to establish the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad Bank, but it was again defeated in the house, for the third time, the vote being 49 to 49.

Missouri. The senate of Missouri has, by a vote of 16 to 14, repealed the bill which had passed the lower house, prohibiting the circulation of bank notes issued by banks within the limits of the state.

It is a sad that forty-four of the Mormons are now confined in prison for various crimes in Missouri. During the three years the Mormons resided in Caldwell county, more property has been used there by them than had been made in fifteen years in any other county of the state. Some of the fields belonging to them contain a thousand acres in dry fire cultivation. They are now removing into Illinois. [Nat. Gazette.]

Iowa. A correspondent of the Buffalo Journal says that taking into consideration the soil, the timber, the water, and the climate of Iowa territory may be considered the best part of the Mississippi valley. The Indians consider it, as appears from the name which they gave it. Fort it is said that the Sioux and Fox Indians, on beholding the exceeding beauties of this region, held up their hands, and exclaimed in an ecstasy of delight and amazement, I O W A—which in the Fox language means, "this is the land."

Tales of the Wabash. The Torrebaute (La) Courier states that ninety thousand hogs were slaughtered on the Wabash during the late season, for the southern market. I increase quantities of corn are also shipped from that region for the same market.

A statue to Washington. A bill has been introduced into the legislature of Mississippi authorizing the governor to purchase, at an expense of $25,000, a marble statue of Washington, to be placed in the rotunda of the capitol.

A bill to encourage the culture of silk has passed the Ohio house of representatives by a vote of 31 to 20.

Spring. The Boston Transcript says: "the vanguard of the army of wild geese passed over the city on Thursday evening, about eight o'clock, on their annual northern journey."

Peach, nectarine and plum trees were in bloom in New Orleans on the 21st ultimo.

The Cincinnati papers announce the death of Morgan Neville a pioneer of the west, and a gentleman of learning, a merry taste, and much private worth, and one of the most estimable citizens of Cincinnati. He died on the 1st of March, in the 55th year of his age.

A special minister. The National Gazette names Robert Walsh as a suitable person for a special minister to England, in relation to the Maine boundary question. Such a selection could scarcely fail to give satisfaction. Mr. Adams, moreover, would also prove an excellent appointment—certainly the most experienced man in the country on such a question. Whatever his opinions or prejudices on other questions—he is as true to the honor and interests of his country, and of human nature.

Novel sale. A gentleman of Buffalo has just sold his real estate there for $120,000, payable in instalments, without interest, at the rate of one dollar an hour. The Advertiser remarks, "according to these terms the purchaser will have 14 years 34 days and 20 hours to pay it in, at the rate of $3,760 per a hour."

The peace of our city. Blank returns were made to the high police this morning by the 1st, second and third ward districts, comprising the city east of the Bayou below Livingston street, and all below Hester Canal and North Moore streets. Yesterday morning the three other districts, viz: third, fourth and fifth, made similar returns to the upper police. [N. Y. paper.]

A recent writer on the subject of the probable increase of the population of the United States, comes to this conclusion—"that in 1810, we shall have a population of at least 17,153,333—in 1833, a population of 33,000,000—in 1856, that of 50,493,380—in 1870, that of 74,065,840—and in 1893, that of 95,213,420. Thus, to be sure, is coming up pretty well, but is all very probable, if the union and the world holds together till that period."

The last of the Cherokees. The Little Rock Times of the 4th ult. says: "On Saturday last 223 emigrating Cherokees arrived at this place, on the steamer Victoria, under the charge of Capt. Drew, on their way west. These are the last of the Cherokee emigrants. Most of them are those who were unable to go by land, and nine deaths have occurred since the commencement of their journey; but in general they look well and enjoy good health. In the company is the celebrated chief, John Ross, who buried his wife in this city on Sunday." [Louisville paper.]

A righteous wrong. In the court of common pleas yesterday, before Judge Livingston, William H. Miller recovered $140 damages and costs, from Abraham Brover, proprietor of one of the Broadway omnibus lines. One of Mr. B's drivers ran against Mr. E's cart in Broadway, damaged the cart very much, injured the horse, and inflicted some wounds on Mr. E, for all of which the jury awarded him the above sum.

The jury in the case of Philip Ulter vs. the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company, tried in Baltimore county court, rendered a verdict of 500 dollars damages, the expenses sustained by the plaintiff's wife which resulted in death.

Deadly weapons. The legislature of Alabama has just enacted a law against the detestable practice of carrying deadly weapons about the person. It provides that "if any person shall carry concealed about his person any species of fire arms, or any Bowie knife, Arkansas tomahawk, or any other knife of the like kind, dirk, or any other deadly weapon, the person so offending shall, on conviction thereof, before any court having independent jurisdiction, pay a fine of not less than fifty, nor more than five hundred dollars, to be assessed by the jury trying the case; and be imprisoned for a term not exceeding three months, at the discretion of the judge of said court."

U. S. troops. The Little Rock (Ark.) Times of the 18th ult., mentions the arrival here of the steamer "Independence," lately taken out of the dry dock at Nashville, ordered from Tennessee to garrison Fort Gibson, in place of the 7th regiment, which is ordered to Florida.

Naval. It appears by our last advices from South America, that the U. S. Corvette to Fairfield, is now commanded by Lieut. Mackenzie; and the enquiry is often made, "who is lieutenant Mackenzie?" He is no less a person than Alexander S. Siddell, well known in the navy as an excellent officer, and well known in this country and Europe as an elegant writer. He went out in the Independence as first lieutenant of that ship—and soon after it was announced that his name had been changed by act of legislature, for purposes best known to himself, from Alexander Siddell to Alexandria Siddell Mackenzie. Lieut. Siddell is therefore no longer in being. [Boston Journal.]

The Boston Transcript states that when the frigate "Constitution" was lately taken into the dry dock at Charlestown, her bottom was entirely encrusted with a coat of oysters from stem to stern, the average size of which was about equal to those that are usually sold for half a cent.

Letters from the United States Frigate Columbia, and also from John Adams, written at Bombay, up to the 10th of November last, have reached this city; at that time the crews were well. Commodore Read and several of the officers had dined with the governor, there being present a large and brilliant party of ladies and gentlemen. Sir John Keck, who is in command of the frigate about to go against the Persians, and who was one of the British generals at New Orleans, had extended his hospitality to the squadron. Commodore Read had invited the governor, the general, and many other distinguished officers, to dine on board of the Columbia. We take pleasure in mentioning this interchange of civilities among public men in distant parts, as the best testimony of harmony and good feeling between friendly nations are thus preserved and strengthened. [Nat. Gazette.]

The U. S. ship Alexandre. We learn from the Newport Herald of the Times, that last Sunday's mail from New York, brought letters from Dr. Grouard, at Brest, consul of France for Newport. The prediction of Doct. G. that piracy and murder had been committed on board the Alexandre, it seems has been verified beyond all question, by the confession of the boy Bailly before the court-martial officer.

Arrival of the mutineers. The New York Commercial of Thursday says: "The barque Shepherds arrived this morning from Hamburg via Cowes, having on board the mutineers of the late brig Braganza. Their names are Frans Knudson, Cornelius Williams, of Denmark, James Burgess, of England, and Joseph Verberger of Anwerp. The latter is the one who attacked the patron of the Braganza."

Patrons V. Somebody writing to the Linchburg Virginian speaks of the relations of patron and editr—"whereupon the editor of the Virginian very promptly and properly replies—"We know of no such relation. We do not conceive the man who subscribes and pays for our paper, the more a patron than he who buys and pays for our money or coin. We labor to make our paper profitable, that we may charge for it, and when we expect him to use his pleasure."

Great mortality is said to prevail at Jamaica among the officers and men of the British West India squadron—the yellow fever having proved more fatal than for many years before.

Judge James Webb, formerly of Florida, has been appointed secretary of state of Texas, in the place of Bernard E. Bee, appointed minister to the United States.

A venerable consul. Miss Hall in her "Rambles in Europe," at a very interesting work by the way, in 1836, alluded at Leghona was waited upon by the American consul at that port. He holds his office by the appointment and under the hand of Washington. If still living, he is doubtless the only man in existence who can exhibit the signature of the immortal father of his country as the seal of his office. In 1786, according to Miss Hall, his form was erect and his face was slightly wrinkled. "He was old," she says, "and passed upon fifty-five or sixty, and he must be verging upon ninety. It is more than a half century since he has looked upon his native land."

Lace caps. A new and important manufacture has lately arisen in the lousery trade, in making lace caps from the stocking-frame by the aid of the jacks-kicker machine. This machine has been lately applied to the making of laces in breadth, and with such brilliant success as to astonish even the oldest workmen.

[Nuttingham Jour.]

An example for white sovereigns. By late advices from the Spanish colonies, up to September 8, we perceive that King Kaimeha III. has totally interdicted the admission of all spirituous and distilled liquors after January 1, 1839. Vessels that left the United States February 1, 1839, with such liquors, may be exempted. Wines to pay a duty of half a dollar a gallon. No alcoholic liquors to be purchased, except by physicians for medical purposes.

Necessity of repetition. "I remember," says the celebrated W. in hearing my father say to my mother, "how could you have the patience to tell that blockhead the same thing twenty times over?" "Why," said she, "if I had told him but nineteen times, I should have lost all my labor!"

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED, EVERY SATURDAY, BY WILLIAM OGDEN NILES, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE

☞—The stock market has been in a state of great depression for some days past, and at the last advices still had a downward tendency. The last sale of United States bank stock in New York was made at 115½.

☞—The packet ship Poconchos has arrived at Philadelphia from Liverpool, bringing papers from London to the 9th, and from Liverpool to the 11th ult. They contain but little political news of interest.

☞—Lord Glenelg has ceased to be secretary of the colonies.

☞—In the London Morning Chronicle, of February 9th, it is stated in the letter of a correspondent, dated from Constantinople, that news had been received in that city, stating that Meh-met Ali Pacha, sovereign of Egypt, with the principal members of his court, had been drowned in the river Nile, by the upsetting of an iron steamboat. No further particulars.

FROM FLORIDA. We have received additional intelligence from Florida of a most melancholy character.

An extra from the office of the Savannah Georgian brings a letter from Gary's ferry, dated March 13th. It contains an account of the murder by the Indians of another brave officer, captain S. L. Russell, of the 2d infantry, and the death of the gallant major Noel, from the wound received by the accidental discharge of his own pistol. The letter states that captain Russell was descending the Miami river on the 28th ultimo on his way to fort Dallas, with a part of his company in open boats—the savages, in ambush on the river bank, waited until he arrived within gunshot, when the boats received a volley from the Indians, who, being on an eminence, fired over them, and no one was injured. Captain R. immediately struck for the opposite shore, and, on reaching it, leaped out on the ground, and, turning round to address a few words to his men, was instantly fired at by several rifles, three of which took effect, two in his body, and one just above the temple, producing instantaneous death. Lieutenant Woodruff, captain R.'s subaltern, who was some distance behind, heard the firing, and hastened to the succor of his captain, engaged the Indians for nearly an hour, when he forced them to retreat. He then collected his boats, and, having obtained possession of his captain's body, proceeded to fort Dallas. The Indians were pursued, but, as usual, their perfect knowledge of the country enabled them to escape. Capt. Russell was clad in the dress uniform of the infantry, and it was to this that may probably be attributed his death, as but one man of the company besides himself was touched. The loss of the Indians was not known. Their number was much greater than has fought together for a long while. The remains of captain R. were interred with military honors on the 1st instant.

We learn from the Army and Navy Chronicle that Gen. Maunob left Washington on Thursday last to take the chief direction of affairs in Florida. His stay there will depend upon circumstances, which cannot be known, until after his arrival in the territory. Gen. Taylor will still remain there on duty.

AWFUL EXPLOSION OF A COAL PIT. The Richmond Compiler states that news reached that city, on Monday, that an awful and fatal explosion had taken place early in the morning, in the Black Heath coal pits, in Chesterfield, by which there was a considerable destruction of human life. The explosion was what is known as a "fire damp explosion," from want of proper precaution. Between 50 and 60 pit laborers and two overseers had previously gone down. Three men at the mouth of the pit were instantly killed. The fate of those who went down is not known; but it is supposed few, if any e-escaped death. They had not been reached, according to the last accounts.

In a postscript the Compiler states that a gentleman from the pit, reports that between thirty and forty had gone below before the explosion—four of them had been gotten out, who, it was supposed, would recover—two others were seen dead; and cries and groans were distinctly heard from some who had not been reached. So great was the consternation and dismay that the accuracy of details could not be relied on; and so great was the terror among all in the vicinity that the proper efforts could not be promptly made to get out the unfortunate laborers. One of the three at the mouth of the pit, alluded to above, is living with both legs broken. The other two were immediately killed. The shaft and engine are but little injured.

Up to 4 o'clock on Tuesday only four bodies had been gotten out. They were lifeless, and in a very mutilated condition, having been taken from beneath a great bulk of coal.

One of the four gotten out alive on Monday has since died. Mr. Beverly Heth, with his assistants, is causing every possible exertion to get out the bodies. There is but little hope that any more of them will be taken out alive. The explosion took place at 6 o'clock on Monday morning, and thirty-four hours had elapsed, when we last heard from the pits, in which time, if any had escaped death from the very violent explosion, they must have died of suffocation; the structures for conducting air in the shaft being so much injured.

The air below was so impure that great caution was necessary to preserve the lives of those who descended to succor the unfortunate beings.

There is still uncertainty as to the number of laborers who had gone down before the explosion. The superintendents say that forty is about the number.

MEXICO. In another page we have given some recent intelligence from this country; since it was in type, we have seen a letter published in the New Orleans Courier stating that Mr. Langdon, the American consul at Laguna, a small Mexican port, has been murdered, with the sanction of the Mexican authorities, and under circumstances of barbarous cruelty. The editor of the Courier declares that the letter is addressed to one of the most respectable mercantile houses of New Orleans from undoubted authority. The cause or pretext of this murder is not given, but the account states that he had been cruelly treated, thrust into a dungeon where he remained three nights with condemned criminals, that he succeeded in effecting his escape with his wife to a small village near Campechy, where he died of wounds, previously inflicted upon him by a negro under the sanction of one of the justices.

FROM GUATEMALA. We have news from Guatemala, on the 22d of January. Carrera's insurrection was drawing to a close. His cause may have been considered as desperate since his defeat at Villanueva, where, we have already mentioned, colonel Galindo was wounded, at the head of the division of Old Guatemala.

A convention of the state of Guatemala was about to meet at that city. The marquis of Ayacuena (long a resident in the United States) is elected a member for Caban, col. Galindo for Reten, and Dr. Galea for Cajabon.

The new constitution for Nicaragua has been promulgated. It claims for the commonwealth the coasts of the Caribbean from Point Patook to the principal mouth of the river San Juan. The governor of the state has the title of Father. The governor of Honson's term of presidency expires in March, 1839. At the date of advices he was in the city of Cutumala.

LATEST FROM SOUTH AMERICA. By the ship Courier, captain Wolf, at New York, from Montevideo, papers of that city to the 11th January, and by the barque Douglas, captain Boore, from Rio de Janeiro, accounts from thence to 21st of the same month, have been received.

Intelligence had been received at Montevideo, that gen. Santa Cruz had taken possession of Lima with a victorious army of 16,000 men; that in Callao his authority had been proclaimed; and that the remains of the Peruvian army had retired.

The blockade of Buenos Ayres by the French squadron still continued.

The opening of the 16th legislature of Buenos Ayres took place January 1st. Gov. Rosas' message is contained in the British packet of the 5th. In respect to the difficulty with France, it states nothing new or important, except the following:

The government has subsequently been put in possession of sufficient proof that the British cabinet has recently offered to H. M. the king of the French, its good offices in the differences which exists between the republic and France. It is to be hoped that they will accelerate the termination of the question, conciliating the interests and honor of both nations.

NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY. We have received a copy of governor Fairfield's message to the legislature transmitting copies of the agreement between Messrs. Fox and Forsyth, which we will publish in our next. Immediately upon the reception of the message, Mr. Whidder moved the following resolutions, which disposition was made of them is not stated.

Resolved, That no new state of affairs has taken place since the passage of the resolves, passed January 24, 1839, and February 20, 1839, which should cause the legislature to recede from the position taken in those resolves, and that the measures contemplated by those resolves should be carried into effect.

Resolved, That the measures of the executive of this state in carrying into effect the resolves herein referred to, should be sustained by the legislature.

On the 14th inst., Mr. Cole, of Paris, from the committee on the northeastern boundary, to whom the governor's message was referred, reported the following resolve, which was read once, and Monday next assigned for its further consideration—on which day it was recommitted without debate.

Resolved, That, whenever the governor of this state shall be fully satisfied, either by the declarations of the lieutenant governor of the province of New Brunswick, or otherwise, that he has abandoned all idea of occupying the disputed territory with a military force, or of attempting an expulsion of the civil force sent there under our land agent, that then the governor of this state be authorized to withdraw our military force, leaving the land agent with a sufficient posse, armed or unarmed, as the case may require, to drive out or arrest the trespassers, and to preserve and protect the timber from the depredatees.

The last advices confirm the pacific disposition on the part of Maine, and we have strong hopes that the prudent conduct of general Scott will arrest all hostile movements, and put the question in a train for amicable adjustment.

The intelligent correspondent of the Boston Atlas says:

I understand general Scott last evening received a letter from sir John Harvey of a highly pacific character; there is but little doubt entertained here that our present difficulties with the provincial government will be amicably settled.

A letter from Bangor, March 15, reports Mr. Jarvis to have said:

There is no doubt that the letter from sir John Harvey to general Scott, of which I spoke in my last, is in reply to one which the general had written to him a few days since, representing in a very able, interesting and forcible manner, the wishes, feelings and intentions of Maine and the United States, in relation to the present troubles. When the contents of that answer transpire, he thinks we shall be better able to form an opinion as to the result—at least we shall ascertain whether sir John will give the evidence, which it is understood will be satisfactory to Maine, of his abandonment of any intention to hold jurisdiction or expel our men, viz: by withdrawing his troops.

The Bangor Whig, 1 o'clock, P. M., March 14, in a postscript, announces an express passing through Bangor to Augusta, with a letter from sir John Harvey to general Scott. Mr. English, the messenger of sir John, on his return from Augusta to Frederickton, remarked that he thought governor Fairfield's propositions would not be satisfactory to the provincial government.

Col. or Mr. Jarvis, of the armed constabulary force, has returned to the Aroostook.

The Portland Courier, of Friday, says: "there is a rumor in town, supported by very respectable authority, that governor Fairfield and his council have united in a recommendation to the president to appoint the honorable Daniel Webster the special minister to England.

The following resolutions reported by the committee to which gov. Everett's message was referred, were almost unanimously adopted in the house of representatives of the Massachusetts legislature on Friday the 12th inst.

Resolved, That the state of affairs in relation to the northeastern boundary, furnishes a strong reason for again asserting our rights, and for re-affirming the positions heretofore assumed by the legislature of this state against the unwarrantable claims of Great Britain, and in favor of strong and vigorous measures by the government of the United States, for a speedy adjustment of the existing difficulties, in such a manner, as shall protect Massachusetts and Maine in the possession of the tract of territory guaranteed to them by the treaty of peace of 1783.

Resolved, That the active measures authorised by a resolve of the legislature of the state of Maine passed January 24th, 1839, for the prevention of depredations upon the land of Massachusetts and Maine, were required by the exigencies of the case and a wise regard for the preservation of their interests in those lands, and were similar in character to measures adopted by the land agents of Massachusetts and Maine in October last, and recognized and approved, through their agents, by the government of the province of New Brunswick.

Resolved, That the claims of Great Britain to the exclusive possession and jurisdiction of the whole of the disputed territory, as recently asserted by the governor of New Brunswick, and his avowal of the determination to maintain that claim by a military force, and his denial of the right of the state of Maine to protect from the lawless depredations of trespassers, the lands which have long been in the actual possession of Massachusetts and Maine, call loudly for the immediate interference of the federal government; and that the honor of the nation has demanded the adoption of decisive measures for the protection of the citizens and the preservation of the rights and interests of two of the members of our confederacy.

Resolved, That this commonwealth will co-operate with the state of Maine to all necessary and constitutional measures for the preservation of the interests of both states in the lands in the disputed territory, and for the speedy adjustment of the existing controversies.

Resolved, That his excellency the governor be requested to transmit a copy of these resolutions to the executive of the United States and of the state of Maine, to the executive of the several states of the union, and to each of our senators and representatives in congress.

THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES terminated its annual session on Saturday the 9th inst., on which day chief justice Taney, who had been confined to his lodgings by indisposition, was again on the bench.

Among the cases, decided at this term was the case from Illinois, familiarly known, as the Beaubien case, in which the court decided in favor of the United States, and upon such principles says the Intelligencer, as to be conclusive against the opposition party in the case. Also the great appeal case from the district court of Alabama, in which the judgments rendered by that court are reversed. The opinion of a majority of the court was read by the chief justice, and we understand it as maintaining these propositions:

1. That, by the comity of nations, corporations can contract, as well as sue, in other nations as well as in that in which they exist, or by whose government they are created.
2. That this comity exists, in a still stronger degree, between states connected together as are the states of this union.
3. That the constitution and laws of Alabama establish no such policy as is infringed by the purchase and sale of bills of exchange within her limits by the agents of foreign corporations.
4. An admission that there are some rights of citizens of other states, not of the constitution, of which a state cannot divest them. This was not the ground of the decision, but was intended, as we suppose, to be, in legal phrase, the exclusion of a conclusion.

Mr. Justice Baldwin gave a separate and very elaborate opinion in favor of reversal, but putting his judgment on the rights of the parties, under the constitution of the United States.

Mr. Justice McKinley adhered to the opinions expressed by him in the court below.

Mr. Webster's argument in the above appeal case, is of great interest, and we will publish it next week, as reported in the "Intelligencer."

MORE INDIAN MURDERS. Tallahassee, March 10, 1839. We learn from Monticello that on Friday evening last, the dwelling of Edmond Gray, esq. of Jefferson county, within nine miles of Monticello, was attacked by a party of Indians, and that he, together with two of his children, were murdered, another child severely wounded, his house burned to the ground, and his plantation plundered. They made the attack about an hour after dark, shot Mr.

Gray and one of his smallest children while in the house, another shot about forty paces from it, while endeavoring to escape. A third child was knocked down with the butt end of a rifle, and stabbed in several places very badly, and left by the savages senseless as for dead in the yard. A fourth child, comprising all his white family, being about 12 years old, fortunately escaped by flight in the dark, although pursued some distance, and shot at several times. She was the eldest of the children.

We predict this is not the last by many of the outrages to be perpetrated by the savages in Middle Florida this summer. East Florida is desolated. There is no incentive for attack there. The Indians want provisions. The stock in East Florida is all destroyed. The presence of the regulars in large force there renders such predatory eruptions hazardous. The theatre of war is changed. Middle Florida is hereafter for several months destined to be the scene of outrage, of families murdered and scalped, of burning houses and devastated plantations.

We have confidence in our executive—our population is brave and patriotic; but he is without power, without funds, without provisions. What will be the extent of the ruin God only knows.

This horrible outrage has been committed 10 miles within the station of the frontier troops of militia and regulars, and the heart of a thick settlement. The little girl who escaped says the yard and house were full of Indians, and they fired often. The number of the party is supposed to have been about thirty. Several volunteers on the receipt of the information were raised in Monticello and its vicinity, and with capt. Rowell's company of Florida militia, went immediately in pursuit of the savages, who fled to the Ocala hammocks.

Mr. Gray was one of the most respectable, useful and worthy citizens of Jefferson. He was one of the oldest settlers, and has several years filled the office of magistrate, respectively. He was a widower and not in affluent circumstances.

MEXICO. From a New Orleans slip of the 12th inst., we have the following:

By the arrival of the schooner G. H. Wetter, capt. Delvaillie, from Vera Cruz, we have received very late news from that quarter; the most important of which is the raising of the blockade of the ports of Matamoros, Tampico, Soto la Marina, and Tuspan. The following circular addressed to all the consuls and vice consuls at Vera Cruz, by admiral Baudin, has been communicated to us by the French consul at this port.

[CIRCULAR.]
Frigate Nercede, Feb. 17, 1839.

Sir: In the present contest between Mexico and France, the government of his majesty never had, and never will have, any other desire than to insure justice and protection to Frenchmen. That justice and that protection seem to exist at present in the portions of the Mexican states which have declared in favor of the federal constitution, comprehending the ports of Matamoros, Tampico, Soto la Marina, and Tuspan, and I have raised the blockade of said ports to show that France is not hostile to those who are not hostile to her. I have the honor, sir, to request of you to communicate to the captains of vessels of your nation the assurance that no obstacle is interposed to their trade by the French cruisers in that part of the coast of the Gulf of Mexico, comprehended between the river Teclatol and the bar of Santiago, north of the river Bravo.

Should a change of circumstances oblige me to renew the blockade on any part of this coast, it will be announced with the same formalities and delays as the former.

I have the honor to be, &c.

The rear admiral, commanding the naval forces of France, in the Gulf of Mexico.

CHARLES BAGDIN.

TAMPICO. The New Orleans Louisianian says: "The consul of France has communicated to us the following official document:"

Mmanuel de Mora, administrator of the maritime custom house at Tampico.

I certify that the following order has this day been communicated to me by his excellency, the general-in-chief of the liberating army:

Whereas, the merchant vessels now in the port of Vera Cruz are insured to that place, and they run a new risk in going to another port. I hereby order that to compensate such risk, there shall be a reduction of 25 per cent. on the duties payable by each vessel coming in this manner to Tampico, provided no deduction shall be made from the one per cent. usually paid in cash. I make this known to you that you may govern yourself accordingly.

God and liberty.

JOSE UREA.

MASSACHUSETTS' GENERAL HOSPITAL. The annual report of the trustees of this institution, presented in finance in an embarrassed condition. The diminution of the receipts, consequent upon the unexpended difficulties of the times, "have seriously affected a portion of the property in which a portion of its funds are invested. The whole receipts of the year 1838 amounted to $16,081, and the expenditures to $17,506 24; excess of expenditures over and above the receipts, $1,425 24. It is stated that there is due from the institution to the Life Insurance company, $50,000, of which debt $40,000 was invested to build "the Belknap Ward of the McLean asylum"—which, it is said, was absolutely necessary for the accommodation of female patients.

The report of Dr. Bell, superintendent of the McLean asylum, states that the number of patients received during the year, was 135—the total number enjoying the benefits of the asylum during the year, 224—discharged during the year, 131—remaining January 1, 1839, 93. The following table furnishes information, at once curious and interesting:

Occupants of male pupils admitted to the McLean Asylum, during the period of 20 years from the opening of the institution in October, 1815.

The report remarks—“This table demonstrates how extensively the various ranks of society have been benefited by the institution, hardly a profession, or an occupation which does not find here some representative. And it is not a little remarkable that the occupation which of all others has been deemed most healthful, and which from the absence of all causes of excitement could be less than any other, exposed to insanity, that of the farmer, furnishes the greatest number of patients for the asylum, being nearly 31 per cent. of the whole number of males admitted. PUBLIC WORKS OF PENNSYLVANIA. Governor Porter communicated to the two branches of the Pennsylvania legislature on Monday a message, transmitting a report of the canal commissioners, with accompanying documents, showing the actual condition of the finished lines of canal and rail road, and the amount of money which is absolutely necessary to put them in good order and repair. Shortly after the organization of the canal board, the report states that engineers of the highest standing made the most extensive experience, were appointed to make an examination of the several divisions of canal and rail road, and to estimate the amount which would be required to restore them to a sound and efficient business doing state.” The following are the estimates of the engineers, viz:—

Columbia rail road,	$51,212 00
East-rn division,	56,857 00
Susquehanna division,	74,570 00
Juniata division,	176,000 00
Portage rail road,	48,500 00
Western division,	83,034 00
Beaver division,	47,850 00
French creek division,	236,500 00
West branch division,	102,555 00
North branch division,	178,224 00
Delaware division,	70,369 00
Total amount	$1,125,761 00

“To these estimates” the board say, “may be added the following items of expenditures on the Columbia and Portage rail roads, required to put them into a fit condition for public use, as will appear by reference to the reports of the engineers, viz:—”

	$531,231 00
Making altogether	$1,676,992 00

RAIL ROADS. An examination of the rail road reports recently published by the legislature, affords some interesting facts for those who desire to make investments in such stocks, as well as the community generally. The Lowell rail road received last year from passengers, $34,369 10—freight, $76,23 47; and Andrew and Haverhill, $17,996 76; Nashua, $1,976 24; total, $191,773 57. Expenditures, $75,597 94—leaving a nett balance, without any reserve for disposition, of $116,180 63. The corporation also expended, as they report, $67,268 75 for objects not ordinary, and therefore carried to the account of construction. Dividends last year, $90,000, or six per cent. The Boston and Providence rail road received $195,974 73 for passengers, $64,143 92 for freight, $2,250 00 for the mail, and $1,741 50 for rents—total, $255,115 00; they divided 8 per cent. on their capital, $136,312 00; their expenditures were $120,048 00, leaving a surplus of $146,267 72. The capital is now 1,752,000 00; to make 8 per cent. on which, they must earn a nett, without any reservation for depreciation, of $143,560 00. This road should have two tracks, which would enable them to provide for steamboat passengers; at once. The Boston and Worcester rail road earned $212,432 00, viz: $112,032 43 for passengers, $94,827 31 for freight, mail, &c., $5,465 29 for rents, &c. Their expenses now (exclusive of amounts charged to construction,) $85,572 97; balance, $126,742 06; they divided $102,000 on a capital of $1,700,000, and reserved $15,000 for depreciation, &c. The Eastern rail road (to Salem,) expended $831,903 30, and their receipts from August 28 to December 31, were $37,422—exp. nes, $17,818 19. 100,000 passengers were carried from August 28 to January 18. The Taunton Branch rail road received $70,336 99, and expended $34,996 05. Their capital paid in is $249,825. [Bost. Mercantile Journal.

DEAF AND DUMB. In accordance with the requirements of their charter, the directors of the Pennsylvania institution for the deaf and dumb have presented their annual report to the legislature. The whole number of deaf and dumb in the institution is 115, sixty-two are supported wholly or in part by the commonwealth of Pennsylvania; fifteen are supported by Maryland; twelve by New Jersey; two by the institution. The remaining sixteen are supported by their friends. Of these, Pennsylvania, New York and Delaware have each one; Missouri, Louisiana, New Jersey and North Carolina, each two; and Virginia, five. *Of the Pennsylvania state pupils, fifteen are from Philadelphia. During the past year, twenty-seven have been added to, and fourteen have left the institution. Several additions have been made to the buildings, which have proved well adapted to procure comfort and health. An additional story has been added to the school room for the convenience of the department of instruction, and the arrangement and preservation of the instruction of the deaf and dumb. NAVAL. Extracts from the report of capt. Joseph Smith of the United States ship Ohio, dated 25th of December, 1838, and transmitted to the department by com. Isaac Hull, commanding United States naval forces in the Mediterranean. “Of the state and condition of the ship’s company, I am happy to say, that perfect harmony and subordination exist, and a zeal to do their duty, each in his proper sphere, is apparent in all ranks. The officers, generally, are intelligent and competent, and evince a disposition to exert themselves to make the ship what it is desirable she should be. The men are well behaved and subordinate, and, with but few exceptions, are efficient.” * * * “The ship accommodates her officers and crew as well as ships of her class can, as far as I am able to judge. I have, with commander Stockton, made inquiry of the officers occupying rooms on the orlop deck, as to their convenience and comfort, and they stated that their apartments had been quite comfortable, and much more so than they had expected to find them. “Thus far that deck has proved extremely comfortable to all whose berths are there, and much more so, in my opinion than any other deck could have been made, for all its occupants. The consumption of oil and candles is an objection here, as it is in all ships below, but certainly not more so in this than in any other ship.

“The orlop deck can be, and has been, kept clean and dry, and well ventilated by windails, and I have perceived no ill effects, and, as far as I have learned, I believe no instance of ill health is attributable to, or exists in consequence of, sleeping or dressing on that deck.”

CRUISE OF THE BOSTON. The U. S. sloop of war Boston arrived at Pensacola the 22d ultimo, after a cruise of 149 days among the Keys, and along the coast of Florida and Cuba, having passed inside the Florida reefs from Sombrero Key to the dry Tortugas, a passage never before performed by a sloop of war. The Gazette of Pensacola states that the Boston had been detained much longer than her appointed time, in consequence of the active part taken by her commander in relation to the difficulties arising between the masters of some American vessels and the authorities of Havana, involving questions of much importance.

Before leaving Havana, a memorial from American citizens resident therein, and masters of vessels in port at the time, was presented to capt. Babbin, expressive of their thanks for the able and zealous manner in which he had espoused their cause, and also their gratitude for the benefit which had accrued to them from the protection afforded by his presence. The officers of the Boston contradict a statement that has appeared in the American papers, reporting that a marked slight or affront had been offered to the officers of the Boston by those of a British sloop of war at the Havana. So far from this being the case, it is asserted that the most friendly intercourse existed between them. Compliments of the most cordial character have been interchanged, not only with the English, but the French squadron also—the ball given by the prince de Joinville having been attended by all the officers that could be spared from duty.

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN. The following characteristic letter of Dr. Franklin has never before been published, so far as we have been able to ascertain. The original is in the possession of a venerable gentleman of this city, who numbers four score years. It is conclusive against the often asserted declaration that Franklin was inclined to infidelity. We should be glad to know if the town of Franklin ever received the books, and if they were the foundation of a parochial library. [Boston Trans.

Passy, March 13, 1755. “My dear friend: I by my nephew, Mr. Williams, will have the honor of delivering you this line. It is to request from you a few good books, to the value of about £25, such as are most proper to inculcate principles of sound religion, and just government. A new town in the state of Massachusetts having done me the honor of naming itself after me, and proposing to build a steeple to their meeting house if I would give them a bell, I have advised the sparing themselves the expense of a steeple at present, and that they would accept books instead of a bell, sense being preferable to sound. These are, therefore, intended as the commencement of a little parochial library for the use of a society of intelligent farmers, such as our country people generally consist of. Besides your own works, I would mention, on recommendation of my sister, ‘Stuart’s Discourses on Personal Religion,’ which may be one book of the number, if you know it. With the highest esteem and respect, I am ever, my dear friend, yours most affectionately. [Rev. Dr. Price.” “B. FRANKLIN.”

HON. B. C. HOWARD. We find the following note in the Boston Atlas, to the editor of which paper it was addressed:— “Dear sir: Perceiving a suggestion in the Atlas as to the authorship of the report of the committee on foreign affairs concerning the late events in Maine, I beg leave to state that the report was wholly written by Mr. Howard, of Maryland, the chairman of the committee; and as the report is highly creditable to his ability and patriotism, it is proper the part he has acted in this emergency should be universally understood, especially in Massachusetts and Maine. I am, yours respectfully, Richard Houghton, esq. C. CUSHING.

MAJOR WINSTON. The chief happiness of this old soldier’s life, was his association with his military companions—and it was his dying request that he should be buried with military honors. We understand that the scene at the grave was most imposing. The knapsack the major had worn at Yorktown, and his canteen, were exhibited precious to consigning them to the grave with him, according to his request. The knapsack was of coarse canvas, and the canteen of wood, indicative of the toils and privations our fathers of the revolution endured for liberty’s sake.

A few days before his death, he observed, that for the last twenty-eight years, he had never failed upon the twenty-second of February, and fourth of July, to have on his "regimentals" in honor of those days. He expressed a wish to be able to appear in the dress of the soldier on the 22d. On the 22d he was almost in an insensible state, but the firing of the morning guns filled him with evident and strong emotion. The day was bright and beautiful, but his companions passed on to their usual festivities without him. And it was not more than an hour or two after the evening guns had told the day was gone, that his spirit bade them all farewell forever.

MR. ADAM ECKFELD. The Pennsylvanian contains a beautiful tribute of respect to Mr. Adam Eckfeld, who has recently resigned his post as chief coiner of the mint, in consequence of old age, after having devoted more than forty years to his duties, during which period not the slightest suspicion rested upon his integrity. He was appointed to office by Washington, and has left behind him in the mint many lasting monuments of his skill and genius as a mechanic, and of his devotion to his country's interest.

ONE DAY LATER FROM ENGLAND.

The packet ship North America brings London papers of the 6th, and Liverpool of the 7th February.

The London papers of the 6th are chiefly filled with the discussion on the addresses in the two houses of parliament in answer to the queen's speech.

Accounts from Paris say that the announcement of the dissolution of the French chambers had produced no public expression of disapprobation.

The French corps of observation on the Belgian frontier was nearly complete. Prussia was making counter movements, and had called out the war reserves in the Rhenish provinces.

The North America has been for fifteen days west of the Grand Bank, during which she has experienced very heavy westerly gales, by which considerable damage was done to the sails. When in lat. 46, lon. 43 W. on the 4th inst., the ship was surrounded by several large islands of ice, the sea, far as the eye-sight could reach, being completely covered with it.

As of the greatest immediate interest, we give those passages of several speeches relating to the affairs of Canada. The Duke of Wellington said:

My lords: I now come to the last part of the speech, to which I have listened with the utmost anxiety, and I am happy to find in this speech what was thought necessary on a former occasion, namely, a declaration on the part of her majesty of her firm determination to maintain her sovereignty over her provinces in North America. My lords, I could wish that this declaration of her majesty had been accompanied by corresponding efforts to enable her majesty to carry these intentions into effect.

It is a trifling insurrection, and confined to one part of the country; but it has been accompanied by an invasion and an attack upon the persons and property of her majesty's peaceable subjects on all parts of the frontier adjoining the United States, by inhabitants of the United States, and for no reason whatever but because her majesty's subjects are obedient and loyal to her majesty [hear! and cheer.]

Certainly, my lords, I should wish to see a corresponding preparation made, and measures adopted, with a view of carrying into execution the intentions which her majesty has declared, of maintaining her sovereignty over these provinces. [Cheers.] My lords, the system of private war which prevails on that frontier is unknown in any other part of the world. We read of such things in the history of barbarian nations—we read of such a system carried on against the Austrian monarchy, which lasted from century to century. All these were wars of barbarism against civilization. Never were there any instances of such wars between civilized nations except in the case before us.

I trust noble lords and the other house of parliament will look a little further into this very important subject, and draw the attention of government closely to it; for it appears to me eminently necessary that some measure should be taken to induce the government of the United States to put into operation some effectual steps for the suppression of these outrageous proceedings. [Hear, hear.]

Let them consider closely the consequences of that invasion, for it seems to me, that if any steps are not speedily taken on the part of her majesty to enforce that passage of the royal speech of which I approve so highly, we shall find our province of Upper Canada treated much in the same way in which the province of Texas has been treated.

[Hear, hear, hear.] This is a point to which I beg to draw the particular attention of her majesty's government.

I entreat of them to consider this war as a great national war; [hear, hear!] to remember that the highest national interests are involved in it, and that we must proceed on a large scale of action, if we wish to bring it to an early and satisfactory period. [hear, hear.]

I have no doubt of the intentions of the president of the United States in the matter, but, at the same time, I cannot but feel regret when I see American subjects coming armed into our territory, armed and provided, too, with cannon taken from the United States and belonging to the United States, [hear, hear!] I cannot, I say, but feel deep regret and much surprise, when I see these American subjects publicly invading our territories, and am told that it cannot be prevented by the government of the United States [hear, hear.]

There can, I conceive, be no doubt but that the civil government of any country is capable at any time of preventing the collection of bodies of troops within its territory, and their invasion of neighboring states. [Hear, hear, hear.] But here we see the United States sitting down quietly, and taking hardly any notice whatever of the invasion by its subjects of the British provinces. [hear, hear.]

Lord Melbourne—in alluding to another part of the speech, the subject of which it is impossible to regard without considerable uneasiness and vexation—I refer to the state of Canada—the noble duke, while he appears to approve of that part of the speech, states that he could have wished to see some corresponding measures of vigor adopted by the government, in order to carry that determination into elective operation.

It is quite clear that a state of things does exist on the North American frontier greatly to be deplored; yet, when we remember the disposition exhibited by the various states there to interfere with each other's affairs, and the tendency to private warfare with each other, not greatly to be wondered at. When, however, the noble duke so strongly expresses his regret at not seeing a vigorous demonstration made on our Canadian frontier, in order to enable our subjects there to repel the outrageous aggressions upon them, I am somewhat at a loss to understand what he has to complain of in this respect.

There is in that country a very large regular establishment, besides a very considerable militia force, together forming an army powerful enough to laugh to scorn any attempt which may be made by the sympathisers. When, however, we consider the character of the country, its innumerable and extensive lakes, forests, morasses, it would be quite impossible to keep up such a force as utterly to prevent all sudden aggressions and predatory excursions.

Therefore I know not, with reference to this province itself, what stronger measure you could adopt, with respect to the government of the United States. I agree with the noble duke that every means should be taken to do that which is the duty of every government to do, namely, to keep its subjects within its own frontier, and prevent bodies of men, the subjects of one state, making attacks on their neighbors in another.

There is no reason, I apprehend, to doubt the sincerity of the government of the United States as to its wish to carry into effect the stipulations binding on it as regards its duties to its neighbors; but, considering the nature of the country—considering the vast extent of the frontier—considering the comparative wildness of those districts—and also considering the character of the government—it must be admitted that it has serious difficulties to contend with in carrying this object into effect.

Every exertion, however, has been used, and every representation has been made, in order to induce the government of the United States to exert itself for this object. [hear, hear!] I therefore trust that these exertions will be successful, and, above all, when it is known what has been the result in our provinces, where every attempt that has been made at invasion has been completely discomfited. I trust, therefore, that an end will be put to this wild spirit, which is as dangerous to their neighbors as it is discredit to those citizens of the United States. [hear, hear.]

Lord Melbourne was followed by the same effect, by Lord Brougham.

The territory, said his lordship, which bounded the American states toward Canada was wild, barren, and in many places uninhabited for a considerable distance; the frontier could be easily passed over, and there was little or no impediment to going from the territory of one state to that of the other. The noble duke said that the feeling which induced the parties to engage in the attempt on Canada did not arise from any wish to aid the rebellion, but that they were influenced by a worse feeling.

The noble duke said that if this predatory system continued—if it were persevered in—all the powers of the English government in Canada, would not be able to prevent retaliations by the people of Canada on the United States.

Were they to be told that all the powers of the government—which was more solidly established and much more vigorous in its character than the government of the United States could be—were they to be told that our government, with 12,000 regular troops, besides a large militia force, even when backed by the bulk of the people—was unable to do that which Mr. President Van Buren with very slender means—with the people not taking part with him, but with the people against him, not having a regular army and a strong militia to back him—was strongly censured for not doing.

How readily and how justly could Mr. Van Buren put forward this excuse when he heard it said, on the authority of the noble duke, that even our own government, with a much larger force and much more firmly established, could not prevent reprisals? We were also told that these proceedings were chiefly arose from the intensity of the feeling of dislike to the British government.

Admitting, however, that the intensity of this feeling was as great as was represented, still he thought that there was little doubt as to the sincerity of the American president, as regarded the English government. He felt, for his own part very strongly with respect to any attack on the American people or government, which might put a stop to the peace that happily existed between this country and the United States, which he looked upon as of the greatest possible importance to England as well as to America, and indeed, to the peace and civilization of the whole world.

Looking, therefore, in the one scale of the balance, at the continuance of these pacific relations and of the unbroken harmony that now prevailed while in the other scale the value of the whole of the Canadian possessions of the crown, the latter would most certainly, in his opinion, kick the beam. On the subject of the corn laws lord Melbourne said:—

The corn laws have been ever since the formation of the present government an entirely open question—a question on which all the various members of the administration had formed their own distinct opinions, and have ever acted according to those opinions. [hear!] Unquestionably, my lords, I believe that the majority of these gentlemen are favorable to a change in the present system. [hear, hear, hear!]—but if the noble lord infers his opinion from the speech which has been heard from the throne, I beg leave to tell him that he infers the opinion erroneously. [hear, hear.] I am not willing to go into any debate on the corn laws—the present occasion to state my individual opinion has no reference to state my individual opinion on the corn laws; and this, my lords, is that which I stated in the few observations which I made last year; observations which attracted considerable notice, more of course from the eminent station which the individual who delivered them happened to possess, than from any intrinsic force of their own.

The opinion, my lords, which I then expressed and to which I now distinctly adhere, is, that though I am not prepared to pledge or bind myself to the maintenance of the present system as the best possible, I am not at the same time prepared, either as member of the government, or as a member of parliament, to pledge myself, from any information which I have, to a change or alteration of the law as it stands. [hear, hear.]

In the house of commons Mr. Villiers gave notice that on the 15th he would offer a motion for taking evidence at the bar of the house, in support of a petition for the repeal of the corn laws.

Mr. E. Bulwer moved the address in answer to the speech, which was seconded by Mr. G. W. Wood.

Mr. J. Duncombe moved an amendment, to the effect that the reform bill had disappointed the people—that it was not and could not be a final measure—and that it was the duty of the house to take immediate steps for farther improvement. He supported his amendment in a long speech, bearing very hard upon the ministers; his motion was seconded by the earl of Enston, and supported in very long speech by Mr. Hume.

Sir Robert Peel commented at length and with great severity on the recent movements in Canada and Quebec, of which we read in the United States, concluding, however, with saying that

It was his duty, therefore, as a member of the British parliament, to make an appeal to the United States against the injustice of such a course [hear!]

The honorable baronet almost committed himself in favor of the existing corn laws.

On the affairs of Canada, lord John Russel was explicit enough, declaring that the supremacy of England must be maintained in North America, at all hazards, and that whether the expense was great or small, ministers were ready to encounter it. He declared, however, that no suspicion of bad faith could attach to the government of the United States, and that it had done every thing that could be expected of it.

On the subject of the corn law he said that He, (lord John Russel,) had certainly been of opinion in 1828 that a modified fixed scale of duties would be better than a fluctuating scale; but at the same time he thought the new law a great improvement upon the former system, and therefore he gave it his support. But he now thought, however, that the time had arrived when it should be considered whether that law had acted beneficially or not. [Hear, hear!]

He was not prepared at the present moment to enter into a discussion of the subject; but he thought that the respectability and importance of the interests calling for the repeal of these laws entitled them, not perhaps to be heard at the bar of the house, but to the most patient investigation on the part of the house of any facts which they might bring forward, so that it should not go forth that the house had shown itself indifferent to any subject so deeply affecting the interests and welfare of the people at large; (cheers.)

MR. WEBSTER AND THE BOUNDARY QUESTION.

From the New York American, March 14.
In explanation of certain expressions imputed to Mr. Webster, on the floor of the senate, which seemed to imply a warlike spirit or tendency, we are gratified to have it in our power to refer to the annexed correspondence, communicated to us for publication. It proves that Mr. Webster desires and expects a peaceful issue to the Maine question:

New York, March 9, 1839.
My dear sir: I find our community in a very excited temper with respect to the border controversy, which, in the opinion of many, threatens inevitable and early hostilities between England and the United States. Such an event seems to me so improbable, that I take every occasion to express my disbeliever in it; but I am constantly answered, that you have yourself commended these alarms, and a declaration on the floor of the senate is ascribed to you, that if E. gland did not settle this matter by the 4th of July next, the disputed territory should be seized by the United States. This statement is so much unlike all that I heard from you while we were together recently in Washington, and is so entirely at variance with the cool, statesmanlike views which characterize your public career, that I cannot believe in its accuracy. I therefore take the liberty of inquiring what were the opinions expressed by you on the occasion referred to; and, also, what are your views in respect to the termination of our present difficulties with England.

With great respect, yours,
DAVID B. OGDEN.
Hon. D. Webster, Washington city.

Washington, March 11, 1839.
My dear sir: I should be very sorry, indeed, to be thought to have become heated on this important subject of the northeastern boundary, or to have used expressions either leading to war, or manifesting a conviction, on my part, that war was inevitable. You know what I have said on this subject, at different times, through the winter. I have never seen the account of my remarks in the senate to which you refer. I am certainly of opinion that the controversy should be settled; but I have never contemplated it as a probable event, that two great nations would go to war, to the inevitable sacrifice of so many great interests, and to the agitation of the whole commercial world, on such a question. I have never expected such a result, and do not expect it now. What I meant to say, on the occasion referred to, by you, and to say strongly, was this—that it was high time for the two governments to adjust this controversy; but that it had been too long bandied between them as the subject of formal and procrustian diplomacy; that its condition was every day growing worse and worse, and more and more dangerous to the peace of both nations; that Maine, having explored the country by commissioners, and having ascertained, as she thought, the perfect practicability of finding and making the true original treaty line, was naturally becoming more and more dissatisfied; that negotiation should now be tried with something of a more earnest spirit; and if, unfortunately all amicable attempts should ultimately fail—if the two governments, much as it was to be desired and hoped, should be able to do nothing jointly, to ascertain or fix the boundary, a time must come, of necessity, when the United States must perform that duty for themselves, that they ought in that case, to explore the country, and to examine the question carefully; and if it should turn out, as I believe it would, that the treaty line could be easily and certainly found, then the United States, in the event above mentioned, ought to mark it and assume it as the true line, and to take possession accordingly; and in this connexion, I mentioned the 4th of July as a day in the year of which we often speak as suited to important political decisions. But certainly I could not have intended to say that our government ought to take possession of the disputed territory on the 4th day of July next, as I was, at the time, favoring a proposition for sending a special minister to England, who could hardly be expected to reach London much before that time.

It may be hoped, my dear sir, that what has occurred, and is still occurring, may have been the effect of bringing about an early, satisfactory, and final adjustment of the whole difficult—a result which no one can desire more sincerely than myself.

Yours, with respectful regard,
DANIEL WEBSTER.

LETTER FROM MR. UNDERWOOD.

From the National Intelligencer.
TO THE EDITORS.

March 16, 1839.
GENTLEMEN: My attention was called, by a friend, on Wednesday morning last, to a paragraph in the Globe of the preceding evening, in which, by a misstatement of facts and erroneous inferences, I am exhibited to the public as either a very inefficient or a very faithless accountant in the first auditor's office. I immediately wrote a brief statement of the real facts of the case, and sent it to the editors for insertion in their paper. The day following, one of them called at the auditor's office, and, after full explanation in the presence of the auditor, promised to make the necessary correction. I have waited two days longer without a fulfillment of the promise, and, fearing that it was being entirely forgotten, or that non-performance will be so long delayed as to be nearly equivalent to an indefinite postponement, I request the favor of you to publish the statement which I gave him. It will be perceived that I confine myself entirely to facts, and those which relate exclusively to myself. I do not attempt to disturb the inferences he has drawn from his own premises, that "it was through this man's eyes alone, under the supervision of the auditor and controller, that the secretary could know any thing of the vouchers and items of Swartwout's accounts;" or that, "while this good uhig clerk, who, from the beginning to the end, adjusted Swartwout's business, is praised in the discrimination which enabled him to discover nothing amiss, and whose reasons for the failure are adjudged entirely satisfactory, the secretary who had nothing before him but what came second-hand, and in a hump, is made the sixth and final cause of the delinquency." I say, as regards this course of reasoning, it is not my purpose to say any thing, my subject being to maintain the character which I have ever sustained, of an honest, faithful, and, I trust, an efficient accountant in the first auditor's office.

To enable your readers to understand the case, it will be necessary to publish the paragraph to which the statement applies, and which is as follows:

"Mr. Underwood, whom the committee extol as one who, 'with equal care and propriety,' 'discriminates between the accounts of Mr. Swartwout,' &c. is the very clerk who, from first to last, has had the settlement of Mr. Swartwout's accounts in the auditor's office. He passed upon all the vouchers, and summed up all the statements of the New York collector. He saw that all was fair, and the committee impute no negligence—no want of vigilance, in him for failing to detect the deficit. It was through this man's eyes alone, under the supervision of the auditor and controller, that the secretary could know any thing of the vouchers and items of Swartwout's accounts. But while this good uhig clerk, who, from the beginning to the end, adjusted Swartwout's business, is praised for the discrimination which enabled him to discover nothing amiss, and whose reasons for the failure are adjudged entirely satisfactory, the secretary who had nothing before him but what came second-hand, and in the hump, is made the sixth and final cause of the delinquency."

* The editor of the "Globe," in his paper of the 18th inst. states, that he intended in the evening's semi-weekly "Globe" for that day, to give Mr. Underwood's note to him.

The following is the statement which I requested the editors of the Globe to publish:

"Messrs. Blair and Rives—Gentlemen: I beg leave respectfully to state that I am not 'the very clerk who, from first to last, has had the settlement of Mr. Swartwout's accounts in the office of the first auditor,' as represented in your paper of last evening; but, on the contrary, that I never settled any account of Mr. Swartwout prior to that of third quarter of 1837; that I was engaged on said accounts only during the sickness of the clerk whose proper duty it was to adjust them; and that the delinquency, not ascertained in the bonds during the time the accounts were examined by me, occurred in the third and fourth quarters of 1837, amounting to only $7,746 19."

It may also be added, that the clerk who stated the accounts of New York in the first auditor's office could not, with any propriety, be held responsible for the accuracy of the bond accounts, as by a regulation adopted in the office in 1822, the duty of examining them was assigned to another clerk, to whom the same were delivered as soon as they reached the office.

"I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
JNO. UNDERWOOD.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

The Baltimore American, under the appropriate caption of "Hints for Maryland," contains the following interesting notes of appropriations for works of internal improvement in several states.

The annexed items reached us simultaneously in the papers of the last mails, and we place them together for the purpose of showing at a glance what other states are doing, and as hints to Maryland to "go and do likewise." We ask particular attention to the efforts which Pennsylvania has made, and is still making, to push her communications from her principal city to the west, while we have been literally standing still. Her lines of rail road already reach to Chambersburg, and before the year expires will be extended south to the Potomac. In the meantime the extension of the rail road westward to Pittsburg is seriously contemplated, and can only be averted by the prompt adoption on the part of Maryland, of such measures as will leave no doubt of her determination to push the Baltimore and Ohio rail road to the western waters with the utmost vigor.

Pennsylvania. The Harrisburg Reporter of Friday says:—"The bill authorising the governor to subscribe stock to the Franklin rail road company to the amount of one hundred thousand dollars, has passed both houses, and only awaits the signature of the governor to become a law. This is a highly important work, connecting the Columbia rail road, by means of the Lancaster and Harrisburg, and Chambersburg rail roads with the great national road. We understand that the subscription authorized by the state, will enable the company to complete the road during the present summer. The Franklin rail road commences at Chambersburg, and runs south through Hagerstown to Williamsport, on the Potomac. In the Philadelphia Commercial List of Saturday, we find the following paragraph which has a close connection with the foregoing:

Cumberland Valley railway. The Chambersburg Repository gives a gratifying account of the amount of produce and merchandise transported on this road. A large quantity of goods are daily despatched from Chambersburg to Pittsburg, by wagons. Supplies from the west are also coming in freely. Among other articles, the quantity of flour forwarded to this city for some weeks past, has averaged three hundred barrels per day. Formerly this flour was sent to Baltimore, and was among the best for sale on Howard street.

Chambersburg and Pittsburg rail road. We learn from the Harrisburg Keystone of Friday, that the bill reported to the lower house of the legislature, making appropriations for works of internal improvement, has the following items:

For the construction of a rail road from Chambersburg to Pittsburg, three hundred thousand dollars to be expended on the western end of said road, commencing at Pittsburg, and extending eastwardly, and the canal commissioners are hereby authorized to locate said road from Pittsburg to Ligonier, and place thirty miles of the same under contract during the present year.

The canal commissioners are also authorized and required to employ an experienced and competent engineer, whose duty it shall be to make a thorough examination and survey with a view to form a connection between Chambersburg and Pittsburg, by means of a continuous rail road or graded Macadamized road, as the case may be, and to report as to which may be deemed the most advisable, for which the sum of twelve thousand dollars is hereby specifically appropriated.

Missachusetts. The Boston Atlas of Friday says—"We congratulate the people of the commonwealth upon the passage by the house of representatives of the bill granting the credit of the state to raise an additional loan of $1,200,000 for the completion of the western rail road.

This sum will complete the rail road from Worcester to the New York line, and thus open a complete rail road communication between Boston and the North river.

Tennessee. A bill has passed the lower house of the legislature providing for a subscription on the part of the state of $1,250,000 to the stock of the Nashville and New Orleans rail road. This sum will secure the extension of the work as far as the state line of Mississippi.

Georgia. The legislature of this state has authorized the loan of one and a half millions of dollars, for the purpose of completing the Georgia rail road to the Tennessee river.

Virginia. In the house of delegates on Thursday last, a bill was passed 70 to 36, granting a further loan to the James river and Kanawha canal company.

PENNSYLVANIA.

GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE IN RELATION TO THE PERMANENT LOAN, &c.

To the senate and house of representatives of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

GENTLEMEN: In pursuance of the act of the general assembly of this commonwealth, passed the 26th January last, entitled "an act authorising a loan," public notice was given by the secretary of the commonwealth on the 4th day of February last, that proposals would be received at his office until two o'clock, P. M., of Tuesday the 5th day of March, 1839, for loaning one million two hundred thousand dollars to the commonwealth for the purposes set forth in said act, reimbursable at any time after twenty years from the 1st day of July next, and bearing an interest not exceeding five per cent per annum, payable semi-annually. A copy of which notice is herewith communicated.

I regret to say that no proposals have been received in pursuance of this invitation, and thus too at a time when it is conceded that money is not scarce, and the credit of the state is unimpaired.

How long the representatives of a free people will submit to a state of things manifestly brought about by a combination among the institutions of their own creation, it is for the legislature to determine, but there is certainly a manifest impropriety in permitting the monied resources of the commonwealth to be used for her own injury. She owns of the capital stock of the bank of Pennsylvania 3,750 shares at $400, amount at their par value to $1,500,000, 5,233 shares in the Philadelphia bank at

1,703 shares in the Farmers and Mechanics bank at $50	85,400

Amount in the whole to $2,108,700. And which are believed to be worth a considerable advance. Every day's experience strengthens me in the opinion long since formed, that all connection should be dissolved between the commonwealth and the banks in which she holds stock, and thus relieve her from the humiliating attitudes she occupies of being the holder of three fifths of the whole capital stock in one of said banks, and unable to control the direction of a single dollar of its loans. Believing finally that such a divorce will be beneficial to the interest of the commonwealth, I earnestly recommend the passage of a law authorizing the sale of bank stock held by the commonwealth as aforesaid. This administration has been but a little over a month in power, and has been obliged to ask loans to pay off engagements which it had no hand in contracting, and finds itself embarrassed in its outset for want of means to meet the engagements of the commonwealth. So far as it has the ability, its exertions will continue to be steadily directed to discharge the public liabilities, and maintain unshaken the public faith. If in its efforts so to do, difficulties are interposed by attempts at combination among monied men and monied institutions, they most assuredly will discover, that so long as the executive power remains in the hands in which it is now placed, they shall never control either its political or fiscal operations; but that 'till this great commonwealth must, and will rise superior to all such attempts.

All experience goes to show that the evils anticipated, by many of the best and most sagacious statesmen, from the grants of corporate powers to monied institutions, have been more than realized, and should admonish us to be cautious in continuing to make such unrestricted grants.

With no desire to create distrust or alarm, I cannot but feel that it is the misuse and abuse of the powers thus committed to such institutions that have more than once led to the embarrassments in the monetary concerns of the country. I cannot close this communication without appealing to the legislature, and calling upon them by every principle of patriotism, to take such action in this matter as will enable the state to vindicate her character and credit, and to take immediate measures for separating the state from all connection with a set of institutions that have so repeatedly disappointed the just expectations of the public, and on which no reliance can be placed when the exigencies of the state may require a call upon them.

DAVID R. PORTER.

POLITICS OF THE DAY.

From the Harrisburg Patriot.

HON. SILAS WRIGHT.

The democratic members of the legislature having understood that the hon. Silas Wright had arrived at the seat of government, on his return from Washington city, immediately held a meeting, and resolved to tender him a public dinner, as an evidence of the high regard they entertain for him as a statesman and republican. The engagements of Mr. Wright prevented him from accepting the invitation. The following is the correspondence on the subject.

Harrisburg, March 5th, 1839.

DEAR SIR: At a meeting of the democratic members of the legislature of Pennsylvania, the following preamble and resolution were unanimously adopted.

"Whereas, it is ascertained that the hon. Silas Wright is now in Harrisburg,

"Resolved, That a committee of three members of the senate and three members of the house of representatives be appointed to invite the hon. Silas Wright, a member of the United States senate, to partake of an entertainment at such time as may suit his convenience, and to make the necessary arrangements."

"Resolved, That a committee of three members of the foregoing resolution, take peculiar pleasure in carrying it into effect, and sincerely hope you will gratify them by accepting the invitation.

With sentiments of profound respect, your friends,
HENRY MYERS,
SAM. HAYS,
WM. F. COPLAN,
WM. HOPKINS,
CHARLES PRAY,
THOMAS B. McELWEE.

HON. SILAS WRIGHT.

Harrisburg, March 5, 1839.

GENTLEMEN: Your note of this morning is before me. It is not in my power to express my sense of the obligation it imposes upon me towards the democratic members of the legislature of Pennsylvania. If the invitation, you communicate had proceeded from personal associations and parties, the debt of gratitude would have been greater than I could hope to discharge; but when I realize that it has no such foundation; that there has never been even ordinary personal acquaintance, so far as I know, between myself and a single individual of those for whom you act, and that this testimonial of friendship must have been suggested from some acquaintance of my public service in the high office I hold through the purity of the democracy of my own state, the emotions excited are too deep for expression.

Could I make myself believe that any exertion on my part, as a member of the senate of the United States, had contributed, in a material degree, to the preservation and sustain the cause of the democracy of our country, I should feel, however to feel compelled to acknowledge to you that I dare not, in the face of my immediate constituents, or of yourselves, make so high a claim; and, were other objections removed, I should fear that a compliance with your too generous request would take that appearance on my part. I feel the less regret, therefore, that private considerations compel me to leave Harrisburg, at an early hour to-morrow morning, and, consequently, most respectfully to decline to make the appointment you invite.

Permit me, gentlemen, to congratulate you upon the re-establishment of a democratic administration in your powerful and controlling state. No one event can more essentially contribute to the permanent ascendancy of the democratic party of the whole union, or to the practical establishment and diffusion of those sacred republican principles upon which alone our governments, state and national, can be administered with safety to public liberty and benefit to the people. That harmony among yourselves, and in the ranks of your democratic constituents, which achieved the late victory of the republicans of your state, will perpetuate the blessings; and that it now prevails, in an eminent degree, affords every cause for congratulation.

The public mind has been recently excited by the prospect of a foreign war, to grow out of our frontier disturbances, and the unsettled questions of boundary between the United States and the British possessions in America, and the friends of our present national administration, have naturally and properly felt deep anxiety that the discretion and wisdom of those to whom were entrusted the management of these delicate questions should be equal to the crisis. Can there be better or stronger evidence that the confidence of the democracy of the country in the president has not been misplaced, than the late almost unanimous action of congress, touching these differences? Or can republicans withdraw their support from an administration which receives such evidence of confidence from all political parties, when apprehensions of national calamity arouse a patriotism elevated far above the ordinary impulses of party strife? May we not then hope that the desperation of our political contests is yielding to a love of country, and of those republican principles, which, practically administered, have preserved us in peace through so great a portion of our national existence, and raised us to a condition of unexampled prosperity?

Be pleased, gentlemen, to communicate the substance of this hasty note to those for whom you act, and to accept my sincere acknowledgments for the kind terms in which you have made known to me their wishes.

With the highest respect, your obedient servant,
SILAS WRIGHT, Jr.,
Hon. Henry Myers, Samuel Hays, William F. Coplan, William Hopkins, Charles Pray, Thomas B. McElwee, Committee, &c.

From the United States Gazette.

The Philadelphia democratic whig association met on Monday evening, the 11th instant, at Corel's, but which was the throng, that it was found necessary to adjourn to the court-house, where a party only of those who wished to attend were enabled to obtain admission.

Joshua Randall, esq., president, took the chair. The hon. John Sergeant responded to a call, and with his usual eloquence, stirred up the whigs to good feelings and good resolves. We were unable to squeeze into a place of audience until near the close of the address, but found that the true feeling were animating the speaker and extending to the audience. Mr. S. urged the whigs to prepare for the June state convention, and to abide by their principles, the principles by which they had united and by which they must stand or fall. He urged them to a due consideration of means to carry out their principles, and assured them that success with the whigs would not remedy the national evils, and would be liable to be defeated. As a high-minded minority, we might prevent evils, but successful wit incompetent men, we could neither do good nor prevent wrong.

Mr. Sergeant concluded amid the hearty applause of the meeting, and the hon. W. C. Preston, United States senator from South Carolina, was loudly called for, who came forward amid the cheers of the company.

Mr. Preston expressed the high degree of pleasure which he felt in once more meeting his brethren of the city of Philadelphia. It was, he said, five years since he had visited the city on the invitation of those whom he had now the pleasure of meeting. He then stood by the side with those whose lead he was proud to follow—his distinguished colleague, a senator from Mississippi, a senator from Alabama, a senator from Mississippi, a senator from the house of representatives from his own state. Those gentlemen were now mostly estranged from him. It was unnecessary to go into causes, but they had been such as to leave him standing aloof the solitary whig member of the United States senate south of the Potomac.

But the cause which he supported was the same now that it was in 1834; he stood upon the same ground, maintained the same principles, and battled against the same abuses of power and executive usurpation now that he did then; and, by the will of God, he would maintain that ground and fight it to the last, flinch who might.

He alluded to the severe contest which the whigs in congress had been compelled to sustain. It required all their exertions to keep the ruinous measures of the administration in check; they could do little else; they had prevented much evil by defeating the sub-treasury bill; but they could do no more. Even under the defeat of that bill—its suspension, for it was not yet killed, only scotched—the country began to rise from its depressed state, and to exert her energies. But, if this were the case, when the career of the present administration has been only checked, what might not be expected when the whigs should displace the present powers that be, and be able to act efficiently, and to carry out their conservative principles? We should then see the whole country rise, and expand, and teem with prosperity. Industry would find encouragement and protection, the shackles would be removed from commerce, confidence would be restored, and no man would have cause to fear any fatal blow to his prospects from the government, which was not now the case, and had not been for many years past.

Mr. P. urged upon the whigs the necessity of being UNITED. They must sustain the broad principles of whigism, the only ism, he said, by which they could sustain themselves. If they were united, they might look forward to certain triumph. He as fully believed, if they stood by their principles, and pressed forward in the good cause, shoulder to shoulder, they would come off victorious, as he believed in an all-wise and overruling providence. But if they did not, defeat was certain—it was in vain to talk of victory without UNION.

James E. he said, was with us, Georgia was with us, North Carolina, Louisiana, and Mississippi were with us, and Virginia was coming, if she had not already come; and what he asked had brought them to us? The principles—the banner, the ensign, the conservative principles of whigism. These principles had sent a Wise, of Virginia, a Dawson, of Georgia, a Prentiss, of Mississippi, a Bell, of Tennessee, and a Stanley, of North Carolina, to congress, and nobly did they sustain the glorious cause.

Yes, he repeated, it is whig principles, and whig principles alone, which has brought so many of the southern states to sustain that banner, and to array themselves against this destructive administration. I implore you, then, he said, one and all, as you regard the success of these principles and this cause, to stand by them and maintain them as the last hope of the nation. Do not suffer any division; let us rally under the same banner, and, supporting the constitutional rights of all sections of the country, stand by each other. Then our success will be certain.

Mr. P. said it did not perhaps become him to speak, in this place, of men; but, as the whig flag could not be suspended without a hand to hold it aloft when raised, he must be indulged in a remark or two upon this subject. The flag under which we rally, he said, is a noble, a broad and expanded one, and proud we are of it; it should be placed in a hand worthy of it, and able to spread it forth upon the breeze. That hand is the hand of Henry Clay. To him, and to no other man, must our banner be entrusted, if we would see it gloriously floating aloft in proud and triumphant victory.

Mr. Clay, he said, was a noble man. He, himself, came into the senate with strong prejudices against him. He had warmly opposed him long before he knew him. In the senate he found himself by his side—he watched him with a suspicious eye—but his prejudices had gradually given way before the power of truth; and, from being a suspicious opponent, he had frankly confessed he had become an admirer of the man. It was not his eloquence—that was well known—it was not the great services which he had rendered his country, and which must be familiar to all, that won him; but it was his noble nature—his fearless support of what his judgment told him was right, regardless of consequences, that called forth his admiration. No man ever looked danger in the eye with a more determined, unblenching countenance, when in the pursuit of truth, or the sustenance of right, than Henry Clay. (Great cheering.) This he spoke of his own knowledge. He had seen him standing, as it were, upon the very edge of a political gulf, down which, apparently, a single step must plunge him. I have seen him (said Mr. P.) look into the gulf with a fixed, yet unblenching eye, and, with all its consequences before him, take the step which he thought duty required. Such a man is Henry Clay. (Cheers.)

I have heard him utter, said Mr. Preston, in his close, sentiments which, had they fallen from the lips of one of the ancients of Greece or Rome, would have been repeated with admiration to the present day. On one occasion, (continued Mr. P.) he did me the honor to send for and consult with me. It was in reference to a step he was about to take, and which will, perhaps, come to your minds without more direct allusions. After stating what he proposed, I suggested whether there would not be danger in it, whether such a course would not injure his own prospects, as well as those of the whig party in general. His reply was, "I did not send for you to ask what might be the effect of the proposed movement on my prospects, but whether it was right; I had rather be right than be prudent."

Such sentiments as these indicate the loftiness of the man, and the high purposes of his soul; and they should call forth the admiration and the confidence of the nation. They point to him as the most worthy to wield her destinies. I avow myself, therefore, for Henry Clay. I will not say I believe the whigs will be defeated unless they rally as one man, in a solid phalanx, around him and their principles. I know it. It is inevitable. But if they do this rally, their triumph is certain. May it be my lot to contribute to what hereafter upon your victory, rather than condole with you, and mourn with the country on your defeat!

Mr. Hoffman, of New York, and Mr. Wise, of Virginia, were called for, but it did not appear that they were in the room.

We took no notes of any speeches, and occupied a position not favorable to hearing. We must not, therefore, be considered as attempting to give more than a sketch of the eloquent remarks of the two distinguished speakers.

When Mr. Preston mentioned the name of Henry Clay in connexion with the whig banner, there was an outburst of feeling that told of the hold which that great man had on the affections of the meeting. Three times they cheered, and then asked for "one more," before they allowed the speaker to proceed. It was a gratifying occasion, and will be productive of good to the country.

On motion of Mr. B. Badger, the association adjourned to meet on Saturday evening next, at seven o'clock, at the Temperance hall, Northern Liberties.

TWENTY-FIFTH CONGRESS,

THIRD SESSION—SENATE.

March 2. Mr. Hubbard presented certain joint resolutions of the legislature of New Hampshire, instructing their senators and requesting their representatives to obtain the adjustment of claims for spoiliations committed by France prior to 1800; which were read, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Morris presented several petitions for the abolition of slavery; which he asked might be received.

On motion of Mr. Clay, of Alabama, the motion to receive was laid upon the table.

Mr. Norvell, on the committee on commerce, to which were referred several memorials on the subject of a steam revenue cutter, made a report thereon, accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That the resolutions and memorials concerning the construction of steam revenue cutters, with a copy of this report, be referred to the secretary of the navy.

The resolution was considered and adopted.

Mr. Culbert, from the committee on naval affairs, to which was referred the memorial of the heirs of Robert Fulton, made a special report thereon; which was read, and ordered to be printed.

The following resolution, submitted by Mr. Benton, was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the senate, at the commencement of the next session of congress, reports upon the military and naval defences of the country, showing—

First. The fortifications, or other permanent defences, commenced, completed, projected, or deemed necessary. For the northern frontier, from Lake Superior to the mouth of the Missouri; for the western frontier, from Passamunquoddy bay to Cape Florida. 3. The Gulf frontier, from Cape Florida to the Sabine bay. 4. The western frontier, from the Sabine bay to lake Superior, with a conjectural estimate of the probable expense of constructing or completing such works as may not yet have been completed or commenced.

Second. The amount of the armament of the fortifications, so far as the same may be completed or commenced, with a conjectural estimate of the expense of completing the armament of all the forts which may be commenced, or deemed necessary to be constructed.

Third. The armories, arsenals, magazines, and foundries, either constructed or deemed necessary, with a conjectural estimate of the expense of constructing such establishments as may not yet be completed or commenced, but which may be deemed necessary.

Fourth. The floating, or steam batteries, or vessels which have been constructed in aid of fortifications, or may be deemed necessary to be constructed in aid of such works, with a conjectural estimate of the expense of constructing such vessels.

Fifth. The ships of war built, or under construction, or deemed necessary to be built, with a conjectural estimate of the expense of building and arming the vessels not yet completed or commenced, or which may be deemed necessary within a reasonable time.

Sixth. The navy yards, docks, and naval establishments of every kind, either constructed or commenced, or deemed necessary, with the probable expense of completing the same.

With any other information or suggestions which the president may deem necessary to be communicated to congress, in order to exhibit a full view of what is necessary to be done, and the probable cost thereof, to place the United States in a proper state of defence, by land and water, and of each of the four great lines of defence which her frontier presents.

Mr. Davis ordered the following resolution, which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to report to the senate, at the next session of congress, whether any change in the system of marine hospitals is expedient; and, if so, what, and especially if any new hospitals are necessary, and in what manner they ought to be erected if deemed expedient, and how supported.

The bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the government for the year 1839, was taken up, and the question being on the amendment proposed by the committee on finance, to strike out the appropriation for the documentary history—

Mr. Benton spoke at much length against the appropriation, and also against the distribution of the books, and read from reports of committees to justify what he said. He considered this whole business of printing books for member of congress—a practice which had grown up within a few years past—to be one of the most abominable abuses which now beset the government, and he considered this particular job as the most abominable of the whole. Taken in every way, the manner in which it was got through without the knowledge of the most attentive members—he meant others still more than himself—the enormity of the sum involved—the vast bulk and little worth of the work—and the distribution of it to the members that voted for it—and it was truly an abominable abuse. None of us knew that such a work was authorised by us. It was passed in 1833 and it was nearly a year afterwards before we discovered what we had done. He (Mr. B.) found it out from Mr. Mangum, of North Carolina, at the next session, who was a member of a committee who discovered what had been done; and then, for the first time, it was found out that an act had been passed by which upwards of half a million of dollars at the least, and possibly a million and a half, was to be given to an officer of the house of representatives, (M. St. C. Clarke, the clerk of the house,) and his partner, for printing a work to be given to those who voted the office, and his partner the money! As soon as found out, the abuse was resisted by some members, and has been resisted for six years, but without effect; for while a majority condemn and denounce it, yet they are placed under duress, and compelled to vote for the money and distribution by putting them in the appropriation bills for the support of the government, and then making it a question to lose the whole bill and stop the government, or let the distribution go on. He, for one, would vote against it, and let the government stop, if that should be the consequence; and let the people see who it was that would break up the government before they would cease voting books to themselves! Even if the vote of the books was right in itself, it would be wrong to be put into an appropriation bill; and he would not be coerced by finding it there. But the whole practice was wrong in itself, and was being an enormous abuse.

It cost for the amount of money—enormous for the principle—enormous for the frightful progress which it made—enormous for the consequences it might lead to. Every session we have jobs and distributions. A multitude of works have been printed and distributed. They multiply every session. We vote the money to the jobber—the jobber gives the books to us—and many of us sell the books instantly to Mr. Trepleman, or some other purchaser. Twenty thousand—forty thousand—sixty thousand dollars—are a common vote, and done with a rapidity which defies all description, and in a way to escape the notice of the most attentive members. But this is a case, not of twenty—or forty—or sixty thousand dollars, but of one or two millions! It is absolutely a case of millions, and may be as many as the jobbers choose to make it. It is without limits or boundaries. It is to print whatever the jobbers choose to print—for there is no earthly control over them—under the name of documentary history of the revolution. Already they inform us that the private and public libraries of America and Europe are to be explored to find either manuscript or printed matter to be published; and they are at liberty to publish all that they can find. The first computation showed it might amount to a million and a half of dollars; then the undertakers, when the enormity of that sum startled every body, proposed to put a limit on themselves by limiting the number of volumes. They proposed to limit the volumes to twenty, and left the number of pages unlimited, to be afterwards estimated at 800 pages. The next day the pages—so named the page—and at this rate it would come to $2,400 a volume; and twenty volumes would make $48,000. This seemed to impose a limit, but it was all an illusion! The number of pages were unlimited, and instead of 800, the first volume—the only one printed—contains above 1,000 pages! and instead of $20,400, the estimated, actual price is $26,000! and by doubling the pages, the next one may be $52,000. This bill is to pay a balance, a balance due for the first volume; and this balance is $5,600! the estimated price of $20,400 having been previously paid. At this rate the twenty volumes will cost $520,000; but there is nothing to limit it to that amount; the publishers can print what they please, as many volumes as they please, and as many pages as they please in each volume, and being paid by the page, the bulk of the work, and the amount of the price, is absolutely without limit! It is also without limit as to time! It may last for centuries, and through generations; and the families of Mr. Clarke and Mr. Force may be pensioned on the federal government through successive ages. It is a personal contract with Messrs. Clarke and Force; it will descend to their representatives; it has taken six years to make one volume; and twenty volumes, even if limited to that, would require, at the same rate, one hundred and twenty years to complete the work. So slow is the tortoise going work, that we have been told on this floor—by Mr. King, of Georgia, who began the good work of opposing this business—that he was well informed that a member had sold his interest in the whole documentary history, for which we pay a million or so, for ten dollars in hand.

Mr. B. then took the ground that the whole contract ought to be set aside, for fraud; first, in the manner of getting it through congress in a way to prevent all knowledge of the magnitude of the work, and that by an officer of the house; next for want of moral or constitutional power in the congress to vote themselves such presents; third, for the manner in which the price was fixed, and fixed nearly twice too much—as he proved by reading answers to inquiries from the most eminent booksellers of Philadelphia and other cities, addressed to them by a committee of the house of representatives after the discovery of the extent of the job given to Messrs. Clarke and Force. He read from the report to show that Messrs. Clarke and Force variously fixed the price themselves by putting it into the face of the law, that they were to have at the same rate as Messrs. Blair and Rives were paid for a certain work, the price of which was fixed by Mr. Force, who was selected by Mr. Clarke and Mr. Lowry for that purpose; Clarke and Force's bill depending in congress, while Mr. Force, as a referee, was fixing the price of work which was to govern his own.

Mr. B. finished with declaring that this book printing and book distributing business had become an enormous abuse; that the attention of the country ought to be roused up to it; and if the bill for the support of the government was lost, it would ruin the country, and, in the end, save millions. For his own part, he had been resisting this business for six years without any effect, for it was growing and increasing annually. But he should go on opposing it, opposing all these jobs, great as they are. He had to encounter friends and foes, and to draw on himself censure and opposition. He was sorry for it, but he could not help it. The abuse must be stopped; and he had taken a fixed and inexorable resolution to try and stop it. He had put on his iron nerves, and should yield to neither friends nor foes.

Mr. Southard spoke in reply, insisting that this sum was due under a contract which was a law of the land; and that congress, before withholding appropriations, ought to declare that contract null and void, which no one dared to propose in direct terms, or else they ought to make a compromise, and allow Clarke and Force suitable damages.

Mr. Calhoun said he would vote for this appropriation, but a sense of duty would not allow him to vote in favor of giving books to members of congress. He agreed, however, if Clarke and Force should suffer damage on account of a failure in congress to fulfil a contract, they ought to be remunerated.

On the call of Mr. Foster, the question was divided so as to ascertain, first, whether the senate would make this appropriation; and, second, whether the books should be distributed as provided for by the bill.

The former of these questions was decided in the negative, thus striking out the appropriation of $5,600 by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, Hubbard, Linn, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, S. Yver, Smith, of Connecticut, Walker, Williams, of Mississippi and Wright—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Foster, Knight, Merrick, Robbins, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge and Webster—23.

The question on the distribution of the books was negatively by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Foster, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Knight, Merrick, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Smith, of Ind., Swift, Walker, Wall, White, Williams, of Maine, Williams, of Miss. and Wright—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Davis, Southard and Webster—3. The amendment to strike out the proviso, which required the printing, &c. of the executive departments to be done by contract, to be given to the lowest bidder, being before the senate.

Mr. Wright said the committee had recommended this amendment, because in their view a compliance with the requisitions of the proviso was unpracticable; it amounted to a total denial to the departments of the power of having any printing done whatever. There was no obligation on the contractor to reside, or to perform the work in this city; and the departments would be compelled on every emergency in which they required a job of printing to be done, to send it perhaps to Boston to be executed. He hoped the proposed amendment of the committee would be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill was ordered to a third reading, and, by unanimous consent, was read a third time, and passed.

This bill was subsequently returned from the house with the information that the house non-concurred in the two above principal amendments made by the senate, and was referred to the committee on finance.

Mr. W. from the committee moved that the senate insist on their first amendment striking out the provision for letting out the public printing on contract, which was agreed to.

Also, that the senate recede from the amendment striking out the appropriation for the documentary history, which was agreed to—yeas 23, nays 6.

Also, that the senate insist on their amendment striking out the provision for the distribution of these books among the members of the senate and house of representatives, which after some remarks from Mr. Webster, in opposition, was agreed to—yeas 23, nays 7, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Foster, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Indiana, Walker, White, Williams, of Maine, Williams, of Mississippi, Wright and Young—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Davis, Ruggles, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Webster, Young—7.

Mr. Allen submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the president's message, of the 1st instant, and the accompanying letter of the postmaster general, in answer to certain resolutions of the senate adopted on the 1st instant, in relation to a communication previously made to the senate by the postmaster general, are satisfactory to the senate.

Mr. A. desired the consideration of the resolution at this time; but this requiring the unanimous consent of the senate.

Mr. Smith, of Indiana, objected.

Mr. Buchanan expressed a hope that the senator from Indiana, [Mr. Smith], would withdraw his objection. The postmaster general had expressly disclaimed all intention in respect to the senate in his former communication. He had never believed, and he had so expressed himself, that this officer intended any disrespect to the body, although, without this disavowal, his communication would fairly bear such a construction. He had now disavowed all such intention, and therefore the senate ought to express themselves satisfied.

Mr. Smith still persisting in his objection, the resolution was laid upon the table.

Mr. Allen then said that by the rules he could call up his resolution to-morrow; and that as the day would terminate at 12 o'clock, he gave notice that he would take the earliest occasion thereafter to call for its consideration.

The senate proceeded to consider the bill from the northwest for the protection of the northern and western frontiers.

Mr. Benton, from the military committee, reported various amendments to the bill, making an aggregate of $1,240,000, viz: $740,000 for fortifications much advanced, and $500,000 for others not much advanced.

Mr. Ruggles moved to increase the appropriation for fortifications in Maine from $100,000 to $200,000.

This motion was briefly advocated by Messrs. Williams of Maine, and Ruggles, and opposed by Messrs. Wright and Clay, of Alabama, and negatively without a division.

The appropriation of $100,000 for Maine fortifications was also negatively by yeas and nays as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Cuthbert, Davis, Foster, Fulton, Knight, Linn, Lyon, Norvell, Pierce, Ruggles, Smith, of Conn., Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, Webster, Williams, of Me., and Young—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Clayton, Hubbard, King, McKean, Merrick, Nicholas, Niles, Prentiss, Ryves, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Swift, White, Williams, of Miss., and Wright—22.

The appropriation of $80,000 for the western frontier was advocated at some length by Mr. Fulton and Mr. Benton, and opposed by Mr. Calhoun, and it was carried in the affirmative by yeas and nays as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Calhoun, Hubbard, King, McKean, Merrick, Nicholas, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Roane, Robbins, Smith, of Conn., Southard, Swift, Wall, and White—17.

The appropriations of $740,000 for fortifications and other military defenses on the Atlantic and Gulf coast were now taken together, advocated by Mr. Benton and Mr. Davis, who stated that there was recently not a gun in Boston in a condition to fire a salute, which he supposed was generally the case; and opposed by Mr. Calhoun, who said there were always ready guns by hundreds when he was connected with the department; and if the millions recently appropriated had been thus wasted, this appropriation would do nothing; and then this whole appropriation was negatively by yeas and nays as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Clay, of Alabama, Davis, Fulton, Knight, Nicholas, Robbins, Ruggles, Walker, Wall, Webster, and Williams, of Maine—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Kentucky, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Foster, Hubbard, Lyon, McKean, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Smith, of Indiana, Swift, White, Williams, of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—23.

The bill, as amended, was now reported to the senate, and after a brief conversation the appropriation of $80,000 for the western frontier, made in committee, was non-concurred in, or lost, in senate, by yeas and nays as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Fulton, Linn, Ryves, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith, of Ia., Walker, Weber, White, and Williams, of Me.—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Calhoun, Davis, Hubbard, King, McKean, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Ryves, Roane, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Southard, Swift, Wall, and Wright—18.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading, and by consent read a third time, and passed.

The resolution submitted by Mr. Allen, relative to the letter of the postmaster general, was, on his motion, called up, and was agreed to, without a division.

The bill from the house giving to the president of the United States additional powers for the defence of the United States in certain cases against invasion, and for other purposes, was received, the 16th joint rule in the way of its reception was suspended, and the senate proceeded forthwith to consider the bill. After having been read the first time, Mr. Benton observed that he did not think it necessary, at this late period of the session, and under present circumstances, to refer this bill to a committee. The subject was perfectly understood by every senator; the bill, as it had passed the house, was on their tables; and the sense of the senate had been fully expressed in the resolutions unanimously adopted last evening. He therefore thought that they had better not refer the bill, but take it up in committee of the whole, and act on it at once.

Mr. Buchanan observed that the bill from the house, now before the senate, entirely met his approbation, with perhaps a single exception. Under all the circumstances, he doubted the policy of sending a special minister to England; but he should make no motion to strike this provision from the bill, unless his doubts might be fortified by the opinion of other senators. With this exception, if such it ought to be considered, the bill, he believed, was just such an one as the committee on foreign relations would have unanimously reported to the senate, had it not been deemed more proper that this measure should originate in the house. It was precisely in accordance with the resolutions which had passed the senate last night, by which we pledged ourselves, that in case the British government should attempt to take possession of this disputed territory, we would stand by the president of the United States, and sustain him with all the military power of the nation in repelling this aggression. This bill contained no provisional army. It simply authorized a resort to the militia and volunteers, in case it should become necessary to call out a military force before congress could be convened, and appropriated the money necessary to accomplish the object. Mr. B. agreed with his friend from Missouri, [Mr. Benton,] that it was unnecessary to refer this bill to a committee, as it was plain and simple in its provisions, and the session so near at close. As to the propriety of sending a special minister to England—he would be glad to hear the opinion of other senators on this subject.

Mr. Tallmadge observed that he differed with the senator from Pennsylvania in one particular. He was highly in favor of sending a special minister to England. He thought the minister sent should be a man of character and standing, and he had no idea that the president would send any other.

Mr. Southard acknowledged that he felt great difficulty in passing so promptly on a bill of such magnitude. He did not view it in the light that other senators did, as carrying out the resolutions of the committee on foreign relations, but going far beyond them. He greatly feared the consequences of passing such a bill, and was alarmed at what he deemed the result of its passage. For if it did pass, and the president should call for the volunteers authorized by it, there would be a war between this country and Great Britain which might last for years. Where were these volunteers to be raised, and how? The moment, said Mr. S., that that bill is passed, you will find volunteers assembling under it, and eager to march into the British territories.

Now, I ask you (continued Mr. S.) to look upon the whole of our frontiers, and see what has occurred there during the past twelve months, together with the tone and temper of the people. Did it not require all the exertions of the executive to repress the spirit that was so openly manifested? He would as soon, Mr. S. said, vote for an absolute declaration of war as this bill. The great danger was that the volunteers would not wait for the orders of the president of the United States, but that they would, as soon as organized, invade the British territory, and thus bring on a war while the two nations were in the progress of adjusting the differences between them. There were other provisions of this bill to which he was not prepared to give his assent, and there were others which he approved of, and among the latter was the one referred to by the senator from New York. He hoped that a special minister would be sent to England, and that the mission would result in the settlement of all our differences with that power. God forbid that a war between this country and England, the representatives of the freedom of the world, should ever take place. He did not fear the contest if it should be forced on him; but, said he, if we go into this conflict, I wish to go into it coolly and dispassionately, and in a manner calculated to carry with us the feelings of the people of the whole country. He preferred that the bill should be sent to a committee, with a view to a more mature consideration of the whole subject, and that the recommendation of some moderate measures to precipitate the country into a war. In the present posture of affairs, this section authorizing the raising of volunteers, would be looked on by the British government in no other light than as a menace, and perhaps lead this high spirited people into acts of hostility, which more moderate measures on our part might prevent. How could we expect any successful negotiations for terminating our differences with the British government, with this threat hanging over them? Would they not point to it as an act of hostility, and refuse to negotiate until it was withdrawn?

Mr. S. after some further remarks, concluded by moving to refer the bill to the committee on foreign relations.

Mr. Tallmadge did not know that he had any objection to the reference of the bill; the remark he made was in regard to the sending of a minister. But he saw no cause for the alarm felt by the senator from New Jersey. No one could pretend that volunteers would be raised under the provisions of this bill till the president called for them; and after he has called for them, they will as soon as raised, be in the service of the United States, and cannot go to Canada, or any where else without orders.

He could not agree with the senator from New Jersey, that any part of this bill could justly be viewed as a threat or menace. We have been threatened with invasion, and though he did not believe that the threat would be carried into execution, yet it was highly necessary to be prepared for any such contingency. Should the British government complain of this clause of the bill as a menace, which he did not believe they would do, the president could say, that from the very nature of our institutions, we were unprepared for any emergency, and therefore it was that congress passed this measure in order that we might be prepared to meet the invasion that was threatened. We shall always, said Mr. T., enter into a conflict with a foreign power under disadvantageous circumstances, but we shall become stronger as it progresses, and triumph in the end. He did believe that this bill was necessary, and he would therefore give it his vote. We passed, said he, unanimously the resolutions reported by the committee on foreign relations; and last session we passed resolutions just as strong, and what did they amount to. To nothing. The British government, instead of giving up their claims, had advanced the claim to exclusive jurisdiction over the disputed territory, and threatened to support it with an armed force. Under these circumstances, he was for putting the country in a situation to meet the threatened contingency. He saw nothing alarming in the authorizing this volunteer force to be raised. They will be embodied only when the president shall call for them; and acting under his orders, they will not be able to march until he commands it.

Mr. March was in favor of referring the bill to the committee on foreign relations. It was an important measure, and should go through all the forms of legislation; and if it passed, it should be after full and solemn deliberation. There was no man in the country more reluctant to go to war than he was. A war would be highly injurious to the people he represented, but he would not sacrifice the honor or the interests of the nation for the sake of preserving peace. He had no fears of any consequences resulting from authorizing this volunteer corps. They are, he said, to be composed of the freemen of the United States, and upon them we can as safely rely for obeying the laws as for defending the liberties of the country. We are about (said Mr. M.) to adjourn, and cannot meet again for many months. We are aware that with this invasion, and that danger is great that the threat will be carried into execution. My opinion is (said Mr. M.) that war will come before twelve months is over, do what you will. Ought we, then, to adjourn without putting it in the power of the president to defend the country?

Mr. Buchanan said that, even at this late hour of the night, considering the position which he occupied in relation to the subject, the senate would excuse him for asking their attention for a few moments, whilst he replied to the remarks of the senator from New Jersey, [Mr. Southard].

For my own part, said Mr. B., I am not excited in the slightest degree, but am calm as a summer's morning; nor do I believe that the senate required a caution against acting under violent impulse. I confess that, throughout the whole proceeding, I have been only anxious that we should act with such coolness, such dignity, and such discretion, as would secure the approbation of the country. This important object has, I think been accomplished. The justice of our cause is palpable; and I have labored to prevent it from being obscured, by the adoption of any measure, in the assertion of our rights, on which our constituents could be fairly divided in opinion. It was for this reason, that I have come into conflict with the state of Maine in relation to the fourth resolution reported by the committee. Although I preferred that resolution as it originally stood, because it was more precise, yet the change in the last clause does not materially affect the meaning; and it has procured an unanimous vote in its favor—a consummation much to be desired. Should Maine act in accordance with the spirit of this resolution, then if war were to come, it will find the country unanimous. On the other hand, Great Britain, it will be a war of pure aggression, waged, during the presidency of peaceful negotiations, for the purpose of assuming exclusive military jurisdiction, against the clear understanding between the two governments, over a territory to which she has not even a color of title. In such an event, the only alternative is war or national dishonor; and between these two what American can hesitate! Force must be repelled by force; or national degradation is the inevitable consequence. I confess, however, it is still difficult to believe that Great Britain will madly rush into such a contest for an object so inconsiderable. This is a question for her own decision. All we have to do is to stand on the defensive, and exercise forbearance until the shock of arms shall render to bearance no longer a virtue.

I would ask the senator from New Jersey what is there in this bill which is not precisely in conformity with the resolutions unanimously adopted last night? Which was the most important of all these resolutions? Was it not that one which declared that, if the British government should, in pursuance of its avowed determination, attempt, by military force, to take possession of the disputed territory, that we would sustain the president in defending the rights of the country, and repelling this invasion? This is the single principle clearly and strongly expressed in the fourth resolution. What, then, do we propose to do by this bill? Merely to carry out this principle in practice, and that too, in the mildest form consistently with the safety of the country. Would we not make ourselves a ridiculous spectacle before all mankind, if we should adjourn, after adopting this solemn resolution, and leave the president, without a dollar, to defend the country, in case it should be attacked? We first pledge ourselves in the most solemn manner to sustain him; and, when called upon to redeem our pledge, we prove recrunt to this duty which, but yesterday, we imposed upon ourselves. Is there a single senator here prepared to act such a part?

This bill is in fact but little more than a contingent appropriation of $10,000,000, placed at the disposal of the president, to enable him to call forth the militia, in execution of the constitution and the existing law, for the purpose of repelling the threatened invasion of the disputed territory. It is true that the term of service is extended from three to six months, and the president is authorized to accept of the services of volunteers. These are the only changes in the old law effected by the bill. It does not propose to add a soldier to the regular army. Until the next meeting of congress, it relies exclusively upon the present army, militia and volunteers of the country, to repel the invasion of the disputed territory. Now, I ask, what less can we do, unless regardless of our duty, we should determine to adjourn whilst war is impending over us, without providing any means of defence? And yet the senator from New Jersey fancies that he sees in the bill a menace to England; and he dreads a rushing of armed citizen volunteers across our frontier for the purpose of invading the territory of a friendly power. But what says the bill? That the contingency should happen for which it provides, these volunteers will remain at home. They can never be embodied without the orders of the president. They cannot move towards the frontier until the event shall occur on which we have solemnly declared that we shall cordially co-operate with the president in defending the interest and honor of the country. What, then, is the inevitable consequence of the senator's argument? That we shall adopt no precautionary measures to repel a threatened invasion, lest precautionary measures may be construed into a menace by the invading power. The gentleman has not seen the point to which his own argument would lead him. If he had, it never would have been advanced. Besides, this argument implies a want of confidence in our citizen volunteers, which I do not feel.

If we adjourn without passing this bill, we shall richly deserve the reputation of being a government valiant in resolutions upon paper—a government mighty in words, but contemptible in action. We should become the scorn of our constituents.

But this bill is called a threat. A threat! To prepare for war, when an intention to invade our territory has been avowed, is a threat which may offend our powerful neighbor! Such was not the opinion of general Washington. He believed that to prepare for war was the best mode of preserving peace. Weakness always invites aggression. Fortunately, or unfortunately, for us, from the very nature of our institutions, we shall never be well prepared for war; but for this very reason, when we have cause to apprehend immediate danger, our exertions ought to be to the utmost to secure vigorous. We now find that sir John Haynes is collecting and concentrating his forces, which it is said will amount to four or five thousand regular troops, with the avowed purpose of making a descent on the disputed territory, and placing it under the executive jurisdiction of England. When this danger is impending, shall we place ourselves in the contemptible position of resolving that the state of Maine shall be defended, and then re-resolving that it shall not be defended, lest it might give offence to the British government? We can never avert war by base submission; and if we could, the people of this country will never purchase peace at the price of self-degradation. No, sir, never. If the British government should ever complain of this bill as a threat, our minister can point with confidence to the letter and proclamation of sir John Harvey, in which he has intimated to take military possession of the disputed territory, under the express command of his sovereign. He can show that the menace first came from her majesty's government; and that our proceedings have been purely defensive. This bill contains no provision which goes further than adopting the necessary means of self-defence, in case a force should invade our native land. If my neighbor should be in the very act of attempting to deprive me of my property by force, and I should stand upon the defensive, he might, with the same propriety, turn about and accuse me of threatening him.

Whilst I am in favor of defending the just rights of Maine, I do not, extremely, I am also disposed to inform her directly that if, in violation of the constitution, which rests upon the executive of the union the treaty-making power, and in violation of the clear subsisting understanding between the parties, she will become the aggressor, and attempt permanently to occupy the disputed territory by force, we are under no constitutional obligation to come to her aid, however difficult it might be, even in such a case, to resist her appeal. In the language of the amendment made to the fourth resolution, it is her duty to leave the ultimate vindication of her rights to the general government, to which it rightfully and constitutionally belongs. Hands off from this territory on both sides, whilst negotiations are pending. During this period, the question belongs exclusively to the general government. It would be forever a source of regret, both to Maine herself and to the whole country, if she should not withdraw her forces from this territory, in case sir John Harvey should set his example, desisting from attempting his military occupation.

I deprecate war, but in a just cause I do not dread it. If it should come now, it will be inevitable, and we may appeal to the world for the justice of our cause. Our course has hitherto been correct in asserting our rights. I trust and believe that Maine will not embarrass us in pursuing it to the end. That she has cause to complain I will cheerfully admit, but let her continue to rely upon the general government, and when the crisis shall arrive, it will be found that she will find the country as one man rising to her rescue. On the contrary, should the patriotic, but excited feeling which now seems to pervade her citizens, drive them into acts of aggression, and involve us in war, the best cause will be weakened by such conduct, and distraction will be engendered among the citizens of the other states may be the consequence. Let her be prudent as well as firm. This controversy must soon be ended either by negotiation or by arms. Let her patiently and patiently await the result, unless the territory should be actually invaded.

The question was here taken on Mr. Southard's motion to refer the bill to the committee on foreign relations, and lost without a division.

Mr. Southard then addressed the senate in opposition to the bill, recapitulating the arguments used by him on the first day.

Mr. Walker said he did not rise at this late hour to make a speech in favor of this bill, but to appeal to the senator from New Jersey, [Mr. Southard,] and exhort him by his love of country and regard for his honor, and his rights, not to vote against this bill. It was not the bill that the senator supposed it was. He certainly could not have had an opportunity of understanding it truly. He appealed to the senator not to prevent a unanimous vote of this body in favor of a measure so essentially necessary for the honor and safety of the country. He fully believed that the senator regarded the rights and liberties of his country as much as any man on that floor; and he had not a doubt but that he understood this bill properly, he would give it his support. Every vote given against this bill, said Mr. W. will be regarded by Great Britain as an invitation, on the part of the senator who gave it, to persist in her unreasonable claims to the territory. No man should claim to be dishonorable, who would surrender her claims to this disputed territory. Not to pass this bill would be dishonorable, who would declare that Great Britain had not a shadow of claim to this disputed territory, and that we would consider the taking possession of it as an invasion of the territory of the United States, that would justify the president, under the constitution, in calling out the militia to repel it. When, in addition to this, we had pledged ourselves to the state of Maine to sustain her, would it not be dishonorable to vote down the only measure that would enable the president to carry into effect the recommendations of the senate? If we should send a minister to England under this bill had been negated by the senate, the British ministry would laugh him to scorn.

And under other circumstances, said Mr. W. we are to refuse to pass this bill? From all the official information that is before us, we learn that the governor of New Brunswick says that he is positively instructed by the British government to take possession of this disputed territory, and that he is determined to do it with all the forces of the provincial government, both regulars and militia. There is a threat, and not merely a threat, for it has been followed up by an actual call for militia, and by armed troops marching into the disputed territory. We shall disregard ourselves, said Mr. W. by returning to our homes and leaving a sister state undecided, when she has been threatened with invasion. Under those circumstances he appealed to the love of country of the senator from New Jersey——for he believed that patriotism beats in his bosom as strong as in that of any other senator—to let the vote on this bill be a unanimous one by adding his voice in its favor; so that when our minister went to England, he might go armed with the strongest powers of the country. He knew that there were those within the sound of his voice who, armed with such a moral power as this bill, passed by the unanimous consent of both houses of congress, would give him, could not fail of bringing this controversy to a successful and happy termination.

Mr. Niles said he rejoiced to see this bill so perfectly acceptable to the members of this body, with but one solitary exception. We all agreed, he said, in this matter, that we are for preserving the peace of the country if we can do so without sacrificing our honor. The only question, then, is, whether the assuming the attitude the bill proposes, by clothing the president with power to arm for defence only on the one hand, and proposing to open a new negotiation on the other, the latter purpose will be frustrated by the former, as the senator from New Jersey apprehends. Now, he had no such apprehensions. All the senator's objections were, in his view, founded in error. No volunteers could be organized until the president called for them by his proclamation, and when they were organized they would be in the service of the United States; Canada borders was that the state of excitement on the without orders. But he would not march a foot, as it could not be made pass over this objection of reason. The only plausible objection raised was, whether Great Britain might not consider the authorizing this volunteer force as some sort of a menace——as coming to her with the olive branch in one hand and the sword in the other. This was possible; but what would be the ultimate effect of assuming this attitude? It would produce this effect: it would convince the British government that we were in earnest in this matter, and that though we have a strong desire for peace, yet we are not willing to let the settlement of these difficulties any longer, and that it must be settled at once, or produce a rupture we assumed to threaten. The standing her complaints of insult, settled the controversy with her, that had lasted for a quarter of a century. Pass this bill, and the present controversy will be settled in twelve months. Lasted as long as being a war measure, I, for one, said Mr. N. pronounce it to be a peace measure. It will preserve peace between the two countries. If you do not pass it, it will protract the negotiation, and perhaps end in a war which will last for years. He stood upon that noble maxim of the late president of the United States, that we desired nothing from foreign nations but what was right, and would submit to nothing that was wrong.

Mr. Southard here moved to strike out the provision in the bill for raising fifty thousand volunteers; which motion was rejected—yea 11, nays 38, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Davis, Foster, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Knapp, Linn, of Annapolis, Moulton, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, of Rhode-Island, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Sever, Smith, of Maine, Southard, of Connecticut, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—33.

The question was then taken on ordering the bill to a third reading; and it was carried by a unanimous vote—yeas 41, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Crittenden, Davis, Foster, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Knapp, Linn, of Annapolis, Moulton, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, of Rhode-Island, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Sever, Smith, of Maine, Southard, of Connecticut, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—41.

The bill was then read the third time, and passed unanimously.

And the senate adjourned at 20 minutes past four o'clock, A. M.

MR. POPE'S SPEECH.

In the house of representatives, on Friday the 15th of February, 1839, in committee of the whole on the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of government for the year 1839:

Mr. Chairman, I hope, said Mr. Pope, that no apology is necessary on my part for addressing the committee at this time at large on the several topics of public policy and political principles, to which the attention of the house has been called in our debates here and elsewhere, and in the public journals. My colleague, (Mr. Chauvenet), the able and faithful chairman of the committee of claims, knows that I have remained at my post late and early, to aid him to obtain the action of the house in favor of the poor and humble and suffering citizens who have fair demands on our justice; and the chairman of the committee of ways and means, of which I am a member, will have the honor to admit that I have not taken a course to impede his administration measures, whether I concurred with him or not. Mr. Pope said, he had been ever willing to afford him a fair opportunity to present them, with his views, to the consideration of the house and nation. In order that the necessary public business might be done at this short session, he had abstained from wasting time in useless debate on plain and important subjects, and would exhort gentlemen of the legal profession who so often hammer us on two or three questions like an ignorant jury, on trite questions, to believe that those of us who are not fond of speaking merely for the sake of speaking, have some small stock of sense and information as well as themselves. Mr. P. said he was inclined to present his views on the political state of the nation, and the principles and measures involved in the approaching contest, not only to this house and the public, but to his immediate constituents, to whom he was directly responsible, and before whom he was to appear at the approaching election in August next. It is my duty to treat them with fairness and candor, to explain my position here, and to give them my opinion on public affairs. The crisis is deeply interesting to every American citizen, and requires every man to speak out with decision, calmness, and truth. A man of observation, who takes a survey of the present state of things in this country, will be surprised to discover that questions of public policy, constitutional law, and all subjects connected with the course of the national government, are less settled and more agitated than forty or forty five years ago, when our present constitution was first put into practical operation. The power to protect our navigation, manufactures, and agricultural productions, by duties on foreign articles, even mere discriminating duties, or bounties on fishing vessels in the northeast, that great nursery of seamen to man our navy, the right arm of our national defence, is denied. The power to establish a national bank, declared to be necessary by the wise, patriotic, and godlike congress of 1789, that of 1791, of 1816, and 1832, approved by Washington, Hamilton, Gallatin, Dallas, Crawford, Madison, and a host of others, the most enlightened statesmen of our country, is also denied, and the institution denounced as dangerous and wicked, after a successful experiment of forty years. Yes, sir, great, wise, and good men who have gone before us, the authors of our independence and founders of our republic, as incompetent and founders of the constitution, the work of their own hands, or to judge of the utility of such an institution, as a fiscal agency and a check on the excessive issues of a paper currency. The scattering fires and random shots constantly kept up by the different parties at each other, render it difficult for a stranger, or even for ourselves, to understand with definite clearness the questions in issue between them, or the leading principles involved in the mighty struggle now pending before the great jury of the American people. I am constrained, Mr. Chairman, to express my high approbation of the manner in which my colleague on the other day made the best defence I have heard of, of the course of the administration. It is just to say to him, that he has not convinced me of the soundness of his views, and correctness of the facts he has asserted, that his course in this debate has been marked by that decorum and propriety which ought to characterize this representative body. He has not applied to his adversaries in offensive epithets or unpopular names, or dealt in mere denunciations of his political opponents; he has not substituted the terms democrats, whigs, or federalists, for argument. He has considered the two great parties which now divide the country, as supporters and opponents of the administration. Those who believe as he does, that the principles and resources of this administration are sound, and will conduce to the preservation of the public liberty, and to advance the general prosperity, ought to support it; and it is the duty of those who entertain a contrary opinion, to oppose it. A gentleman by calling himself a democrat or whig, does not prove the course of the administrative right or wrong. The tendency of the principles and measures of the administration, is to be shown by reasons, argument, and fact, and not by mere names and electioneering slang. When I hear members of this house talk of democrats and democracy, to prove one party right and the other wrong, I am reminded of a conversation I had with Mr. Gideon Granger, a citizen of Connecticut, thirty years ago, when postmaster general under Mr. Jefferson. In one of the newspapers, there was an account of a large meeting of the people at New Haven in that state, indicating an intention to resist the embargo law; but before they proceeded to business, some of the reverend clergy were called on to say grace over them.

I expressed my surprise to Mr. Granger, that the clergy should give open countenance to an insurrection against the laws. Friend Pope, answered he, you don't know us yankees; whatever we do, whether we work for God or the devil, we do it all in the name of the Lord. And some gentlemen seem to imagine, that whether the administrative works for the good of the people, or the ruin of the people, for God or the devil, all their doings can be sanctified in the name and by the high priest of democracy. A man in my own state, of some intelligence, many years ago, made a deep impression on me in reference to this subject. He told me that a son of his, a distinguished citizen of Tennessee, from the commencement of his career in life, had determined to act on the assumed ground that the people were to be fooled by some body, and that a man was a fool who did not fool them for his own advantage. And not many years ago, he addressed the people at what he called a candidate's meeting, and expatiated upon views of a national bank, besides touching on other topics. In the evening, after the people had dispersed, a warm personal friend of mine, of good talents, whom I considered, as every body else did, among the most thorough going democrats, rode with me a few miles, and in the course of our conversation observed that the world supposed me to have much more sense than him; but, said he, they are mistaken, you have not half my sense. You talk about a national bank, give large national and extended views of the benefits and utility of such an institution; but very few of your hearers can appreciate the merits of what you consider statesmanlike argument. Now, says he, I go for democracy, and government or treasury people's bank. I have not been in the ranks of the democrat, but I have the road to sense. I tell you I have no faith in it, but I am determined to go for democracy, and no fellow shall out democrat me. He assured me that he would support me when a candidate, whether I was right or wrong, but he must condemn my opinions before the people; for I tell you, said he, that I don't intend to be beaten at the game of democracy.

Mr. Chairman, continued Mr. Pope, I have no particular objection to the word democrat, whig, or federalist. Gentlemen are at liberty to assume any name they please; but I protest against the use of any such epithets to prove a measure right or wrong. He had been, and ever should be democratic in his feelings and actions towards his fellow-men. He had never oppressed the poor, or dealt harshly with them; and in his public course, both in the Kentucky legislature and in congress, he had been most anxious to protect the rights of the actual and bona fide settlers of our new lands. He was in favor of a kind and liberal policy towards the poorer classes, who, unable to purchase lands at high prices in the old and rich states, had migrated to the new and unsettled regions of the west. Some of his public acts may have been wrong, and some of his opinions, and especially about a national bank, were called by many, federal. He had formed his opinion on that subject at an early period of his congressional career, after profound consideration, and an honest inquiry after truth. He had maintained that opinion through good and evil report, and had discovered no good reason to change it. Whether his opinion was called federal or democratic was a matter of indifference to him, and he had little respect for a man who was afraid to obey the conviction of his understanding lest he should be called federalist, whig, democrat, or anything else. Let every man be persuaded in his own mind that he is right, and go ahead. Mr. Chairman, continued Mr. Pope, I repeat that I like the course of my colleague in recognizing but two parties, the party for the administration and the party against it. Those who disapprove of the principles and measures of the administration, owe it to themselves, their country, and immediate constituents, to put in good and substantial pleas in bar to their continuance in power with verification, and to sustain their pleas by proof and argument at the bar of the nation. There are, however, some other parties or squads of parties that are now passing the bar of a state's rights party, who see ahead I would be as much at a loss to define as that of the Mounain party of the far west. I do not know, said Mr. P., any anti-states right men any where. If there are such, I know them not. I have heard of an anti-mason c party; and we have an abolition party, more dangerous in its character, tendency, and objects, than any which has arisen since the foundation of this government—a party which threatens to weaken, if not destroy, our union, disturb our domestic tranquility, and shake the foundation of private property. Until lately, I had been disposed to receive their petitions without attaching much importance to them; but I am now satisfied that no such petitions, tending to engender discord here, and disturb the general tranquility, ought to be received. I had not before this felt any serious concern about the matter, for I have never known a yankee emigrate to the south or southwest to set a slave free. A very cultivated and intelligent gentleman from New Hampshire settled in my neighborhood about twelve or fourteen years ago, and was at first clamorous and rude in his remarks about slaves and slaveholders. After he had been with us two or three years, he took a fancy to a fine widow, a friend of mine, who had some very valuable slaves. Some of her counselors were opposed to the match, and she knowing that I was very much disposed to encourage matrimony, and that I would advise her to do precisely what she wanted to do, conversed with me upon the subject. Having never indulged or excited prejudices against yankees, I told her that the first article in their creed was to provide well for their own household, but that she should not have a good husband, and urged her to marry him, which she did, and their union has been fortunate and happy, and he has never, I believe, said one word about abolition from that day to this. He is a good husband, and a much better master than most of us; for he gets twice as much labor out of his slaves as I ever could.

Mr. Chairman, said Mr. Pope, about the close of the last war I felt proud that we had at the city of New Orleans a military chieftain who, by his bravery and military skill, defended our soil against the first army that ever crossed the Atlantic, and shed a lustre on our national character. About the same time I was gratified to learn that we had an enlightened statesman, an intellectual H-erules, at the head of the American mission at Ghent, sent to negotiate a treaty of peace and amity with the British, who, with a few men of the Great empire on the contested question about the fishing rights and privileges of the Americans on our northeastern coasts and seas. The British commissioners contended that, according to the law of nations, the treaty of 1783, by which our fishing rights and privileges were acknowledged and secured, was abrogated by the war of 1812. My friend from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams), admitted the general rule settled by the law of nations in regard to ordinary treaties, but insisted that as these fishing rights and privileges existed, and were enjoyed before the peace of 1783, they were not abrogated by the war; that it was not a debatable question; and he ultimately silenced the British pretensions in relation to the fisheries.

Two years ago, said Mr. Pope, I read a letter of that gentleman (Mr. Adams) on this question, and have reviewed it a second time during the present session, among the most able and eloquent productions of his oratorical pen. Mr. Chairman, continued Mr. Pope, before that gentleman presents any more petitions for the abolition of slavery, I beseech him to review that letter, and see if his argument will not bear with great force on the slavery question, because slavery existed not only before our constitution was formed, but before the peace of 1783, or the articles of confederation. If our fishing rights and privileges were not abrogated by war, and were not debatable, because they existed and were enjoyed before the revolution, upon what ground can our northern brethren claim the right to petition or in any way disturb the institution of slavery. Sir, I must deny that slavery is a grievance of which the people of the free states have any right to complain by petition, or to ask the interference of congress. The present has called on us for severe laws and a million of dollars to prevent our people from interfering in the affairs of Canada, when it is known that Upper Canada is a place of refuge for our fugitive slaves, and when they go there neither the people nor the British authorities will have them surrendered to their owners. Mr. Pope said that he did not think the British government, in relation to Upper Canada, had much claim on us to use extraordinary means to protect it from the interference of our citizens. He was willing to do what our character as a nation and our amicable relations with that power demanded, to maintain neutrality; but it seemed to him that the slave states of this union had as high claims to the protecting authority of the president and congress against the abolition schemes of the communities, combinations, if permitted in the free states, to disturb the slave institutions of the south, would be deemed just cause of war; and now that they are united by political compact, one leading object of which was to preserve our internal peace and tranquility, ought not the president in his message, which expressed so much solicitude about Canada, to have called on congress, if not the free states, to exert their whole constitutional power to suppress all combinations against our internal peace, and, if necessary, to have placed a force on Mason and Dixon's line, to enforce neutrality in relation to our slave property?

Mr. Pope, with some pleasantry, remarked that if he could be assured that he would be re-elected next August to this house without opposition, he believed he would make a tour through the north and eastern states, and deliver lectures to them on this very interesting subject, and exhort them to pause before they ent in under the lies of interest, animity, and blood, by which this great and rising nation were misled, and to wake, more especially among the ladies, who, by attending to the influence of the friends and sympathizers, had been induced to take a warm and active part in behalf of the slaves of the south. [At this moment Mr. Pope was arrested in his remarks in relation to abolition, as he had been once before, by a call to order, on the ground that he was departing from the matter under debate, and that the question of abolition was not a debatable subject.] Mr. Pope disavowed any intention to discuss the question of abolition, and had only designed to present to the committee, in a concise manner, his view of this right of petition. He, however, acquiesced in the decision of the chair, and, with leave of the committee, proceeded in the discussion of topics admitted to be within the scope of this debate.

If permitted to examine the right of petition to the extent contended for, Mr. Pope would have been enabled to enable the petitioners of the Adams in relation to the fisheries, and ultimately assented to by Great Britain, that the rights and privileges which existed and were enjoyed before the foundation of this confederacy, and recognized by the articles or compacts of union, did not admit of debate or controversy, but were not annexed to coming within the scope, right, or intent of petition in its broadest sense. The right of petition for redress of grievances, implies the existence of a grievance of which the petitioners have right to complain, and a power in the body to which it is addressed to afford the relief called for; and I must, said Mr. Pope, contend with force and plausibility that we were not annexed to and dependent upon the same consistent with the peace and safety of the nation. Mr. Pope could never admit that any set of men had the unconditional unrestricted right, under color of the right of petition, to cast firebrands into this hall tending to sap the foundation of our social harmony and political union. It is monstrous to contend that the time of this house must be wrested, and our deliberations interrupted, by such vain if not wicked efforts. The representatives of the people must do this, as on all other subjects of petition, exercise their sound discretion under the high responsibility which they owe to their country and constituents. If the free and slave states were separate communities, could the free states, consistent with the principles of international law, permit so many petitions to be presented to their legislatures to interrupt the peace and property of their neighbors? Would it not be cause of war? Mr. Pope would, if he could address the single ladies of New England, endeavor to give their finer feelings and sympathies another direction. He would hold a very different language to them from that which they so plausibly utter to the wretches, who, by their sympathies and their pockets in behalf of the imaginary sufferings of the southern slaves. Mr. Pope would tell them that he had lived in the far west; that those fertile regions abounded with active, enterprising, and promising young men; that young ladies were rather scarce, and he would wish sincerely, and zeal exhort some of the east to turn a deaf ear to the idle tales and appeals of the artful agents of the abolitionists, and take up their march to the west. They would soon, no doubt, get good husbands in those new regions, and will render more essential service to this great and rising republic in raising up good democrats to fight the future battles for liberty and a free country, than in sending petitions here to wound the feelings of their southern friends and brethren. Mr. Pope regretted that the rules established at the present session precluded him from presenting his views more in extension on this subject of abolition. Negro slavery, whether right or wrong, whether in this country or that, is a system incorporated into our system, that it must be left to the operation of causes hidden from human ken, and to the mysterious plans of a wise Providence—not to be seen even through a glass darkly. Let every citizen of this republic remember, with deep concern, that this is a

Mr. Pope assured the committee that nothing but a strong solicitude to present this right of petition in its true aspect, could have prompted him to this departure from the usual course of debate. He would now call the attention of the committee to those principles and measures of this administration in issue between the two contending parties, here and in the nation. My colleague, and other friends of the administration, not content with defending their measures and principles, have to make out their case, gone back for years to assail the measures and opinions of other men, and especially those supposed to be candidates for the next presidency. All this seems to me to be irrelevant. We are not here, or ought not to be, engaged in making or unmaking presidents. We are here discussing the principles and measures of public concern. The conduct of the administration, and their principles, are arraigned at the bar of the public. Is it a fair and legitimate defence to say that other men have done wrong, and been in favor of bad measures? Could a judge, impeached at the bar of this house, screen himself by telling us that other men had done wrong, and that if he was removed another as bad would be appointed in his place? Would it do for a representative on this floor, when censured by his constituents, to tell them that they must see good as, because, although they had acted badly, and had abused the trust reposed in him, another would do as bad or worse? that those who were opposed to him, and found fault with his conduct, were not democrats, but rabidous, aristocrats, &c.? Would this be a fair and honorable defence? Would a people of common sense, with ordinary concern about the administration of their public affairs, listen to a defence of this sort? Certainly not. The course of argument pursued by these gentlemen, would prove too much; it would prove that this administration, and themselves, ought to be perpetuated in power, whether they did right or wrong.

Now, continued Mr. Pope, the true question is, are the principles and measures of this administration right? have the public affairs been fairly and honestly administered? and is it not necessary that the administration should be changed, to correct and reform those abuses, disorders, and the derangement of the currency and other branches of the public service, which have ensued under this administration? When a gentleman talks of aristocrats, bankers, &c., I really do not understand them in reference to the people of the district I represent. In the five counties comprising that district, there is no bank, or branch of any bank; nor do I know that there is 10,000 dollars of bank stock held in the district. I do not own a single share in any bank. There are no very wealthy men there, and but few so poor as not to have the reasonable comforts of life. They are farmers generally, with a portion engaged in other pursuits. They constitute the industrious middle class of society, which in all countries is the most virtuous, happy and independent class—the salt of the earth. We have no public officers in any, except postmen, and a small income. No public money is expended there. We pay but a small proportion of the revenue; more than South Carolina, and more in proportion to our population than any of the southern states east of the Alleghany. The people do not complain of all this, if no more is drawn from them than is necessary, and fairly expended. They ask nothing from this government but good laws, good money, and that their money may not be stolen or plundered by unfit and unfaithful officers and agents.

Mr. Chairman, continued Mr. Pope, I am not a mere partisan here, nor do I indulge any unkind feelings toward the president, or those in power, or those who support the administration. I do not predicate my course here on the ground that gentlemen of either party are enemies to our republican institutions, or their country. I should be very unwilling to indulge any such uncharitable opinion of those who may happen to differ from me in my political views. We know that the best republicanism becomes spoiled and corrupted by too long an enjoyment of power. They too often feel power, and forget right, and become aliens in some degree most delicate and dangerous topic, and cannot be touched without hazard to our peace and union, prosperity and happiness. Mr. Pope would have declared his disapprobation of the last resolution of the gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. Atherton,) because by implication it seemed to concede the right to present abolition petitions, instead of refusing to receive them. It is the duty of this house, Mr. Pope would have insisted, to tell the abolitionists in a decided tone that their petitions would not and could not be received, because they asked an interference of this government for purposes and objects incompatible with our peace and safety, and the legitimate objects of the constitution.

to that republican spirit and feeling which animated them before they came into power. We know too, that adversity in both private and public life, is the school of virtue, and tends to purify those who have been too much exalted by prosperity or long continuance in authority. It is well known that in England, the whigs, after long contending with zeal and sincere patriotism for the power and privileges of parliament and the people, against the prerogatives and usurpations of the crown, have often, after ousting a Tory ministry, and getting into power, turned Tories in principle and practice, and the Tories, stripped of power and identified with the popular party, have in time in their turn become whigs. Such is human nature, and such the course of human affairs; and occasional changes of the high executive officers of the government may be justly deemed the great conservative principle of freedom. I believe, continued Mr. Pope, that a change of this administration is essential to the healthy action of the body politic, and necessary to restore the constitutional balance of the government. I will avow, said he, to see the whigs come into power; after being so long out, they will, probably, administer the government well for a while. I have no confidence in their extraordinary purity or infallibility, nor do I know that I shall be one of their party if they get in. I shall only pledge myself to do no act, and shall continue to act, under the influence of public considerations and public duty. Some material errors will, I expect, be corrected, and abuses reformed. Mr. Chairman, continued Mr. Pope, I cannot approve the principles of measures of this administration, so far as they have been developed, since I took my seat in the present congress. Permit me, sir, to say to gentlemen of the whig party, that they will confuse the public mind by making too many points in their case, some of them irrelevant and untenable, and others of a doubtful character, and not to be depended on in a great contest of principle. When I first came to the bar, I was in the habit of urging to the jury many points, when two or three would have been sufficient. I ever found that course unwise; my adversary met and defeated me on my weakest ground, and the attention of the jury was too often diverted from the true question at issue. Experience soon demonstrated to me that, if my cause was good, the honest and best policy was to select my strong points, and press them, unobscured by immaterial matters, on the attention of the jury. I must be permitted, said Mr. Pope, to say to gentlemen of the opposition, if their cause is good, honesty and fairness is the best policy. I would advise that good and substantial pleas in bar to the continuance of the present men in power, should be put in and verified by proof and argument.

I will now endeavor to place before this house and the people, the principles contended for by the president and his friends. By the 3d section of the article of the constitution, it is provided that the president shall, from time to time, give to the congress information of the state of the union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient. This is the only grant of power to the president, to influence, direct, or control the legislative action of congress in advance. After congress has acted and presented a bill to the president for his approval, he is authorized to consider it, and may return it with his objections, which can only be overridden by a majority of two-thirds. With regard to measures which congress may judge necessary and expedient for the good of the people, the president is not authorized to pronounce or veto in advance, and has no authority to interfere until congress shall have acted. To denounce a measure beforehand, to prevent the action of congress, is either an assumption of authority, or an exercise of influence incompatible with the spirit of this free system of government. The president, in his first message to this congress, not content with discharging the duty imposed on him by the constitution, in recommending measures for the consideration of congress, intimates an uncompromising hostility to a national bank, and indirectly unenables us with veto. If the advocates of a strict construction of the constitution, who protest against implied and constructive powers, can endorse this unauthorized assumption of the executive, I must declare my dissent from it.

The president next calls on congress for a bankruptcy law, to annul the state banks which had abused their powers; and banks owing their creation to state power, and responsible only to the states. This appears to me the highest prerogative ever claimed for this government over the sovereignty of the states, and aims a more fatal stab at their authority and independence, than ever suggested since the origin of this federal government. The alien and sedition laws were trifles compared with this most extravagant pretension. Whether banks deriving their charters from state authority, have abused or forfeited their charters, are questions of state cognizance exclusively, and beyond the pale of federal authority. The proposition advanced by the president is so obviously and palpably monstrous, that no argument can be necessary to expose its fallacy; no reasoning has ever been advanced in either house to sustain it. If the state rights gentlemen can countenance for a moment this assault upon the sovereignty of the states, they will excuse me for declining to be of their party. In the second message of the president to this congress, in December, 1837, he imputes the result of the elections in New York to bank influence, and at least indirectly impeaches the motives of the people, when acting in their highest sovereignty capacity. Are the motives and conduct of the people, in the exercise of the right of self government, to be questioned before any human tribunal? If the people are not sovereign in the selection of agents to manage their affairs, how, or where, or when, is the principle of self-government seen, felt, or understood; and where, unless at the polls, is the sovereignty of the people displayed? If they are sovereign, who dare to arraign their purity and infallibility? The sovereignty is ever to be presumed right, just, and wise; and if wrong, that sovereign alone must correct its own errors. From what part of the constitution does the president deduce the high prerogative of instituting an inquisition into the motives and conduct of the people, the county and state officers, and all public agents and functionaries known to this government? The polls, the ballot boxes, are the channels through which the public will is most clearly and constitutionally expressed, and the inquiry can never be made, what influenced the voters, but can only go to the fact, has the popular will been expressed, and how has the sovereign spoken?

The president in his last message to congress, has travelled out of the sphere of executive action, and assailed the decision of the inferior court and supreme court of the United States, in the mandamus case, against the postmaster general. Now, Mr. Chairman, where does the president deduce the constitutional authority to arraign the decisions of the judicial tribunals at the bar of this house? The executive, judicial and legislative departments are declared to be separate and distinct, and their respective powers are defined by the constitution. It certainly does not belong to the executive to revise and condemn the decisions of the judiciary; but to congress, and more to this house, has the constitution assigned the power to enquire into the conduct of the judges, and to impeach them, if necessary and proper to do so. If the president had suggested the propriety of referring the power to issue the writ of mandamus in the cases referred to, I certainly should not find fault with him; because, Mr. Chairman, continued Mr. Pope, I solemnly protest against the power of the judiciary, or the executive, to order money out of the treasury of the people, without the authority of the representatives of the people. Congress, and more especially this house, has by the constitution, control of the public purse. Mr. P. said he had not read or considered the opinion of the court in the mandamus case, nor was he prepared to pronounce it right or wrong, but he was inclined to concur with the president, that the power, if it existed, to order money out of the treasury, by mandamus, ought to be repealed. The first and vital principle of free government, held by enlightened whigs in England and America, and for which so much blood has been shed by our ancestors, consists in preserving to the representative body the exclusive guardianship and control of the public purse.

This is the cardinal point involved in the mighty political struggle now pending before the nation. Shall the treasury of the people be divorced from the control of the president, and restored to the care of their immediate representatives, is the great question to be decided in the present political contest. This is the great conservative principle which has been maintained for ages by the enlightened friends of freedom in England and this country, as the best and only effectual security to the liberties of the people against tyranny and oppression. It is the old question between the friends of liberty and the power and privileges of parliament, and the supporters of the power and prerogatives of the crown. In that contest, after a long and bloody struggle, the whigs of England triumphed over the advocates of executive power, as they will here, if they will only make this the prominent plea in bar to the continuance of this administration. I beseech gentlemen not to obscure this leading point by vague and indefinite talks about large expenditures, for which a large portion of the opposition voted, or executive patronage, which they have aided to increase. Mr. Pope said that by the removal of the deposits from the care of those to whom it had been confided by congress, the custody and control of the public funds had been wrested from the representative body; and he said as a result, he urged upon congress and the nation by the president and his friends, was intended to consummate the usurpations of his illustrious predecessor. The president and his supporters contend that the key of the strong box should be placed in the hands of the president, and those under his immediate direction, while his opponents insist that the public money should be confided to agents under the control and directly responsible to congress. It is, I repeat, said Mr. P., in essence the old question between the power of parliament and royal prerogative. And I would exhort the opposition to let nothing divert the public attention from this leading and great question. I shall be one of the last, said Mr. P., to speak in terms of disrespect or reproach of general Jackson, a brave man and a patriot, who so often staked up his life for his country, and shed lustre on our national character. Few men have felt more grateful than myself for his public services, or more admiration for his brilliant achievements. I was zealous and sincere in my efforts to bestow on him the highest honor in the gift of his country. While I respect this illustrious individual, and am ready to honor him for his deeds of valor, continued Mr. Pope, I can never endorse his assaults on the fundamental principles of the constitution, and his disregard of the powers, will, and action of the legislative body. With his motives I have no concern, nor do I intend to question their purity; but I owe it to myself, my country, and my immediate constituents, to raise my voice, on all proper occasions, against that arbitrary, ruinous measure, the removal of the deposits. By that act, the wall of separation placed by the constitution between the legislative and executive departments, was broken down, and the equilibrium of power established by that instrument overturned. It was done in defiance of the expressed will of the legislative body; and it was an unauthorized interference with the official powers and duties of the secretary of the treasury, for which I could never find any justification or apology. The public money was placed in the United States bank by the legislature, never to be removed by the secretary without reasons, and those reasons to be assigned to congress instead of the president. I insist that the officer at the head of the treasury, according to the true intent and spirit of the constitution and laws, is the officer of congress, equal the custody and management of the public money; and that the president can not rightfully direct or control the action of that department. The power of removal for gross misconduct, does not confer with it the right to direct the fiscal operations of the treasury department. No president had ever assumed such direction or control, not even Washington or Jefferson, whose popularity enabled them to enlarge executive power and influence, more than any presidents, until the reign of general Jackson. By a reference to the first laws creating the several departments of this government, a marked difference will be noticed between the department of state, of war, and the navy, and the law creating the treasury department; that of state, war and navy, are called executive departments, and placed under the control and direction of the president; whereas the treasury department is not called an executive department, and the head of the treasury is to perform such duties as shall be directed by law. This distinction runs through most of the state constitutions, and the money department is consistently where it should be, under the control and direction of the legislative body. The submission of this people and their representatives to this lawless interference of the executive with the public money, in defiance of legislative will, has surprised and mortified me more than any thing which has occurred in our political history. The reign of general Jackson in many of its features may be well compared, continued Mr. Pope, with that of queen Elizabeth, called by the English commentators the greatest of English monarchs. She maintained the most absolute authority without losing the affections of the people. By her energy and skill, she defeated the most formidable fleet that had ever sailed on the ocean, called the Spanish Armada, and laid the foundation of the naval power of England, and gave to England a rank in the scale of nations unknown before. Her course was in many respects tyrannical, but her temperance was popular. She professed love for her people, and acknowledged their liberties, but took care to use her own dictionary to define the term liberty. Her will was in a great degree the law of the realm. The friends of the free principles of the English constitution, were unable to make a stand against her power and overwhelming influence. It has been well marked by the historian, that she obtained a lease for life of arbitrary power, and that if the loose of free principles and the institutions were not destroyed, they were suspended during her reign. Her successors attempted to tread in the footsteps of their illustrious predecessor, without the ability, energy, or popularity, to sustain the high ground of royal prerogative occupied by queen Elizabeth; and after her death, the friends of freedom rose in all their strength, resisted the arrogant and tyrannical pretensions of succeeding monarchs, and, after a long and bloody struggle, settled the principles of English liberty by the revolution of 1688.

Gen. Jackson was elevated to the presidential chair, by the gratitude and affections of the American people, for his heroic achievements. His military career, his energy and decision of character, his admitted patriotism, his popular deportment, his professed devotion to the principles of the constitution and the liberties of the people, as he took the liberty to undertake them, gave him an ascendancy over the public mind, which rendered resistance to his administration vain and fruitless. The affections and admiration of the American people, granted him a lease for his term of service, to act in a great degree according to his own will. Besides removing the deposits, he exercised the veto power in a manner, and to an extent, unexampled in our government, and beyond any thing known in the history of Great Britain, in modern times. Indeed, it can hardly be presumed, that such an exertion of the veto power, by a British king, would be tolerated or submitted to, and the probable result would be rebellion and civil war. He ordered the public money to be removed from the place assigned by law, without the consent of congress, and deposited it in the hands of bank agents created by state authority, and in no manner responsible to this government. Mr. Pope would not advert to other matters often presented to the consideration of the people. The present administration is pledged to maintain the principles and measures of the last, and it is for the good sense of the community to decide whether they will adhere to the successor of general Jackson, in support of the measures and principles to which I have alluded. I was born in the Old Dominion, and have ever been proud to claim it the land of my birth, until that state bowed in submission to these usurpations of the federal executive. But I was still more mortified to hear that this great commonwealth had required the senate of the nation, congress, the representatives of the states, to be degraded and buried in dust and ashes at the feet of an untried American monarch, because they had dared to disapprove his usurpations. The enlightened friends of liberty throughout the world, must be astounded at the fact, that the people of Virginia, the birth place of Washington, Henry, Jefferson, Madison, and a host of others of republican stamp, could look on with composure at these outrages on the principles of our free system, and in derogation of powers and privileges confided to the legislative body. I will not Mr. Chairman, despair of the republic, but indulge a hope that there must be a political regeneration in the Old Dominion, and that we shall soon see on this floor heroes animated with the spirit of Washington, Henry, and other friends to constitutional liberty, ready to restore to congress, and especially to this body, their control over the public purse, and to rebuild the partition wall reared by the founders of our system, between executive and legislative power. I must be shut out by a majority here, who I understand the original mandate for the removal of the deposits to be brought to this house, and marked and branded with public condemnation, or burnt like the Yazoo act of Georgia, by fire from heaven. When this solemn duty shall be performed, I will then believe this republic still lives in substance, as it came from the hands of our forefathers.

Mr. Chairman, the president denounces corporations and associated wealth. Such slang might be tolerated at cross-roads, or grocery taverns; but I feel surprised and mortified to find such a state paper emanating from the chief magistrate of a dignified nation. It is not the language of a dignified statesman, but the slang of an electioneering demagogue. Whether I agree with a president or not in his views, I can respect him as the first officer of my government, if his course is marked by dignity and propriety. In this war on corporations and associated wealth, he initiates a British tyrant, James the First, or one of the Charles's, who, in the platitude of his royal prerogative, asserted the right to annul the charters of incorporation in England. I think he annulled one, that of the city of London, and alarmed others into a surrender of their charters, and they obtained new charters from his majesty upon the payment of a bonus. He did not make war on corporations to secure the liberties or good of the people, but to increase the power and patronage of the crown, and to fill the coffers of the king. Whether any higher motives influence those who denounce corporations here, I leave to them to determine. What is meant by associated wealth to create prejudice or odium, I do not understand. This slang either has no definite meaning, or is the lowest sort of loco-focoism—intended as I imagine, to array the poor against the rich. A state, every political association, or body politic, is a corporation; it is associated wealth; men unite and form a state or body politic, to secure property, as well as life and liberty, and for the general happiness and prosperity. An incorporated city or town, is a body politic; an association of wealth or property, for the better security of property, as well as life and liberty, and every other blessing incident to the social state. Many corporations are composed of individuals with small funds, who put small sums together to accomplish some useful object, to which the surplus capital of no one individual is competent. Bridges, roads, insurance companies of every kind, are formed in this way. But I will not detain the committee by details on this subject. These corporations, formed by many individuals, create a common interest, and are so many fixtures in the state, giving strength and stability to the whole frame of human society.

From the report of the committee of ways and means, drawn and presented by the chairman, the organ to this house of the executive administration, we must infer that the executive is against a tariff protect American industry; against internal improvements of any kind, national or local, including harbors. He is against the distribution of the public land, or its proceeds among the states; he is for holding the proceeds as a part of the permanent annual revenue. With regard to a protective tariff, nothing need now be said, because that subject has been compromised and settled, until the year 1842. I don't understand that any man, of any party, is for disturbing the question before that time. With regard to internal improvements, no discussion is necessary, because with the exception of two or three roads of a national character and of great necessity and utility, which this government has commenced and seems to be bound in good faith to complete, I am not aware that any public man is urging on congress or the nation the policy of bringing in a system of internal improvements. General Jackson conceded the power to make improvements of a national character; and, I believe, no person contends for more, and but few for that much. It may be necessary to make a few roads with reference to military operations, or carrying the mail. I consider, continued Mr. Pope, these questions of tariff and internal improvements, disposed of for the present. If you friend from Virginia, (Mr. Robertson,) will read a part of my speech on the bank question in 1811, he will find that although we may not agree at out a national bank, we are nearer together about the line of demarkation between federal and state powers, than he supposes. I there contend that this government ought to avoid as far as possible any agency in the interior of the states, and leave to them all matters of local concern, confining the government to matters strictly national. The president, as I have before stated, contends for a sub treasury to place the public money under the control and in the keeping of the executive and officers holding at his pleasure, and is opposed to a national bank to be made our fiscal agent, and directly responsible to congress. I shall not, said Mr. Pope, at this period discuss this subject at large; at the called session. I presented a proposition for a national bank, reserving one-third of the stock to be divided among the states, and precluding foreign stockholders from any control or management of the institution, with other provisions, to be found in the proceedings of this house. Without discussion, that subject was silenced by the previous question. There never has been a majority in this congress for a national bank, sub treasury, or the state bank system. I must ask leave, continued Mr. Pope, on this occasion, to say to the conservative gentlemen, that I cannot endorse their scheme of state banks, because I have no faith in them; they will multiply and expand until they explode again. I may vote for them in preference to the sub-treasury, but it will require an effort with myself to make a choice. Gentlemen talk much of the danger of one bank monster, which has proved useful and safe and stood the test forty years. Now, sir, a many-headed monster of state banks is more frightful to me than one. We are called on to appoint at least twenty-six bank agents, under the authority of the 26 states, not under the control of this government, or responsible, to keep the public money in the city of New York half a year, and to receive the national revenue deposited in the New York banks, and that great state was to array her strength against the fact and authority of this government, and renew the scenes of nullification, tell their banks to withhold the revenue, and give them a pledge of non-compliance. What, sir, would be our condition, and how could the trials be reached, when perhaps most wanted? I beseech gentlemen to weigh this matter like statesmen, and not sacrifice their country to preserve their consistency in error. Every candid man must perceive at once, that if bank agency is necessary and proper for this government, it must have the power, and ought to exercise it, to create a sound, safe, and responsible bank agent, with branches in every state to receive and pay out the public funds, according to the directions of congress. This government with regard to cardinal powers clearly and distinctly granted, ought to be insistent in its action on this authority, and the public purse should be divorced from the control of executive, judiciary, and every authority, except the representatives of the people in congress. This is the great principle for which I contend, and the leading question now before the American people. I repeat, that I have a mortal aversion to this my headed monster, the state banks, and if I should vote for any such project, it will be for no other purpose than to defeat another measure, the sub-treasury, the leading object of which is to place the public purse more directly under executive direction. There is but one right course about any thing—the course marked out by the wise and enlightened statesmen and patriots who have gone before us; and that is to insist on the sanction of a national bill; and their wisdom has been confirmed by the experience of forty years. Every other experiment has failed, with great loss and injury to the country; and yet gentlemen insist that they must be consistent. The more I reflect on this state bank system in connection with this government, the more I dislike it. It has a tendency to bring the monied interest and institutions of the states, in contact, and under the influence of this government. Previous to the year 1811, when the charter of the first bank expired, our monetary system was safe and sound, the banking system had been, generally, honestly and prudently conducted, and no ruinous or seditious paper currency had caused this people. Many enlightened and disinterested men of the republic in party, assured me at that time, that no bank in the world had been better managed than the bank created with the sanction of congress at Washington, the charter of which was then about to expire. It was generally believed for some time before that period, that the charter would be renewed, and every vote given in the two houses of congress had indicated that result; but from causes not necessary to explain, the bill to renew the charter failed in the senate, by the casting vote of the vice president. This event gave birth to a host of state banks, the history of which is well known. After an experiment of four years of this state bank system, another national bank was created, with the sanction of Mr. Madison and his friends. The state banks, without the controlling check of a national institution, will not, I fear, succeed in securing to the people either an uniform or sound currency. A bank of the United States, with a large and sound capital, will not only be a useful fiscal agent, but will furnish a currency of unquestionable value. The constitution has assigned to congress the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof, and if gold and silver will not answer over this extensive country, and if a paper representative is to be furnished for the convenience of the people, it has ever seemed to me that it ought to emanate from the authority of the national government. Some object to depositing the money in a bank for the benefit of the stockholders; and in that I agree with them, and will only do it, for an equivalent in money or public services. The bank is an insurer of the safety of the fund placed in it; if the bank is robbed, the government does not lose it; but the bank; the bank must place the public money in different parts of the United States, where it is wanted, without risk or expense to the government. In the late session of the constitution, and in the spirit of our free institutions, continued Mr. Pope, I am opposed to the grant of any privileges to any man, or set of men, but in consideration of public services. Are not the public funds more safe in sound banks under our control, and responsible to this government, than in the hands of individuals, with whatever security they can give. Government rarely makes any thing out of securities; and indeed, it is probably better that the government should lose by the appointment of a bad officer, than that innocent individuals should be ruined. On this subject I will only add, that I can make no compromise of opinion or principle, unless controlled by the will of my constituents. Mr.

Pope could not avoid expressing his astonishment, at the assumption by his colleague, (Mr. Murray,) on the Bank of the United States. "A man may have honest scruples about the constitutionality of a national bank, but the utility of such an institution, has been generally admitted by the intelligent portion of all parties in the nation. It is most wonderful to me that a western gentleman of sense and candor should object to it. Our trade is carried out with distant states, and a national currency is more important to us than any portion of the union. Our traders now bring the notes of distant banks, and diffuse them among the people, the value of which I cannot tell my neighbor, if he asks me; but send him to the merchant—if he is a poor man, or a laborer, he may want a ten or twenty dollar note, converted into silver to pay small debts, and the merchant will tell him, probably, that it may be good, but not very current—the bill, however, change it, if the man will take the whole or part in goods, or discount, one, two, or three, or four per cent., and the holder will be driven to accept the terms; and in this way the poor and laboring classes are shaved constantly, for want of a currency, stable, sound, and which can any where and every where be converted into gold and silver. In this state of things every merchant, besides a host of others, are reaping a rich harvest by shaving and robbing the ignorant and laboring classes of the country.

One of the first and highest duties of this government, is to relieve and secure the people against a ruinous, inconvenient, or uncertain medium. No part of the union was more injured by fictitious and swindling banks, and depreciated bank notes, than the west; and it took many years after the last bank of the United States was established to redeem us from the evils to which I have adverted. A sound condition of things and a sound and uniform currency, was ultimately restored to the west, chiefly by the operation of the branches of the U. S. bank established there. At first they were not as prudently managed as they ought to have been; but, for about ten years before the removal of the deposits, we had a good currency, and our condition in regard to currency and commerce was sound and healthy. Branch banks were established at Pittsburg, Chillicothe, Cincinnati, Lexington, Louisville, St. Louis, Nashville, Natchez and New Orleans; and all worked well; and I never heard that any of them engaged in the party politics of the country. Something was said against the Louisville branch, and promptly repelled by two or three directors of the bank, of high standing. It may not be improper or irrelevant to remark, in connection with this subject to allude to the pecuniary condition of the western and south-western states. They have no surplus capital to make banks or internal improvements, and resort to loans for such purposes. Not only the states west and south, but many states on the Atlantic, have made large loans for those objects. The several states are now indebted, and a great part to foreigners, between 100 and 150 millions of dollars, at an annual interest of five or six per cent. Yes, sir, after all the clamor about foreigners and foreign influence, the states owe a large amount to foreigners, for loans to make banks; and if the funds should be badly managed, or swindling directors get the control of the banks, the money may be plundered, and then the people must be taxed to pay principal and interest of these debts, or this government may be called on again to renew the national system. I trust, on such occasions, may grow out of this state of things, a most anxious appeal to the gentleman to answer me with candor, whether it would not have been better to have created a national bank, required at least one branch, with a reasonable capital, to be placed in every state, and to lend money at five or six per cent. to aid the business and enterprise of the people? On this plan no debts could have been incurred by the states, and a better currency would have been furnished. It would certainly be the interest of the bank to furnish as much capital to each state as their business required. It must be admitted that the branches in the west were well controlled for the many years of their existence, whatever may be said of the matter by the party in struggle with the government. I have never noticed in the controversy, but can readily suppose that the law may have been guilty of some immorality and infidelity, such as are incident to every human association. They are, however, unworthy of the grave consideration of statesmen in deciding on a great measure of national concern. I repeat, continued Mr. Pope, that a man may object with some plausibility on constitutional ground, but a western man can have no other reason for clamoring against the bank, but because general Jackson denounced it.

My colleague, without using any personal or offensive language, has made a lunge at Mr. Clay, a distinguished senator from our state, in relation to the American system, which seems to me to have been uncalled for and unjust; owing, I must believe, to misapprehension of facts, and the history of that system. Whatever my relations to that gentleman have been, or are now, I feel it my duty to place him, with regard to that policy, in a proper light before this committee and the public. At no time in my life, whatever may have been his course towards me or the country, have I treated him unfairly. At one period, I had reason to complain of the intolerant and proscriptive spirit of himself and his friends; but, however, from any personal bitterness on either side. After he became secretary of state, in alliance with my friend from Massachusetts, he never offered me the hand of fellowship, and he was armed with additional power to deprive me of any share in the political concerns of my country. I thought I owed him a debt, which with the aid of the hickory stick, I concluded to discharge. I did so, and balanced the account between us. I now continued Mr. Pope, am ready to act towards that gentleman under the influence of public considerations alone. My colleague seems to impose the American system, with all its imaginary evils, to him; for he has not told us the mischief it has done, nor have I ever been able to find out from the writings, speeches, and denunciations of gentlemen, what the evils are to which they refer. They seem to suppose that the surplus in the treasury was the result of the American system. There is certainly no foundation for the assertion, and Mr. Clay is not responsible for what accumulated in 1835, and 36, and was deposited with the states by the act of 1836. That surplus was the result of the transfer of the public money from the bank of United States, to state banks, and a recommendation to the state banks to expand their issues, which gave birth to a scene of wild and extravagant speculation in public lands in 1834, '35, and '36, that brought into the treasury the enormous surplus distributed among the states in 1836, '37, and which by withdrawing so large an amount from the ordinary channels of trade and business, conducted much to that derangement of currency and convulsion in our commercial affairs in 1837. The deposit act of 1836, with a small variation, was in substance a division of the land fund among the states, according to Mr. Clay's views. Mr. Clay made every effort in his power to prevent a surplus in the treasury, by a distribution of the proceeds of the public lands among the states; and if his bill had not been defeated by president Jackson, there would have been no surplus. Cut off the land fund from the treasury, and the tariff would not have produced more than necessary to meet the usual demands on the treasury. A very small amount was expended for internal improvements during the administration of Mr. Adams, compared with that expended under the administration of general Jackson. The first great national improvement, the Cumberland road, had its origin under the administration of Mr. Jefferson; the work was commenced under that of Mr. Madison, and continued under every administration since. In 1811, the state of New York applied to this government, to aid her with funds to make a canal from the waters of the Hudson, to Lake Erie. Mr. Madison sent a message to congress recommending the subject to our favorable consideration, and commending in the strongest terms the policy of connecting by internal improvements the Atlantic with the western country. To cut down the mountains and facilitate the intercourse between the east and west, was a popular doctrine at that time, as well as to render this country independent of the workshops of Europe. The southern, western and middle states were generally, at least a large majority, for this policy. The people of New England were less favorable to it than any portion of the union. I might, continued Mr. Pope, with truth and justice, deny that Mr. Clay is entitled to the credit of originating the American system; for I believe Virginia, South Carolina and New York, have equal if not superior claims. The system became popular, and the eastern states after some resistance, acquiesced; and Mr. Clay, with his usual political tact, made himself the prominent actor. When he became secretary of state, and seemed to be on the high road to the presidency, other applicants were alarmed, and determined, if possible, to blast his prospects. To render the American system unpopular was an object of the first importance with the enemies of Mr. Clay. The system was too popular then to be directly resisted, and the high tariff of 1825 was a conduite of the Jackson party for effect on the system, calculated to injure Mr. Clay, whether his friends supported or opposed it. I was one of that party at the time, and it is well known that Mr. Van Buren and most of the Jackson men supported it. I was a zealous supporter of general Jackson at that time, and we were very unwilling for the general to commit himself, in a manner to embarrass his friends, or injure himself. We were fortunately soon relieved by the old hero, who came out for a judicious tariff, a ground which rendered him unassailable from any quarter. Mr. Chairman, could I see Mr. Pope, a review of our past political history will show, that many of the leading measures of this government have not been carried or rejected by reference to a presidential election.

My colleague, (Mr. Murray), professes to admire Mr. Clay much, although the author of so much mischief; but seems to admire nullification more. At the moment general Jackson was proceeding by proclamation and force to his declared nullification and its supporters, Mr. Clay interposed and averted the storm. This I have considered the best and most patriotic act of his life, and have ever given him full credit for it; and I think my colleague, as an act of sheer justice, while enjoining general Jackson, and nullification, might have bestowed on a distinguished citizen of our state some little praise for it.

Much is said about the increase and extravagance of our public expenditures, but to what extent this administration is responsible, I am unable to form a clear and satisfactory opinion. That there have been many imprudent expenditures is certain, and that many of these have been voted for by a portion of both parties, is equally true. During the present congress at least 2 millions of dollars have been appropriated against my vote, and I can give you a combination of a part of the whigs with a portion of the friends of the administration; and I therefore hesitate to rely on this as a substantial ground of objection to the men in power. My objections are not so much to the amount of expenditure, as the manner of expenditure. Has the money collected from the people been fairly and carefully expended for their benefit? Public money honestly and fairly disbursed, for necessary and beneficial purposes, generally benefits the poor and laboring classes. That there have been many instances of improper expenditure, I have no doubt; but so many have participated in them, that I find it difficult to fix the blame exclusively any where. My impression is strong that the Indian war might have been avoided, and ten millions of dollars saved to this government, if the advice of general Eaton and his government and officers, had been followed. The war was badly managed. The expenses were increased by drawing volunteers from the distant parts of Missouri, and employing the northern Indians at much expense, and without the least utility. I confess that I am not surprised at a considerable increase of our expenses. They have grown, and will grow, with the growth and wealth of the country, and the extension of our settlements. I repeat, that my objections are to the manner of expenditures. I fear that we are plundered to a great extent, from want of vigilance in the selection of officers and agents, and especially disbursing agents. The good and success of the party, enter too much into the consideration of the appointing power.

With regard to executive patronage, about which we have heard much, I have little to say, because it merits attention to a great extent, so long as the constitution remains unaltered. To the president, the constitution has assigned the power of appointing all officers except such of a subordinate character as congress may think proper to confide to the heads of the departments. How far the abuse of this power can be restrained or regulated by law, I have not time to examine. The officers of the treasury department ought, I think, to be rendered more independent of executive dictation in the performance of official duty, and the power of removals may possibly be subjected by law to some salutary checks. The general power of appointment, the founders of our republic deemed it most wise and safe to place where it is. To remove a man fit and faithful, without other cause than a difference of political opinion, seems to be tyrannical; and good behavior and fitness ought to be the guarantee for his continuance in office. Whether this power can be controlled by law, or whether it is a matter of grave consideration. When a new president is elected and enters upon the duties of his office, there would seem to be some strong political considerations in favor of the right of the president to select the prominent executive officers, not only of the cabinet, but throughout the union, on whose fidelity and ability he must rely for the execution of the laws, and the executive administration of public affairs. But, after he has made his selection, and they have proved fit and faithful, I would deem it an impeachable offence to remove for expression of opinion. Such tyranny tends to make slaves and hypocrites, and to break down that spirit of independence and freedom of thought and action, which belong to the genius of our system. The public officers and the people should be told by the chief magistrate that moral worth and fitness are paramount to party merit. This course is essentially necessary to preserve that moral force in the nation, upon which the durability of this republic depends. I am satisfied, continued Mr. Pope, that many delations and official abuses have occurred, because the selections have been made more with reference to the good of the party, than the good of the public. Party efficiency is estimated higher than integrity or qualifications; and here I must be permitted to say, that I cannot admit the excuse for bad appointments usually offered, that the president and other executive officers have been deceived. He who is determined not to be imposed on, and will be vigilant in his inquiries, will not be mistaken on a thousand occasions. Sir, they are in most instances willing to be deceived, if the good of the party is to be advanced. I am aware that there are many useless offices and agencies, adding to the patronage and influence of the president, which ought to be abolished. There are, I am convinced, continued Mr. Pope, at least 40 land offices which might be dispensed with; 40 registers, and as many receivers, making 80 or 90 in the whole, receiving salaries, besides the contingent expenses of these forty offices; and if I should be honored again with a seat here, I will avail myself of the first opportunity, when there is the least prospect of success, to prune, if possible, this branch of executive patronage. There are, no doubt, other offices and agencies which ought to be pruned off.

Mr. Chairman, continued Mr. Pope, the disposition of the public lands is another subject of deep interest to the people of the United States, to which the attention of this house and the nation has been called during the present session, and which the parties seem to be divided here. The leading question appears to be whether the proceeds shall be divided among the states, or brought into the national treasury as part of our permanent annual revenue. The president and most of his friends are against the distribution among the states, and I infer that my colleague goes with the president. If I am mistaken in regard to the views of the president, on the questions to which I have adverted, and more especially about the public lands of such cardinal importance, I wish to be corrected. I desire to know whether his friends endorse his views. I can assure gentlemen that I neither wish to misunderstand him or them, but desire to place the administration fairly before the people. He, and friends, with my colleague are opposed to distribution. On this question, I would, if practicable, tread in the footsteps of my old friend, president Jackson. In one of his messages to congress, he says, that after the payment of the public debt, we ought no longer to look to the public lands as a source of revenue, but to sell them to actual settlers at a moderate price. With this statesmanlike view, I entirely concur; but the plan is not practicable—neither my state, nor any of the other states will consent to it. The next best plan, is that presented by Mr. Clay's land bill, with a little alteration. I am for allowing a pre-emption to actual bona fide settlers, at the government price, the proceeds of the lands to be divided among the states, to be applied at least one half to common schools, and the residue to general improvements under the direction of the legislatures of the states; the distribution to be made according to the apportionment under the next census. The west will then have more than one third of the representatives of the nation, and instead of the whole land fund being drawn from the west, to be expended in other sections of the union, more than one third will be retained in that section, to be expended there. My colleague's course is strange, passing strange, on this subject. He complains that no public money is expended in Kentucky, while large expenditures are made in other states; and yet supports the president in draining the west of five millions every year, to be expended in other parts of the union, without giving Kentucky any portion of it. The estimate of the secretary of the treasury of the annual proceeds of the public lands, is five millions; the proposition to be received by Kentucky, Tennessee, and Indiana, after the next census, will be about the same; probably near 250,000 dollars each, annually; Ohio nearly double that sum, Illinois and Missouri about 150 or 160 thousand dollars each. I do not pretend to strict accuracy, but I feel assured that my calculation is substantially correct, so far as concerns the argument in favor of distribution. By this arrangement the states will be enabled to diffuse common schools for the benefit of the poor classes, and improve roads, rivers, harbors, and other works of internal improvement, without calling on the general government for aid. And why shall not this fund be divided in this way, by which the expenditure in the interior will be equalized, because the president, and my colleague and others, say, if you withhold the land fund, the farm may be raised. My colleague admits that Kentucky pays her full share of the tariff; without any excess by her; and yet he is willing to tariff any excess by a drain of five millions, without retaining any portion for the use of his own state. While Mr. Clay is for a general tariff, operating on the whole, he is for dividing this fund so as to give his own state 250 thousand dollars a year.

I will beg leave, continued Mr. Pope, to present the views of a constituent of mine, a zealous friend of president Jackson, well known to my colleague; a man of strong understanding, bold and independent in the expression of his opinions; when wrong he can never be put right, and when right can never be changed. On a public occasion he contended that public land belonged to the people as tenants in common; and it divided, a poor man would be entitled to as much as a rich man; that if the proceeds of the lands were applied to the payment of revenue, or to relieve the wealthy, it was a robbery of the poor, for the benefit of the rich. He contended that if a wealthy man paid a tax of 100 dollars, and a poor man only five, and the land fund was applied to pay or lessen the taxes, then the rich man paying 100 dollars would receive 20 times as much land as the poor man who paid five. He insisted that the revenue, according to the principle and spirit of the constitution, ought to be paid in proportion to the property or ability of each individual; and that to make the land fund revenue, was unequal and unjust. In this view there is much plausibility of force, and is in conformity to the plan adopted by the state of Georgia, for the division of their vacant lands. The president and his friends are for taking the fund belonging in common to all, to relieve the consumers of foreign luxuries and a heavy burden from any additional burthen. The debts charged on our public lands are paid; and, I concur with president Jackson, that we ought no longer to look to that source for revenue. According to my plan, the benefits of this fund will be as nearly equalized as practicable, but may be improved after further examination and reflection.

I cannot resume my seat, Mr. Chairman, without a slight notice of remarks made on this floor and elsewhere, by gentlemen from the Old Dominion. They seem to make a national bank a test question. How long I ask, has this been the doctrine of Virginia? Many of the members from Virginia voted for the Bank of 1816, and were re-elected; and some were elected by the legislature to the senate of the United States, after voting for the bank, unless I am very much mistaken. William H. Crawford was chairman of the committee in the senate in 1811, who reported a bill to recharter the first bank, and made a very able speech in support of the constitutionality and expediency of such an institution. Yet, Virginia supported Mr. Crawford for the presidency, with great zeal, against general Jackson; and Mr. Van Buren, the president, notwithstanding his uncompromising hostility to the bank, was the right bower of Mr. Crawford, in opposition to the general. The course of Virginia towards Kentucky, her first born, seems to be unnatural and ungrateful. Kentucky followed in the wake of Virginia for thirty or forty years; supported all her distinguished men for the presidency, and now, when she presents for that office a man of the first order, born and raised in the Old Dominion, they turn their backs on him, because he entertains the same opinion now which Mr. Madison and many other Virginians did in 1816, and which Mr. Clay, Mr. Chapman, and votes to a citizen of New York. Mr. Chapman, continued Mr. Pope, I could hardly consider a man's opinion about a national bank, whether for or against it, an insupportable objection, provided he would follow the advice of Mr. Jefferson, that the president, in a doubtful case, ought not to delect, by veto, the will of congress and the nation.

Mr. Chairman, continued Mr. Pope, I was desirous to call the attention of the committee to other topics of much interest, but I feel too much exhausted to proceed. I hope, on some other occasion, to add to the views now presented to the committee. I have stated with frankness, without any partizan feeling other than results from difference of opinion, my objections to the principles and leading measures of this administration, as I verily believe, as I have before said, that a change of the administration is necessary to the healthy action of the body politic; and that we have no reason to expect that the errors and abuses which have occurred, will be reformed, or that our currency will be restored to a sound and stable condition, without a change. It is necessary, Mr. Chairman, to restore the principles of the constitution to their former strength and activity.

CHRONICLE.

By a report of a committee of the New York common council, it appears that one hundred and twenty-one thousand, four hundred and thirty-nine dollars and ninety-three cents were paid during the years 1831 '33, '36, and '37, for fees on proceedings for opening streets in the city of New York. Comptroler's $16,032 53; commissary to wos, $15,133 73; surveyors, $13,265 13; appraisers, $11,269 50; room hire, $1,362 23; collectors, $11,221 23.

North Carolina looms. We saw a day or two since, a bale of woolen and cotton goods, from the Pheix factory, Fayetteville, which was sent to one of our merchants as a sample. It is a favorable one and furnishes goodly evidence of a probable improvement in the manufacturing machinery. It has a nap, is a hair-bur, adapted to negro clothing, and we hope it will be purchased for that purpose by our rice planters, and farmers generally. How much better would it be to purchase a good article from our own looms, than to buy the same from the factories in her states.

(Wilmington (N. C.) Adver.

Texas Navy. Lieut. Adams received at New Orleans, state that the navy of Texas was to be largely increased. Mr. Hay, secretary of the navy, was busily engaged in organizing the department for efficient service.—H. H. Williams, esq. of this city, who is the navy agent of the government, has orders for building a number of fine vessels. An invitation is extended, by the Galveston Gazette, to some forty or fifty of our passed midshipmen and lieutenants, to take service in the Texas navy with an assurance that the chances of promotion are greater in that service than in that of any other.

Napoleon's ashes. The following article is extracted by the New Orleans Bulletin from a Havana paper :

"Having been at the sumptuous ball given to the distinguished citizens of this city by his highness the prince de Joinville, on board the Iphigene, on the 23d January, we should be blameable in neglecting to notice the brilliant spectacle, which we contemplated with much astonishment and pleasure. A superb ship, most beautifully illuminated, combining, as if by enchantment, the greatest simplicity and magnificence, the obsequious gallantry of the prince, and the courtesy of his numerous suite, &c. We shall not be accused of exaggeration, by affirming that such a spectacle has never before been offered to the eyes of Europeans."

"Sincerely do we wish that the illustrious son of the King of the French, of whose urbanity and delicacy we have such proof, may accomplish the exalted national mission with which he says he is entrusted, to convey to France the mortal remains of the illustrious and unfortunate captive of St. Helena. Heaven grant him a prosperous voyage!"

Naval. We hear from the Norfolk papers of Friday, that the U. S. sloop of war Warren bound to the West Indies, was in Hampton roads, ready to sail with the first fair wind. The following is a list of her officers :

The U. S. sloop of war Lexington sailed from Mazarin on the 4th of December last, with specie on board, bound to Valparaiso—all well.

The frigate Macedonian, commodore Shubrick, passed through Turks Island Roads on the 22d ult.—all well.

On Wednesday the 13th, the broad pennant of commodore Caxton was hoisted on board the Constitution, at Norfolk. It is rumored that she will proceed to New York, to take on board a minister to England, and after landing him, proceed to the Pacific.

The Constitution. Monday, the fourth instant, being the fiftieth anniversary of the national constitution, a number of the citizens of Washington, with many of the members of congress who still remained in the city, united in celebrating the event by a subscription dinner at Brown's hall. Among the members of congress, were Messrs. Webster, of the senate, Johnson and Jener, of Maryland, Pope, of Kentucky, and Johnson, of Louisiana. General Walter Jones presided, supported by the honorable Henry Johnson, of Louisiana, the honorable John Pope, of Kentucky, and the honorable Daniel Jener, of Maryland, as vice presides. Some splendid toasts were delivered, and a number of excellent toasts drunk, after the cloth was removed.

Land sale at Milwaukee. The sum of $50,000 was taken on the first day and not an acre was sold except to actual settlers. (Detroit Daily Advertiser.

Trade of the Susquehanna. The Columbia Courier of the 13th says: "The river is now entirely clear of ice, and navigation has once more commenced. Numerous arks have passed us from the towns above, and many are now being loaded at this place, with whiskey, lumber, &c. for Baltimore."

The Paris (Mod.) Standard says, that while three daughters of Vandy, residing in Shelby county, Mo., a few days since, were attempting to cross the North Fork of Salt river, the ice gave way, and one of them fell through. The second endeavored to assist her, and, in doing so, was drawn after her. The third then refused to offer assistance, and shared their fate. The eldest sister was about 15 years of age. Their bodies were not recovered.

Governor Everett and lieutenant governor Hull have been unanimously nominated for re-election, by a state convention of the wings of Massachusetts. They have accepted the nomination.

Large cargo. The British ship Britannia, of St. Johns, N. B. sailed recently from Philadelphia with a cargo of 5,500 barrels of flour, 66 hds. querciton bark, and 10,000 staves, bound for Liverpool,—being one of the largest cargoes taken from the port of Philadelphia for many years; the ship is 700 tons burden, and drew nearly 2000 tons of water. The Baltimore Gazette, speaking of the shipments of Bark from Philadelphia for England, states that a full cargo was going on board the bark Minerva for Liverpool, and that the packet ship Algonquin would also take out 4000 barrels.

Snow at the south. At Charleston on the 5th instant, snow fell to the depth of 6 inches. There was a little snow even at New Orleans, accompanied by a violent wind, which prevented Mr. Clayton, the aeronaut, from making his proposed ascension.

The Illinois house of representatives has passed a bill prohibiting the using of currency by a penalty not exceeding one thousand dollars, and imprisonment not to exceed thirty days.

A bill has passed the legislature of Pennsylvania directing the governor to subscribe $100,000 to the stock of the Franklin rail road, leading from Chambersburg, through Hagerstown, to Williamsport on the Potomac.

Valuable invention. A powerful hearing trumpet has been lately invented; it is so constructed as to stand upon a table, and receive the voices of persons in the room, which it magnifies to an extraordinary degree. The power of the instrument is thus described by the inventor: "I placed the instrument at the end of a room sixty feet in length, at the other extremity of which two persons were in low conversation. As long as I continued to hold the tube to my ear, I could hear every word they said to each other; but the moment I removed it, I was only sensible of a murmur of voices, without distinguishing a syllable." To an experimenter, no doubt, the efficacy of the instrument are by no means comfortable, as every word falls with the force of a blacksmith's hammer; and, in addition thereto, it makes the ear ring with noises that no other person perceives.

A cow, the property of Mr. F. Kent, of West Springfield, Mass., during sixty days, beginning June last, gave one thousand three hundred and forty-six quarts of milk; averaging 22 1-4 quarts per day. The largest yield was 11 quarts in the morning, and 16 in the evening.

Important from Wisconsin. The legislature met at Madison on the 23d ult. The governor delivered his message to the senate, and announced other legislative measures of the Winnebago Indians. It is anticipated from sundry indications that there will be difficulty this spring, as they are determined not to leave the country at the time stipulated in the treaty. They are making hostile preparations. The governor recommends that the war department be immediately memorialized for arms and ammunition, and for five companies of dragoons. The governor will take the responsibility, in case of emergency, of raising volunteer companies, which he will head in person for the protection and defence of exposed settlements.

A duel. The Nashville Wing of the 8th inst. states that a duel was fought near Moscow, Fayette county, a few days before, between Alexander J. Doleson, (adopted son of general Jackson,) and Henry Robeson; the latter was wounded. The duel was near the Mississippi line, we presume the meeting took place in that state. A second meeting was talked of the next day, but the officers of justice probably deflected it.

White Sulphur springs. The Lewisburg Enquirer states that Dr. Mortman, resident physician at the White Sulphur springs, is about to publish "a directory for the use of the White Sulphur waters," with practical remarks on their medicinal properties and applicability to particular diseases, and that a company has been formed, which has entered into extensive arrangements for bottling the White Sulphur waters, and have them transported to all parts of the United States, and so peculiar is said to be the quality of this water, that it loses none of its virtues by this operation.

Ordnance for the frontier. Twenty-four pieces of cannon with their carriages, from Albany, destined for the castward, were brought down on the W. river rail road on Monday. (Boston Daily Advertiser.

Costs of riots. According to a late estimate, $16,000 have been paid from the city treasury for New York, within the last four years, for the expenses of suppressing riots. The injury to public and private property probably exceeded ten times this amount. Fifty resolute men, with good muskets, would have suppressed each riot in hoc loco, and without any injury to property. In Philadelphia, the injury to private property by riots was about $70,000 in two nights, and the injury to the character of the city beyond calculation.

Gipsies. The number of this extraordinary race in Europe, Asia, and Africa, is calculated to amount to seven hundred thousand. In America they have been hitherto unknown, though a small number are said to have emigrated to that quarter recently. Throughout the world they speak the same kind of gibberish, which is very similar to the language of Hindostan, to which country their origin has, on that account, been assigned.

New Hampshire. The following are the names of the representatives for the 26th congress elected last week from that state: Irahan Shaw, Chas. G. Atherton, Edmund Burke, Ira A. Eastman, Jared W. Williams.

Death of gen. Ripley. The last Louisianaian contains the intelligence of the death of general Eleazer W. Ripley, a native of New Hampshire, but for many years a resident of Louisiana, of which state he was a representative in the last congress. As a statesman and a soldier, his name stands conspicuous on the page of his country's history.

Bank post notes. It was decided, last week, in the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts, that bank post notes are entitled to grace, in the same manner as bills of exchange and promissory notes in general.

The number of persons who emigrated from Liverpool during the year 1838, under the supervision of the government emigration agent, was 31,411. Of these 10,863 sailed for the United States, 853 for British North American colonies, 1,059 for Australia, 335 for West Indies, 106 to Liberia, America, and 59 for Cape of Good Hope and Mauritius.

Western river. At Pittsburg on the 14th, there were six feet four inches water in the river, and it was falling.

At Wheeling on the same day, "the river" says the Times "was in as good stage for navigation as could be wished."

At Cincinnati on the 13th the river was sixteen feet above low water mark, and falling very slightly—weather threatening rain.

Trade on the Chesapeake and Ohio canal for the week ending Tuesday, March 19, 1839. Twenty-six boats descending, 46 boats ascending, 466 tons flour, 2,403 bushels wheat, 200 barrels apples, 265 1-2 bushels rice and chops, 69 barrels apples, 1,050 bushels lime, 5 1-2 tons iron, 1,495 bushels meal, 1,650 bushels corn meal, 30 bushels corn, 43 1-4 tons furniture, 125 cords wood, 30 bushels seeds, 7 hirkos lard, 18 bales hay, 300 feet iron bar.

Forty-six boats ascending, cargoes as follows: 360 tons plaster, 416 bushels salt, 965 bushels potatoes, 13,150 feet plank, 41,600 shingles, 21,000 laths, 10 tons coal, 9 tons groceries, 56 kegs powder, 1,143 apple barrels, 92 bushels oysters, 30 barrels fish, 81 barrels liquor, 16 barrels tar.

Banks. The Detroit City bank has given notice that it will suspend specie payments for sixty days. The Detroit Advertiser says that it has every reason to believe that the obligation to bills of holders and depositors will be redeemed at the expiration of that period. The holders are not to sacrifice the bills of the bank. The amount in circulation is only $15,423, being one-eighth of the circulation allowed them by the general banking law, under which that institution was created.

The State bank at Tusculoo, Alabama, has, we are informed, by the State Intelligence, determined to discontinue accommodation paper forthwith, to the amount of $100,000 certainly, and probably to three or four times that amount. To prevent an immediate return of the paper, it will issue post notes at ninety days.

By the will of the late Mr. Rix, of Raleigh, N. C. about twenty of his slaves are to be sent to Liberia, for which purpose a sufficient sum was left to defray the expenses of conveying them there, and comfortably establishing them in the colony. The sum of $15,000 was also devised for the support of an infirmary for the poor of Raleigh, and many other liberal bequests made by the provisions of the will.

Another disastrous steamboat explosion. We lament to learn, from the Cincinnati Wing, that the connecting pipe of the steamboat Rep. ter, exploded about forty miles below that city, (while the boat was on her way from Louisville to Cincinnati,) causing the instant death of the steward of the boat, and so badly wounding a gentleman by the name of Hagg, from Henry county, Kentucky, that he died in a short time afterwards. A boy attached to the boat, was also dreadfully wounded—recovery doubtful.

Illinois. The St. Louis Republican of the 8th says: "The governor of Illinois nominated, on the 1st inst., judge Ford to the office of secretary of state. The senate laid the nomination on the table until the 4th of July by a vote of 22 to 11. The nomination was laid on the table on the 2d inst., and the senate had, when fill, refused to confirm any nomination and the present was considered as an attempt to force it when a number of the senators, chiefly whigs, had left. The nomination was subsequently withdrawn. Gov. Corwin sent a protest to the senate which he asked to have spread in the public papers, considerable excitement was manifested on this subject.

NILES' NATIONAL REGISTER.

FIFTH SERIES. No. 5.—VOL. VI.]

WASHINGTON CITY, MARCH 30, 1839.

[VOL. LVI.—WHOLE No. 1,435

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED, EVERY SATURDAY, BY WILLIAM OGDEN NILES, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE

—We invite the attention of our delinquent subscribers to an article in another page, headed "THE BANE OF EDITORS," for we assure them that we are resolved to take a different course from that we have recently pursued to collect our dues—for appeals to their sense of justice, to say nothing of common honesty, seem to have been utterly disregarded. Our affairs have reached such a crisis, that forbearance is no longer a virtue; and it is due to ourselves and others, that the large amount standing on our books should be collected as speedily as possible. There are not, perhaps, twenty among the long list of delinquents, who cannot pay their bills without the slightest inconvenience—but if there are any who are really, or think themselves, "too poor" to take the "REGISTER," we say to them, in the best possible spirit, "pay and quit." We would rather have two thousand subscribers who pay promptly, than four thousand who do not pay until they are weary of being dunned, and we are embarrassed by their remissness.

They ought to remember, also, that we are here in an independent capacity, and publishing the "REGISTER" at a cost of about forty per cent. over what we paid to publish it in Baltimore—that we have no fat-jobs or rich contracts to aid in defraying our expenditures, but are solely and entirely dependent upon the proceeds of our subscription list—objects of indifference to "sconferal politicians," and the whole herd who measure their patriotism by the amount of the public treasure they are permitted to grasp, and would raise the shout for "good man" or "good devil," if they were paid for it! All we ask is the amount honestly and justly due from our patrons! It will enable us to pay our debts, and to eat our "saw-dust pudding" in peace; which will be more dear to us, with our saucy independence, than costly viands and rich wines purchased with the wages of venality and prostitution. Franklin's fare, is the only fare politicians award to an independent editor here; and as we are too old to learn to play the parasite, and if not too old, too proud to worship the creatures we have helped to make, we do not expect any thing else.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE PRESIDENT.

Charles Walker to be attorney of the United States, for the southern district of Florida, in the place of William Marvin, appointed judge for said district.
Franklin Peale to be chief coinor, and Jonas R. McIntosh to be melter and refiner, of the mint of the United States at Philadelphia.

THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH CASE. We learn from the Philadelphia National Gazette that the trial before the supreme court on the writ of quo warranto, in which the two bodies claiming to be the general assembly of the Presbyterian church are the parties, terminated on Tuesday. The jury retired at eleven o'clock, and returned into court in about half an hour, with a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs; these are known as the new school party. The counsel for the defendants, or old school party, have moved for a new trial.

NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY. The following resolutions were adopted by the house of representatives of the legislature of Maine on Wednesday, the 20th instant, in substitute of the original resolve of the committee, which merely authorised the governor under certain contingencies to withdraw the military force from the disputed territory:
Resolved, That the right of this state to exclusive jurisdiction over all that territory claimed by Great Britain which lies west of a line due north from the monument to the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, (usually denominated the disputed territory), has been constant and indefeasible since her existence as an independent state; and no agreement which has or may be entered into by the government of the union, can impair her prerogative to be the sole judge of the time when, and the manner in which, that right shall be enforced.

Resolved, That this state, in view of the measures recently adopted by the government of the union in relation to this question, and particularly the provision made for a special minister to the court of St. James; and actuated by an earnest desire to come to an amicable adjustment of the whole controversy, will forbear to enforce her jurisdiction in that part of her territory, the possession of which is now usurped by the province of New Brunswick, so far as she can do so consistently with the maintenance of the resolve of the 24th January last; but she has seen nothing in recent events to cause her to doubt that it is her imperative duty, as well as her inviolable right, to protect her public domain from degradation and plunder up to the extreme limits of her territory, and that no power on earth shall drive her from an act of jurisdiction so proper in itself, and to which her honor is so irrevocably committed.

Resolved, That the public measures of the governor of this state, in relation to the disputed territory, meet the cordial approbation of this legislature, that they concur in the doctrines and sentiments contained in his recent message—that they will sustain him in carrying into effect the resolve of the 24th January, aforesaid, and that whenever he shall be fully satisfied by the declarations of the lieutenant governor of New Brunswick or otherwise, that the latter has abandoned all intentions of occupying the disputed territory with a military force, and of attempting the expulsion of our party, that the exigency which called for the military having ceased, the governor be, and he hereby is, authorised to withdraw the same, leaving the land agent with a sufficient posse, armed or unarmed, as the case may require, to carry said resolve into effect.

Resolved, That as the practicability of running and marking the northeastern boundary line, in accordance with the provisions of the treaty of 1783, is indubitable to consent to another arbitration; in pursuance of the recommendation of the president of the United States, would be a virtual abandonment of the rights and interest of Maine.

Resolved, That a crisis has arrived, when it becomes the duty of the general government forthwith to propose to the government of Great Britain, a joint commission, for the purpose of running the line in accordance with the treaty of 1783—and in case of a refusal on the part of Great Britain, it is the duty of the United States to run the line upon her own authority, and to take possession of the whole disputed territory without necessary delay.

The first three of the above resolutions were offered by Mr. Delesdernier, and the two latter by Mr. Vose. When the resolutions were before the senate, that body adopted the three resolutions offered by Mr. Delesdernier, but struck out by a strict party vote, the first resolve, introduced by Mr. Vose, and amended the second by prefixing the following words: "that the entire practicability of running and marking our N. E. boundary line in strict conformity with the stipulations of the definitive treaty of peace of 1783, is beyond doubt." The resolves, four in all, were then passed to be engrossed.

After which no strenuous opposition was made, and they passed almost unanimously.

The latest intelligence states that the house refused to concur in the senate's amendments—that a conference was had—that the committee of the house reported in favor of concurring—and that the house finally did concur. The following resolution was then offered, in the house, and passed to be engrossed:

Resolved, by the house of representatives, that the unquestionable right of this state to the whole territory embraced within the limits as described by the definitive treaty of peace of 1783, ought never to have been submitted to arbitration, and in the opinion of this house, again to consent to another arbitration, would be an abandonment of the rights and interests of Maine.

The legislature of Maine were to adjourn on Monday last.

General Scott, it is avered in the Boston Post, expressed himself much dissatisfied with the resolutions passed by the Maine legislature.

At the last advices from the frontier, the troops of Maine were in the peaceable and undisputed possession of the Aroostook county, while the Tobique settlement was held by sir John Harvey, with a military force of one hundred and twenty-five men. Some anxiety is expressed to know whether any reply will be made by the British government to the message of governor Fairfield. The correspondence held with general Scott is indicative of a highly pacific feeling. The whole force at his disposal is said to be so small, as to put the idea of attempting to expel the troops of Maine from the disputed territory entirely out of the question. A late letter from Bangor gives the following account of the disposition of the militia sent by governor Fairfield to the mouth of the Aroostook:

"Our force have now reached Jarvis' camp, and are busily employed in erecting their fort and block houses for their accommodation. The fort is laid out so as to cover about six acres. They have five 24 pounder pieces mounted; and two iron twelve pounders are now about to be removed from Castine, to be planted upon the fort. The main portion is on the south side of the Aroostook, at the bend of the river. There is an American [post] directly opposite to it on the other side of the river, which is also being occupied and fortified. It is only 18 miles from this post to where the St. John crosses the line. As soon as the road can be opened so as to reach this place conveniently with supplies, our force will move up and take possession of the St. John.

The 11th regiment of British regulars from Quebec has arrived at Fredrickton.

The whole of their militia regulars under marching orders for the frontier is 2,000.

The New Brunswick legislature were still in session. By papers from thence to the 12th, we learn that the transport Elizabeth, with a detachment of regulars, had struck on a rock, but had been got off, and towed into Shelburne. The troops were to be brought round to St. John.

MEXICO. The New Orleans Louisiana of the 18th has the following:

By the arrival of the brig Atar Gull, (formerly the Iurbridge), we have received news from Vera Cruz some days later than that brought by the Water.

The most important portion of her news is the arrival at Vera Cruz of two diplomatic agents, gen. Gaudaloupe Victoria and Manuel Gorostiza, charged by the Mexican government to treat with admiral Baudin on the cessation of hostilities. As soon as the latter heard of their arrival at Vera Cruz, he left Anton Lizardo for that place in the frigate Nordsee; he was received at Vera Cruz with a salute from the cannon on the forts. The Mexican envoys, Admiral Baulin, and the English ambassador, Mr. Packenham, repaired on board the English frigate La Pique, to discuss the basis of the proposed treaty.

We are unimpaired as to the result of the first conference, but we have good reason to infer, from the tenor of semi-official letters brought by the Atar Gull, that there was no obstacle to the smoothing of all difficulties, and that Vera Cruz would soon be re-opened to trade.

We await the arrival of the Water Watch, which was to sail from Vera Cruz for this place three or four days after the Atar Gull; she will probably bring us the result of the conference.

Santa Ana. A letter received in this city from Mexico, under date of the 22d February, says: "Santa Ana has at length arrived from Vera Cruz. His march was slow, in order to gain time. A commission of ministers is appointed, which, in conjunction with Mr. Packenham, will go down next week to treat with admiral Baulin. I apprehend this is a mere ruse of Santa Ana to gain time, until he can find out whether centralism or federalism is most likely to prevail, in order that he may be better able to shape his future conduct to the times."

[New Orleans Commercial Bulletin.]

Inter. Charles Ross, of the brig De-la-warre, arrived at Charleston on the 24th instant in six days from Havana. He reports that an English corvette, had arrived at Havana, in seven days from Vera Cruz, bringing the result of the conference which had been held on board the French frigate Neruda between the French admiral Baulin, Mr. Packenham and the Mexican envoys. An arrangement had been made which was entirely satisfactory to France, and it only wanted the ratification of the Mexican government, when all vessels would be permitted to discharge their cargoes. The particulars of the treaty had not transpired; the report was, that all French who had been expelled from Mexico would be permitted to return immediately, and that Mexico agrees to pay the amount due French citizens, and indemnify France for her expenses in maintaining the blockade, &c.

NON-IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT. We publish below the non-imprisonment for debt bill recently passed by congress. It was introduced into the senate and advocated by Mr. Tallmadge, and is a noble testimonial in favor of his humanity and intelligence:

Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That no person shall be imprisoned for debt in any state, on process issuing out of a court of the United States, where, by the laws of such state, imprisonment for debt has been abolished; and where, by the laws of a state, imprisonment shall be allowed, under certain conditions and restrictions, the same conditions and restrictions shall be applicable to the process issuing out of the courts of the United States; and the same proceeding shall be had therein as are adopted in the court of such state.

TREATY WITH THE KING OF SARDANIA. The "Globe" of Tuesday contains a copy of a treaty of commerce and navigation between the United States and the king of Sardinia, concluded and signed at Genoa on the 26th of last November, between Nathaniel Niles, special agent on the part of this government, and the Sardinian secretary of state, and ratified by both governments, the ratifications having been exchanged at Washington on the 18th of the present month, by our secretary of state and Auguste de Colobiano, charge d'affaires of his majesty the king of Sardinia.

THE WHITE SEAS. The following notice has been officially received at the department of state from the Russian government, through its representative in the United States, and is now published for the benefit of our navigators in the White seas.

[Globe.]
In order to facilitate the entrance of the river Dwina of the North by vessels, a light-house of stone has been erected upon the island of Mouljok, near Archangel, the height of which, from the lantern to the base, is 130 feet, (English), and its entire elevation above the sea 140½ feet. It is situated in the latitude of 64 degrees 54 minutes and 45 seconds north, and in 40 degrees 16 minutes and 45 seconds east longitude from Greenwich. It will be lighted by a fixed light during the months of August, September and October of each year; and may be distinguished from the deck of a vessel, coming from the west, at the distance of 17 sea miles, between north-northeast and south-east-quarter south.

PRINTING FOR THE DEPARTMENTS. In compliance with a provision, appended to the general appropriation bill, the various executive departments have advertised for contracts for executing the printing and binding which may be required by the departments, and supplying them with stationery—whose contracts are to be given to the lowest bidder, which bids shall be accompanied with vouchers of his capacity to fulfil them.

ABOLITION. The following resolutions have been adopted by the legislature of Ohio:

Resolved by the general assembly of the state of Ohio, That in the opinion of this general assembly, ours is a government of limited powers; that all powers not delegated by the constitution are reserved to the people; and that, by the constitution of the United States, congress has no jurisdiction over the institutions of slavery in the several states of the confederacy.

Resolved, That the agitation of the subject of slavery in the non-slaveholding states is in the opinion of this general assembly, attended with no good; that the amelioration of the condition of the slaves is not enhanced, and that it is a violation of the faith which ought ever to exist among the states in the same confederacy.

Resolved, That the schemes of the abolitionists for the protracted happiness of the slaves are, in the opinion of this general assembly, wild, delusive, and fatal; and have a direct tendency to destroy the harmony of the union, to rivet the chain of the slaves, and to destroy the perpetuity of our free institutions.

Resolved, That all attempts to abolish slavery in the states of this union, or "to prohibit the removal of slaves from state to state, or to discriminate between the institutions of one portion of this country and another, with the views aforesaid," are in the opinion of this general assembly, in "violation of the constitution of the United States, and destructive of the fundamental principles on which rests the union of these states."

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this general assembly, it is unwise, impolitic, and inexpedient to repeal any law now in force, imposing disabilities upon black and mulatto persons, thus placing them upon an equality with the whites, so far as the legislature can do, and indirectly inviting the black population of other states to emigrate to this state, to the manifest injury of the public interest.

Resolved, That the governor be requested to forward copies of these resolutions to the president and vice president of the United States, to each of our senators and representatives in congress, and to the executive of every state in the confederacy.

FREE NEGROES.—The legislature of Alabama have passed an act prescribing that every free person of color arriving in that state, on board a vessel as cook, steward, mariner, or in any other employment, shall be immediately lodged in prison, and detained until the departure of the said vessel, when the captain thereof shall be bound under a heavy penalty, to take him away. If any free person of color thus sent away, shall return, he or she shall receive thirty-nine lashes, and if found within the state twenty days after such punishment, he or she shall be sold as a slave for any term not exceeding one year. The captain of any vessel in which such free person of color shall arrive, shall give security in the sum of two thousand dollars, that he will take away the said free person of color. The 6th section makes it lawful for any person to seize and make a slave for life, to his own use, any free person of color, who may have come into the state of Alabama, after the 1st day of February, 1832, provided this section shall not take effect until the 1st day of August next. The 7th section makes it lawful for any person to seize upon and make a slave for life, any free person of color who may be found in the state of Alabama, after the passage of this act, and who shall have come into the state since its passage.

Approved February 2, 1839.

In the event of our being again plunged into a war, from the immense quantities of troops and shipping which they will require to enable this country to retain possession of them, and the vast distance which many of these colonies are from the mother country, it is more than probable that the loss of several of them would be the result of those hostilities, with which it appears, according to the warlike preparations of the ministry, we are now threatened. The next question will be, as many of our colonies "do not pay their own expenses," whether the loss of the most profitable among them would not, in reality, is a real gain to the country.

VIRGINIA SENATOR. The legislature of this state having made another trial on Saturday the 23d ultimo, to elect a senator in the place of Mr. Rives, postponed the subject indefinitely; it will, no doubt, enter deeply into the elections which take place in April next, and hence we give place to the following from the "Richmond Enquirer," in which Mr. Rives "defines his position."

To the editor of the Enquirer:

Richmond, March 1, 1839.

Dear sir: To prevent misconception, and to satisfy a desire expressed by some of my constituents, I have determined to publish Mr. Rives's letter, which I spoke of at one time as "unsatisfactory," being under the influence of a rumor afterwards ascertained to be unfounded. I have already stated, that the letter, disconnected from the rumor, was declared by gentlemen of all parties, including those not only politically but personally opposed to him, not susceptible of the construction I gave it. The rumor which misled me was, that Mr. Rives had written to a wise member of the legislature, that "if his course in the senate had not convulsed the world of his uncompromising hostility to Mr. Van Buren, he could not make it plainer."

I have already stated, that after I was informed by the gentleman who made the communication to me (Mr. Woolfolk, of Orange), that he was misinformed, I became thoroughly satisfied myself, that I had placed an improper construction on it. I have now only to state, that my constituents ought to be satisfied, from the course I had determined to pursue under my first construction of the letter, that I was prepared to censure Mr. Rives, whenever his opposition to Mr. Van Buren seemed to be indiscriminate, and not regulated as it should be by the merit or demerit of his measures. When I discovered my error, I promptly did him the justice to say, that I was satisfied his declining to make a pledge, was dictated by a desire to avoid the suspicion of electioneering for the office. In my letter to him, to which this is an answer, I stated explicitly, that I was not one of those who had any "difficulties" about the propriety of sustaining him, but I thought then as I think now, that the adherence to the same political principles which had regulated his public life heretofore, would be a sufficient pledge to secure his support to any of Mr. Van Buren's measures, which ought to be supported. I've distrusted his principles, no pledges would be worth any thing.

I wrote to him, to try to satisfy others. He declined, as he had done to all parties, declaring that his public life would be regulated, as it had been by the principles of the old republican school of Virginia.

Copy of a letter from Wm. C. Rives.

Washington, February 13th, 1839.

"Dear sir: I received yesterday your letter of the 10th instant, in which you mention that "my friends in Richmond are placed in a situation of considerable difficulty to defend my recent course," and your "positive assurance that I will support Mr. Van Buren's administration in the general, is thought necessary by a portion of them. It is far from my wish to place any friend of mine in a situation of difficulty on my account. If their own principle do not carry them spontaneously to my support, certainly have no right to expect it. I have never desired any gentleman to risk his popularity or his station for me. I have spared no pains to make my political principles (which are those of the old republican school) well known. I cannot now change them for men or office. I can give no pledge beyond this, consistently either with self respect or sense of the duty I shall feel, so long as I remain in the public service, to regard with the greatest interest the country as paramount to every other consideration. I remain, very respectfully, yours,

Wm. C. RIVES.

Please publish the above, that the public may see that there is no treason in it. R. SPENCER.

E. FOUNTAINE.

* I kept no copy of my letter to Mr. Rives.

THE BANE OF EDITORS. We wish our delinquent subscribers would read the following from the New Yorker, and "pay and quit" if they are too poor to continue their patronage; for we endorse every word of it, and are also resolved, if we cannot utilize the proceeds of our most poisonous and pernicious labors, to take more summary measures than we have recently used to secure them. As for those wretches who take offence when they are asked to pay their bills, and discontinue their pa ranage; let it be a happy riddance; for if really honest and disposed to do justice, they would adopt a contrary course and make some return for the embarrassment they have already brought upon us.

There is never a reform in regard to newspaper bills, or the present system will drive every honest man, who values his peace of mind and the well-being of his family, from the profession of editor and publisher—if he can break his bonds. We, unfortunately, have been "to the matter horn," and now, we fear, sever the chain which has so long galled us in our flesh, and caused us so many days of nights of agony; but rather than doom a child to the profession, as now rewarded, we would force it to break stones on the highway, or bind him to honest and honorable profession of a chimney-sweep—or in either case he would have a better chance of being happy and respectable!

In the public, we know, care not for the sufferings of editors, for like the woman who skinned her eyes out, they think the "poor devils" are used to it—just as they are. But never did an eel denied to daily skin and wriggling in the fish-wife's hands suffer more than do our editors who wot of our wily tricks of their—patrons! [Ed. Reg.]

The injustice of subscribers. If those of our subscribers who continue to withhold from us our hard-earned just dues, could only be made to realize the heavy expenses, little profits and multiplied anxieties and losses attendant upon a weekly paper establishment, we really think they would no longer delay a remittance of their bills, or which stands sternly opposite their names in our books. If such men are poor and honest, why close to perplex and embarrass us by grossness? Why not pay what you owe, and discontinue the paper, if you cannot afford to receive it on the other hand, there are others poor and honest, why condescend to sulk those who are your subscribers? To rob a publisher of five or six dollars and leave him without redress, is a base and unchristianlike, which any decent highwayman will be ashamed of. We are determined to take prompt efficient measures to exhibit the dishonesty of our pretended patrons to the gaze of a really admiring public. If we cannot redress our wrongs, we will at least preserve others suffering by the same hands."

FROM CANTON. By the barque Mary, our articles are received in Nov. 17. Steam navigation was talked of from Canton to India. The link will be from Canton to the N. W. coast of America, and that would make the circle complete our rail roads over the Rocky Mountains and to Oregon, or our ship canal cut through the straits of Darien.

French exploring frigate Artemise, La Place, was at New York, has arrived at Canton, and officers were treated with more than usual distinction, being suffered to go up to the city in inside boats.

There had been a serious affray on board the vessel John Bull, in which the male was engaged in the eclipse of the moon, October 3d, which over two hours, the China, with numerous flags and other noisy instruments, attempted to prevent the celestial dog from swallowing the orb, succeeded in driving him off his prey ere after midnight. [N. Y. Star.]

The following item from Siam was received by the vessel. It appears that Phra Saria Pak de, the son of the king Phya See Penat, a confidential adviser of the king, had been guilty of receiving from the eyes of the king's youthful wives, "fair speechless," betokening more love than could exist in the two, consistently with his majesty's and of paying these glances in kind. The lord of the frail dame received information of these, and the male culprit was forthwith apprehended. Being a person of consideration, having blood in his veins, and his father in high position, the king, it was thought that he would not merit more than the ordinary punishment of confinement and exposure of his excoriated back to the sun. But these were only preliminary after being subjected to which he was led to execution, and his head severed from his body at a blow. His fair partner in crime suffered the same fate, but some feeling of delicacy forbade her exposure to the public gaze, and she was taken down to the place of execution in a boat, so completely enclosed as to shut her entirely out from the view. Five men, one of whom was the king's chamberlain, and five women, were executed along with them, on suspicion or proof of their having conspired at the anchor.

FROM TEXAS. A slip from the New Orleans Commercial Bulletin, of the 16th, contains the annexed intelligence. The steamer Columbia had arrived, bringing accounts from Galveston to the 12th and from Houston to the 6th March.

"An arrival from Gonzales stated that the utmost tranquility prevailed in that section. A few days since a party of six or seven Wacoos and Tawacawies were discovered near that place, by the Tonkawas, who immediately gave information of their approach to the citizens of Gonzales; a party of whom accompanied by a few Tonkawa warriors, surrounded them all on foot, and had evidently ventured near the town to steal the horses of the citizens.

"The president has made a requisition upon the counties of Hansburg, Brazoria, Matagorda, Colorado, Liberty and Galveston, to furnish six companies of volunteers, to serve for six months on the frontiers. Five of these companies, when organized, will rendezvous at La Grange, under the command of colonel Burleson, and one will be stationed at Fort Milan, on the Brazos. His excellency has made an impressive and powerful appeal to the chivalry of these sections. Two companies of soldiers for the protection of the northern and western frontier had been organized at Houston, and great enthusiasm evinced in the cause. The officers of the army of the frontier were to rendezvous at Houston. A number had already arrived. Father Muldon, the vicar general of Texas during its connection with Mexico, was on a visit to the republic. He dined with Santa Ana a short time before he started for Texas, and was the bearer of a friendly message from him to the government of the United States in Texas, is described as quite flourishing, with a fair prospect of a constant advance and improvement."

Extract of a letter to a gentleman in New York, dated Houston, February 28.

Patric Muldon, an Irish priest, for many years a resident of Mexico, and high in the confidence of Santa Ana, arrived here this morning from the city of Mexico, via Havana and New Orleans, and as it is supposed, on a secret mission.

Colonel Bee, present secretary of state, has been appointed minister to Mexico, and general Dunlap, now secretary of the treasury, minister to the United States.

An agent of the French government has arrived at Galveston. General Hamilton, of South Carolina, recently appointed minister by this government to Mexico, is loan commissioner, is daily expected from the United States.

The loan of one million of dollars, it is expected, has been effected in New Orleans. [N. Y. Gaz.]

FROM FLORIDA. The "News" published at St. Augustine, of the 13th inst contains the following:

About the 1st inst., gen. Taylor shipped 270 Indians, consisting of 65 warriors, women, children and negroes westward. The women were very reluctant to go, and upbraided the men with cowardice, refusing to die upon their native soil. The vessel departed amid their lamentations and taunts, and reproaches upon the conduct of their warriors.

Among the negroes, is Zabrana, well known as an interpreter, and a wily and treacherous rascal. By the steamer Gattel, capt. Poinsett, from the southern ports, we learn that the troops are all well. No demonstrations of hostility, since the affair of Manat—lieut. Mackall is rapidly recovering.

Gen. Taylor has secured the above amount of Indians with but little noise—and their shipment is the first intelligence received by us of even their capture.

The above Indians have arrived at Savannah, Geo., in charge of capt. Frater, who has authority to forward them to the west.

MORE INDIAN TROUBLES. The Mobile Journal slip of the 16th inst. says: "there are unpleasant rumors in town, of hostilities among the Indians west of the Mississippi. The Georgia Creeks, headed by McIntosh, are reported to be in arms, with the determination of making war upon another tribe, the Osages, we think; and some of the troops of the United States, have been despatched from fort Gibson to the scene of hostilities, with a view of preserving peace. These accounts are brought direct from that country, and though we do not know that they are to be implicitly relied upon, they are credited by those more familiar than we are with the scene of action."

SENECA INDIANS. New York, March 12. Several chiefs of their tribe headed by a venerable old warrior "Blacksmith" successor to Red Jacket, arrived in this city yesterday from Washington, at 12 o'clock were received by his honor the mayor in the governor's room at 12 o'clock. The mayor was addressed of by a chief named Jamieson in the Indian tongue, which was interpreted into elegant and flowing English by the int'preter, a graduate from Yale College. They stated that the object of their visit to Washington had been to urge upon the president, with whom they had had an interview, the impropriety of driving them from their lands, (such a proposition having been made by a senator from this state.) They produced documents signed by general Washington, guaranteeing protection to them and their rights. Also, papers signed by governor Clinton and other governors to the same effect. They iterated protestations of friendship for their white brethren, but spoke pretty positively about not long leaving their old hunting grounds.

The mayor made a suitable reply, and after partaking of some refreshments, they retired to their lodgings at the Western hotel in Cortlandt-street.

GRAT CARGO. The Mobile Journal states that the British ship England cleared from that port on the 16th, for Liverpool, with three thousand bales of cotton under deck. Her burden, custom house measure, is 827 tons; and she received her first cotton on the 7th instant. The total weight of cotton was 1,353,414 pounds, averaging more than 450 pounds to the bale, and costing $195,863. Her freight list is £4,165 6 4 sterling. [Balt. Amer.]

FREE BRIDGES. The act recently passed by the legislature of Pennsylvania, relative to the erection of free bridges over the Schuylkill, authorizes the commissioners of Philadelphia county, to erect a bridge across Schuylkill, at Mulberry (Arch) street, whenever individuals or corporations shall subscribe one third of its cost, and for the site of its abutments, conveyed in fee to the city of Philadelphia, for that purpose, may be received at fair valuation, as part of the subscription. The city when the bridge shall have been completed, is to be made the owner thereof, and it is to remain forever free of toll.

Section 2, makes the same provision for a free bridge at or near Callowhill street, by the same commissioners. The bridge, when finished, to be the property of the district of Spring Garden.

Sections 3 and 4, provides for obtaining the ground for abutments, and the manner for contracting builders.

Section 5, authorizes the county commissioners to purchase the permanent bridge for $50,000; provided one third of that sum shall be contributed by individuals and corporations. The bridge company to have the privilege of collecting tolls to the amount of $30,000, besides the $50,000 to be given by the county—or receiving that sum from some other source; The company, however, must make known its willingness to sell on or before the first of May, 1839. The property of the bridge to be conveyed to the mayor, aldermen and citizens of Philadelphia; and if so conveyed, then the bridge at Arch street is not to be built.

Section 6, authorizes the Permanent Bridge company, when they have sold their bridge, to sell the lots adjoining.

Section 7, authorizes the county commissioners, with the consent of the county board, to make arrangements with the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore rail road company, to free the bridge at Gray's ferry. The corporation of Moyamensing to look to the fulfillment of the covenant.

NAMES OF PLACES. The Boston Mercantile Journal has always manifested a proper indignation for the scandalous taste or rather want of taste, in naming places in this country, and the last number of that paper, after making some very sensible remarks upon the subject, makes the following enumeration of names, taken merely from a glance at the Index of Mitchell's map of the United States. It is a very choice assortment, to be sure, but exceedingly meagre and imperfect. Here it is:

Bean Blossom, Bloody Run, Boggs, Bono, Bon Pas, Funks town, Paint, 4 towns, Pumpkin town, Scuffle town, 2 towns, Trap, 4 towns, Whiskey Run, Sugar creek, 13 towns, Sugar Loaf, 3 towns, Plumb, 2 towns, Peepee, Bebble, Oil, Olive, 4 towns, Olive Green, One Leg, North East, 4 towns, Newtown, Moon, 6 towns, Modestown, Metal, Mary Ann, Mary Ellen, Logtown, Long-a-couning, Frogtown.

We could find fifty other names from memory quite as prettily and as poetical. Our contemporary must have overlooked Singtail, Shirt Tail Bend, Troublesome Old Iron Works, Hog's Calamity, Burst up, Blatherskite, Tumblebraght, Whiskeysokekania, Bumble Bee, Snakehampton, Blameyville, Chew Tobaccoer, Hot Potater town, Dumplingtona, &c. &c.

FROM EUROPE.

The following items of news were received by the Pocahontas whose arrival we noticed in the last "REGISTER."

House of lords, Feb. 28. It will be seen by the subjoined report of what took place this evening in the house of lords, that lord Glenelg has resigned his office of colonial secretary.

The lord chancellor announced to their lordships that the address of the house had been presented to her majesty, and that her majesty had been pleased to return the following gracious reply.

"My lords, I thank you for your loyal and dutiful address. Relying entirely upon your wisdom and patriotism, I can have no higher satisfaction than in finding myself supported by your agreement and concurrence."

Lord Glenelg begged to inform their lordships that he had sent in his resignation of the office he had the honor to hold, and that her majesty had been pleased to accept it. His motive for taking this step was, that some arrangements were about to be made to which he could not consent.

Canada Lord Durham begged to ask the noble viscount when he would lay the report and papers relating to Canada before the house. Lord Melbourne was totally at a loss to account for the state of appearance of the noble lord's report on the state of our North American colonies in a morning newspaper. He should lay the papers on the table of the house on Monday next.

House of commons, Feb. 8. Corn laws. Mr. Wallace presented a petition praying for a repeal of the corn laws. Petitions for the repeal, and against any alteration of the corn laws, were also presented by other honorable members.

Canada. In answer to a question from Mr. Leader, relating to Canada, lord John Russell said that he felt greatly astonished at lord Durham's report appearing in a morning paper. He hopes to be able to lay the report before the house on Friday.

Lord Durham's outfit. Col. Sibthorpe gave notice that on the 21st instant he should move for a return, and take the sense of the house upon it, of the expenses of lord Durham's outfit as governor general of Canada, and of the salaries received by himself and his officers.

Liverpool, Feb. 9. Cotton market. The market has been very steady, and fair amount of business going on throughout this week, which closes without alteration from last week's quotations of American cotton. The sales of the week amount to 20,700 bales, including 6,500 American and 450 Carthagian on speculation.

The corn market had rather improved. Sales of foreign and Irish wheat in some instances, were made at 1d. to 2d. per bushel above the rates that could have been obtained on Tuesday.

Money continues abundant both in the city and on the stock exchange. A reduction in funds has taken place in consequence of the agitation of the subject of the corn laws. Fears are entertained of acts leading to strong demonstrations on the part of the people in the manufacturing districts, by which the public tranquillity might be endangered.

Later news. The packet ship Siddons, captain Britton, has arrived at New York, and furnished the editors of the American with full files of English papers to the dates of Saturday, February 16th, from London, and Monday the 18th, from Liverpool. One of the topics of engrossing interest in the political circles, is the report and correspondence of lord Durham, on Canadian affairs. Some changes in the cabinet have taken place; others are rumored.

The marquis of Normandy, the lord lieutenant of Ireland, has accepted the post of colonial secretary, in the place of Lord Glenelg. Lord Clarendon is named as likely to succeed him as viceroy. It is also said that sir George Grey quits the under secretaryship for the colonies, and that Mr. George Buller takes his place. This is thought an indication that lord Durham's Canadian policy will be received into favor.

Lord Durham's report has alarmed and provoked the tory lords. It was laid on their table by lord Melbourne on Monday; and immediately a battery was opened upon the reporter by lords Wharcliffe, Wicklow and Westmeath. With perfect composure lord Durham received and repelled the attacks. He was baited, but his assailants were gored. He offered himself, he said, to their personalities; but when these things should at last be exhausted an come to an end, he begged that attention might be length be turned to the "great and important question, and the mighty interests involved in it, with out any admixture of low, petty and personal feelings."

Cotton had fallen very slightly, in some instances. There had been a run upon the Cork banks, particularly upon the National bank, O'Connell's Applications have been made to relieve turpentine companies, and to take off the tax on post bills. The rail roads have almost ruined all concerned. This property. A man must now travel two hours three hundred miles a day, or not at all. A turpentine income of £2000, had been cut down to 400. A report was current in London, that the bar of the United States, of Pennsylvania, had been speculating largely in cotton in South America, 60,000, worth is said to have been insured, on assignments, to Humphreys & Biddle, at Liverpool. In the East Indies, also, the same operations a said to be going on.

In the house of lords, on the 15th of February a motion was made to inquire into the present state of the navy of England. Lords Hardwicke a Minto asserted that French ships were better built than their own. Numerous petitions are presented in support of the existing corn laws.

The duke of Buckingham, with a deputation of land owners and farmers, waited on lord Melbourne on Thursday, to ascertain his lordship's intention with regard to the corn laws. According to Morning Herald, lord Melbourne stated that he was decidedly opposed to any changes unless the benefit should be satisfactorily proved; and that had not seen any thing to cause him to change opinion on the subject of the present corn law which he had expressed in his place in parliament in last July.

London, February 16. The funds presented a firmer appearance to-day, with a slight improvement in the quotations. Consols were 92 3/4 7-8 for money and the account. Bank stock, 1-2; India stock, 253 1-2 to 4 1-2; exchange bills, 63s to 65s; India bonds, 61s to 63s premium. Railway shares remain without material variation.

February 16, (evening). The stock market looking firm again this morning, and a fair busin has been done. Consols for the account have gained 92 7-8 to 93, and for money 92 3-4 93.

Accounts from India mention, that lord Arland had had an interview with Runjeet Singh; adheres firmly to the English alliance. Orders were sent to Madras from Calcutta to employ large force for Burmah. It was rumored that rulers of Scinde were preparing to oppose the press of the British troops towards Affghanistan. Sir Henry Fane had retired from the chief command of the forces in India. [Spectator]

From France. By the packet ship Ville de I. captain Stoddard, the editors of the American received Paris papers also to the 16th of February. The stock market has been very brisk on the 15th, and French securities much in demand. F had advanced 25c for cash. Belgian three and Belgian fives are unvaried. Bank of Belgium still no quotation.

An article in a Roven paper states, that let put in the post by Guizot, and other members the opposition, had not found their destination that other letters had their seals broken. They declared a calumny.

Marshal Yaley was said to have arrived at London, on his way to assume the functions of minister of war.

The Journal du Havre contains a letter from minister of public works to the French chamber of commerce, which states, that information had received from admiral Bandin, of the fitting of privateers by the Americans. The minister of privateers will take measures for the protection of French commerce by the organization of privateers, to protect trade between France and America. Letters received in England mention accounts from the Havana stated that seamen, and their masters and crews, formerly employed in the slave trade were about to be employed as privateers with Mexican letters of marque.

Captain Casey, commander of the Hercule in our country, has been promoted to the rank of admiral.

The Brussels papers of the 14th contain accounts of the forwarding of ammunition and military stores to the army, but state that peace is not likely to be interrupted.

It is said that the withdrawal of the Austrian Prussian ministers from Brussels, on account of promotion of Skrzynecki, was not approved of by the other ministers resident. A letter from Anwerp says, that the Dutch have increased the number of gun-boats at the mouth of the Scheldt.

The average price of wheat in the Belgian markets, has fallen from 24fr. 39c. to 24fr. 15c. per ectolitre. The supply continues abundant.

The Belgian journals of the 13th stated, most of them, that king Leopold, had sent orders to M. Van Weyer to sign the treaty of London on the 15th latest, after having struggled as far as possible to meliorate the conditions relative to the Scheldt. The Belgian diplomatist signs on the 15th, there will be just time for the treaty to arrive in Brussels on the day spoken of for the re-opening of the hamber. The activity of the Belgian Bourse was according to the Commerce Belge unexampled.

A letter from the Hague, February 12, states that our government, as well as that at Brussels, has received a note from Great Britain, in which it is intimated that in order to prevent any encounters between the Dutch and Belgian troops, it is desirable that the military forces on both sides should make a retrograde movement. To this it has been replied that even before the receipt of this note the Dutch troops had withdrawn to a considerable distance from the Belgian frontier.

The village of Simplan was visited with a storm on the 21st January, which unroofed houses, tore pines by the roots, and set the church bells a ringing.

Spain. The London Times of the 16th states that they had received Madrid journals and letters of the 7th instant.

The Chamber of deputies was occupied on that day with the charge of pecculation brought by general Seoane against count Torono.

The Eco del Comercio states that the government contemplated taking away the horses of the cavalry artillery of the national guard of Madrid, for the use of the army.

The Carlist captain Nabaze, one of the Currier's lieutenants, in Castile, had been made prisoner at Roa, with several of his men.

Advices from Bayonne of the 11th instant state, that the belligerent parties in the north of the peninsula appeared to be preparing for the spring campaign.

Madrid papers of the 8th state that it was feared the tariff question would be discussed with England for a long time. The British ambassador was not eased with the delay. General Narvaez was still at Gibraltar. He justifies his flight to that asylum, stating that justice was not to be had in Spain. Lasquez Povadira, a Carlist chief, had been executed by virtue of a special order from Madrid. On Carlos and his court arrived on the 7th at Segura. He is about making a tour of inspection through the north of Spain.

LETTER FROM THE POSTMASTER GENERAL.

From the Intelligencer of the 21st inst.

We mentioned, in our paper of Tuesday last, the reception of a letter by the editors from the postmaster general, the essential points of which we briefly stated, declining to publish the letter entire, for reasons which were sufficient for our own government.

In the course of the day of that publication, we received from the postmaster general a note, requesting the return to him of his communication, on the ground of our having declined permitting him to reply through our columns to "gross misrepresentations affecting his public conduct" promulgated through those columns.

We complied with the request of the postmaster general by returning to him forthwith his communication, informing him that we had declined publishing it because it contained gross, and, in our opinion, unmerited reflections on a committee of the house of representatives, and on members of that body individually; and stating that, so far from refusing him an opportunity to defend himself, we had extracted and published all that part of his letter which was purely defensive.

We supposed that our correspondence with the postmaster general had here closed. We received from him, however, the same evening, another letter, to the effect that, learning from our note of that date that we did not refuse to let him defend himself through our paper, and not deeming the defence made by the few extracts from his letter adequate to the occasion, he had "carefully struck out of that letter all that appeared, by any construction, however enlarged, to come within the scope of our objections," and so returned it to us in the hope that it might find admission into our columns.

Finding that, in fact, the most exceptionable parts of the letter have been stricken out, our objections to the insertion in our columns are so far obliterated, that we yield to the request of the postmaster general, and give to his letter the place it occupies in our paper of to-day.

To the editors of the National Intelligencer:

GENTLEMEN: The sketch of a debate in the house of representatives, on the 28th of February last, reported in your paper of the 16th inst. contains misrepresentations affecting my public character, which I ask the privilege of correcting through the same columns which had given them circulation.

The following extract contains the allegations referred to, viz:

Mr. Graves would state for the benefit of the gentlemen from New York (Mr. Bronson) another fact, going to show what use was made of these office-holders, and of what sort of material they were sometimes composed. A man by the name of Smith, who had fled from Bristol county jail, in Massachusetts, under indictment as a counterfeiter, came into the state of New York, and was appointed postmaster at a town in the district belonging to a member of this house (Mr. Foster). The character of the man was so bad, and his felony so notorious, that whenever counterfeit money was circulated in that neighborhood, public suspicion was always attracted towards the postmaster as having had some hand in the business. These facts had been fully represented to the head of the post office department, but, because he was an active and determined partisan, every effort to remove him had been unsuccessful.

Mr. Graves presumed, as a matter of course, that he had been appointed by the late or the present administration. The appointment had been made three or four years ago, and Mr. G. had quoted it, as an instance, to show that men were not appointed for their merit, their good character, or their capacity to discharge the duties of the office; but that the "most infamous scamps" were appointed and retained, if they could subserve the political purposes of party.

Mr. Briggs. I ask the gentlemen from New York whether he denies the truth of the statement? If he does, I call upon my colleague over the way to state the facts, and to show that the department does know the character of this man, has been fully informed of the facts, and still keeps him in office. A wretch who was guilty of forgery and counterfeiting, and who escaped the fangs of the law only by turning state's evidence.

Here are two serious charges:

1. That I retain in office as postmaster "a wretch who was guilty of forgery and counterfeiting, and who escaped the fangs of the law only by turning state's evidence," although I have been "fully informed of the facts," and "knew the character of the man."

2. That my reason for retaining such a villain is, that he is "an active and determined partisan."

These charges appear to have been made on the 28th day of February last. Lucius D. Smith, postmaster at New London, Oneida county, New York, the individual referred to, was removed from office on the 21st day of January last, and the appointment of his successor was officially announced in the Globe on the first of February last. He had, therefore, been removed more than a month when these charges were uttered on the floor of the house. This Messrs. Graves and Briggs had the means of knowing as well by the official publication as by asking a single question at the department.

Moreover, this man was removed upon the instant on the first presentation of the case to me. This also Messrs. Graves and Briggs might have ascertained.

The origin of the charge is probably this:

In December, 1836, the files of the appointment office were destroyed by the fire which consumed the post office building. On those files were probably papers then recently received, giving the character of Smith, and their destruction saved him from removal at that time. Mr. Graves had probably heard of those papers, and uttered the injurious charges which have now found their way to the public without inquiring into their truth.

Mr. Graves says that Smith was not removed, because he was "an active and determined partisan." If Mr. Graves knows this man's politics, he knows more than I do. They do not appear in the case, and, it is believed, never did. His office yielded him not more than $60 per annum. If this sum paid him for taking care of the office and for political services also, they were cheap, indeed! Their importance may be appreciated from the fact that Mr. Grant, one of the representatives from the district in which he lived, knew nothing of him or his case.

Mr. Graves says "the character of the man was so bad, and his felony so notorious, that whenever counterfeit money was circulated in that neighborhood, public suspicion was always directed to the postmaster as having some hand in the business." And does any man really believe the administration expected to gain strength in that neighborhood keeping such a man in office? When counterfeiters of money become favorites with the people, then may the uncharitable conclude that they will be protected in office by the administration.

Equally baseless is the charge or insinuation from the same source that the clerks or any others holding office in or under the post office department are taxed for political purposes, as the condition on which they are permitted to remain in office. So far as regards myself, I had said, so far as regards those acting under me, I believe, that no suggestion of such a contribution, voluntary or involuntary, has been made by a superior to an inferior, directly or indirectly, throughout the vast ramifications of this department. AMOS KENDALL.

Post office department, March 18, 1839.

NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY.

The following is the message of governor Fairfield alluded to in the last "REGISTER."
GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE.

Augusta, Tuesday, March 12.

This day, at eleven o'clock, the governor communicated the following message to the legislature.
To the senate in open session.

I herewith lay before you certain documents that have been transmitted to me by the hon. John Forsyth, secretary of state, to wit: Message of the president of the United States, transmitted to congress on the 26th of February—letter from Mr. Fox, the British minister, to Mr. Forsyth, under date of 23d of the same month—and the reply of the latter on the 25th—letter of Mr. Fox to Mr. Forsyth of the 25th ultimo—memorandum of an agreement between Mr. Fox and Mr. Forsyth of the same date—and two letters from Mr. Forsyth to the governor of this state, under dates of 23d and 27th ultimo.

By the agreement referred to, it will be perceived, that Mr. Fox and Forsyth, without claiming to act with authority, have recommended that "the majesty's forces will not seek to exert by military force the annual duty which has been sent by Maine into the district bordering on the Aroostook river; but the government of Maine will voluntarily, and without unnecessary delay, withdraw beyond the bounds of the disputed territory any armed force now within that and that it future necessity should arise for dispersing notorious trespassers, or protecting public property from depredations by armed force, the operation shall be conducted by concert, jointly or separately, according to agreement between the governments of Maine and New Brunswick." This, it is said, is recommended to the governments of Maine and New Brunswick, "to regulate their future proceedings according to the terms hereinbefore set forth, until the final settlement of the territorial dispute, or until the governments of the United States and Great Britain shall come to some definite conclusion on the subordinate points upon which they are now at issue;" to wit: the right of temporary jurisdiction and possession of the disputed territory.

The important question now presented, is whether the state of Maine will assent to the agreement or not. Deeming it a question beyond my legitimate province to decide, I communicate the papers relating to it, and ask for instructive views; with a determination, so far as I may be able, to carry into effect, your decision, whatever it may be.

As I do not wish, however, to shun any portion of the responsibility fairly devolving upon me, I will proceed, as briefly as I can, to give my opinion in the case presented, and the reasons upon which it is founded.

Should we then, in accordance with the agreement, withdraw our forces from the disputed territory, and leave all future operations against trespassers, and conducted by concert and agreement with the provincial government?

In determining this question, your attention will naturally be directed to the original design and object of the movement on your part—the extent to which that object has been accomplished—your constitutional power and right to adopt the course hitherto pursued—and the expediency of continuing to exercise that right.

The object in the first place, was, to protect public property. The territory bordering upon the Aroostook river, in many respects the fairest portion of Maine, particularly in the noble forests of timber, and in the extraordinary fertility of soil, has long been the scene of very extensive and warlike depredations, principally on the part of persons resident in, or not inhabitants of the province of New Brunswick. The circumstances in regard to the extraordinary depredations committed this winter, by a band of armed and desperate men—the course you took to arrest them—the seizure and imprisonment of the land agent and his assistants—I need not detail, as they are already familiar to you. This proceeding on your part, was denounced by the lieutenant governor of New Brunswick, as an invasion of that province and a military and forcible expulsion of our agents and agents, as well as immediately retired. Instead, however, of permitting them to retire, you sent what was deemed necessary military force to sustain them, and also to prevent any invasion of our soil that should be attempted. This I believe to be a succinct and unvarnished statement of your object, and the method pursued to effect it. Has that object been accomplished? If I have a right apprehension of the facts, I must say in part only. It is true the trespassers are dispersed, but they have given out that as soon as our force is removed they will return, throw the timber already cut into the streams, and run it down to the St. Johns. This can undoubtedly be accomplished by them, without the utmost vigilance and activity on our part. It is true, also, that the lieutenant governor of New Brunswick proposes to swing a boom across the mouth of the Aroostook, to seize the timber there, sell it, and place the proceeds in the "disputed territory fund." But without intending disrespect to the government of the province, may it not well be doubted, whether Maine would ever realize any thing from such a procedure? Would not the debts in the disputed territory account always exceed the credits? Would not the tracks about this "fund," so far as we are concerned, like those about the lion's cave, be all one way? Be that as it may, Maine is capable of superintending her own affairs, and ought not to impose that duty on a neighboring province.

Before answering the main question, however, let us inquire still further as to the legality and propriety of our proceeding this far.

My respect to you, will not permit me to go into an elaborate argument to show our clear and unquestionable right and title to the territory embraced within the line, running from the source of the St. Croix north to the highlands dividing the waters that flow into the Atlantic ocean from those which fall into the river St. Lawrence—thence along the highlands to the northwest corner of the said province, and thence to the mouth of the said river. At the last session of congress the senate of the United States adopted unanimously the following resolution, viz:—

"Resolved, That after a careful examination and elaborate consideration of the whole controversy between the United States and Great Britain, relative to the northeastern boundary of the former, the senate does not entertain a doubt of the entire practicability of running and marking that boundary, in strict conformity with the stipulations of the definitive treaty of peace of 1763; and it entertains a perfect conviction of the justice and validity of the title of the United States to the full extent of all the territory in dispute between the two powers."

The same resolve was, on a subsequent day, taken up in the house of representatives, and unanimously adopted by that body. It need say no more upon the subject of title, especially to you, with whom the whole subject is perfectly familiar.

Then as to the right of jurisdiction and possession, while this preposterous claim of Great Britain remains unsettled—is it to the British government by virtue of an agreement as has been alleged by the lieutenant governor of New Brunswick, and reiterated by Mr. Fox at Washington, or is it not? The president in his message to congress on the 26th of February after alluding to the allegation of Mr. Fox says: "The important bearing which such an agreement, if it existed, would have upon the condition and interest of the parties, and the influence it might have upon the adjustment of the dispute, are too obvious to allow the error upon which this assumption seems to rest, to pass for a moment without correction." In alluding to the correspondence between the governments upon this subject, he says further—"instead of sustaining this assumption of the British functionaries, that correspondence disproves the existence of any such agreement."

Mr. Forsyth, secretary of state, to a letter of Mr. Fox, in which this alleged agreement was again put forth, under date of the 24th ultimo says, so far from any relinquishment of the right of jurisdiction having been made, or any agreement of her expressed or implied, entered into on the part of the government of the United States, of the nature alleged by the lieutenant governor of New Brunswick, and affirmed also in your note of the 23d inst., it will appear from the whole course of the correspondence between the two governments extending through a series of years, that that of the United States has throughout and on frequent occasions, solemnly protested as well against the existence of the right to the exclusive possession and jurisdiction as to the exercise thereof, and has upon every proper occasion asserted that both belonged to Maine and the United States.

This would seem to be enough to settle this question, and to forever. No such agreement has ever been made. On the contrary, the right of possession and jurisdiction, has always been and is now asserted by the general government, to be in Maine. But if it had been otherwise, and the government of the U. S. should have agreed that the British government should have exclusive jurisdiction and possession of this territory, which it acknowledges to be ours, would it have been binding upon Maine? Clearly not. The respective states of the union are sovereign and independent, except so far as that sovereignty has been restrained or modified by the constitution of the United States. The general government is one of limited and defined powers. The power to alienate the territory of a state, or to transfer a portion of it, or the jurisdiction and possession of it to a foreign power, for an indefinite period, or for one hour, is no where granted. An assumption, of such a power on the part of the general government, it is believed, would always meet the stern and uncompromising opposition of this state.

But without intending probably to assert any such power, it seems there has been an understanding between the general government and that of Great Britain, amounting perhaps, on our side, to a recommendation to the state of Maine, rather than to a contract by which she would be conclusively bound. What are the terms of that understanding? which has been the public source of so much misunderstanding? Clearly these and no more; that, during the pendency of the question, the two parties should exercise jurisdiction as they had respectively been accustomed to exercise it. Now over the territory south of the St. John, especially that part of it watered by the Aroostook and its tributary streams, Massachusetts and Maine have always had possession and exercised jurisdiction. As early as 1793, a large tract, say 2,000,000 of acres, were surveyed and located by agents of Massachusetts under a large and contemplated grant to Jackson & Flint. This tract embraced a large part of the Aroostook territory, and extended to the river St. John. For some reason or other, believed to be the inability of the purchasers to pay the consideration, no grant was ever actually made on both sides of the Aroostook were made by Massachusetts to the town of Plymouth and general Eaton, which have ever since been held by them and their grantees. Soon after the cession of Maine and Massachusetts, these lands extending nearly to the St. John, on the south, were surveyed, and some of them divided and held severally by the two states.

For several years, commencing as early as 1821, agents were sent to the Aroostook by the governor of Maine, for the purpose of arresting trespassers upon the public lands. In 1821, Benjamin J. Porter, esq. was sent to that territory by governor King, for this purpose. Mr. Porter took the city of St. Johns and Frederickton in his way, and consulted with Mr. Attorney General Wetmore upon the subject of punishing British subjects for that intrusion upon our territory. The attorney general said "the government of New Brunswick would unquestionably render every possible facility to punish the offenders, as they had enforced greatly in that province, (N. B.) by sealless pillages. This is the language of Mr. Porter, taken from his report, made July, 1821, and now on file in the office of the secretary of state. Mr. Porter proceeded to the scene of depredation upon the Aroostook, broke up the trespassing and compelled those engaged in it to settle with him, giving their notes for the amount of damage due. These notes were left with an attorney at Woodstock, and were collected by suits prosecuted in the provincial courts.

Similar agencies with similar results, I understand, have frequently been instituted by this government. Massachusetts has long been in the habit of granting permits to cut timber upon her townships on this stream, and though with the knowledge of the provincial government, without any attempt on the part of the latter to forbid or prevent it, so far as an info made. Mr. Fox has for several years been sending large sums of money in making a road through the territory, and has sold and conveyed portions of this same territory to actual settlers, without anticipating or receiving any opposition on the part of the provincial government. I am also credibly informed that claims in favor of the inhabitants of the province, against settlers upon the Aroostook, are prosecuted by the creditors in the courts of Maine. These facts, with others that might be named, go to show that the jurisdiction and possession of this territory, is not, and never has been in New Brunswick, but, so far as the unsettled condition of a portion of the country would permit, in Maine and Massachusetts. Upon this point I am happy also to be able to add a very apposite quotation from a letter from Mr. Van Buren, while secretary of state in 1829, to sir Charles Vancouver. He says—"the undersigned cannot acquiesce in the supposition that, because the agent of his Britannic majesty thought proper, in the proceedings before the commissioners to lay claim to all that portion of the state of Maine which lies north of a line running westerly from Mars Hill, and designated as the limit or boundary of the British claim, thereby the United States or the state of Maine, ceased to have jurisdiction in the territory thus claimed. In the view of his government, his Britannic majesty's agent might, with equal justice have extended his claim to any other ter-

p. if it ever... and also... be attending... This I believe to be a succinct and unvarnished statement of your object, and the method pursued to disputed part of the state, as to claim the portion of it which he has drawn in question; and in such case, the lieutenant-governor of New Brunswick could surely not have considered a continuance on the part of the United States, and of the state of Maine, to exercise their accustomed jurisdiction and authority, to be an encroachment. It so, in what light are we to regard the continued acts of jurisdiction now exercised by him in the Madawaska settlement? More than twenty years ago large tracts of land lying westward of Mars Hill, and northward to the river R-stook, were granted by the state of Massachusetts, which tracts are held and possessed under the same grants to this day; and the United States and the state of Massachusetts and Maine, in succession, have never ceased to exercise their jurisdiction, which the unsettled condition of the country in that region, and other circumstances admitted and required."

Surely there can be no need of multiplying words upon this point. If the British government have any jurisdiction over this portion of our territory, it may "with equal justice" claim to have it over the county of Kennebec. But why should we be compelled to resort to facts of this description to prove our jurisdiction? If the title be in Maine, the jurisdiction follows of course. No power can have a right of jurisdiction over a territory belonging to the state of Maine, and nothing but that extreme spirit of peace and forbearance by which Maine has been so long actuated, could induce her to argue such a point for its ownment.

If then, the title, possession, and jurisdiction of Maine be nearly established, why is she not justified in her present attempts to protect the province of New Brunswick from plunder, and the soil itself against invasion? It is hard to believe that any man can be found—any American should say—of uncorrupted patriotism, and whose mind is not poisoned by prejudice, who will deny it.

On this point the president says: "The state of Maine had a right to arrest the deprivations contained in; it belongs to her to judge of the exigency of the occasion calling for her interference."

The able report of the committee of foreign relations, in the house of representatives at Washington, says: "Every government in the union has a right to regulate the lusted interest, whether public or private, within its limits, and Maine stands upon the same footing, unless as to such parts of it as are deemed not to be under its jurisdiction by the exercise of the constitutional powers of the federal government." But, as has already been observed, no proceeding or agreement of the federal government can be found which did not recognise an actual jurisdiction, just such as that now claimed and enforced by Maine." Again it says: "The proclamation of the lieutenant-governor of New Brunswick was issued before any steps were taken by Maine to sustain the civil by the military power, and was directed against the interference of the ministerial offices of the law, acting in strict conformity with what are believed to be fundamental principles of British as well as American law. The first appeal to military force was made by him, and the subsequent proceedings of Maine were defensive merely."

But I need not quote particular expressions. The whole report is a lucid and forcible exposition of the injustice of the proceedings of the government of New Brunswick, and a triumphant vindication of the rights reserved by Maine. The almost unanimous vote of the house of representatives upon the bill reported by the same committee, intending to carry out the views expressed in the report—the unanimous vote of the senate upon the same bill, also furnish to Maine the most conclusive and gratifying proof of the rectitude of her course. In accordance with all this, I take pleasure in saying, has been the general voice of the American press. Such unanimity of opinion and feeling among the mass of the people—such a spirit of enthusiasm prevailing in all classes of society, it is apprehended has seldom been witnessed. Nothing could be more gratifying to Maine, and sure I am, that it will constitute a perpetual source of grateful recollection to her virtuous and intelligent sons.

Under these circumstances, the question recurs, Under what circumstances, and upon what authority, shall we withdraw our forces against him? The commendation contained in the memoranda signed by Mr. Fox and the secretary of state, and leave the future protection of the timber to the concurrent action and agreement of the governments of Maine and New Brunswick? Under a full sense of the responsibility resting upon me, I have no hesitation in saying that we do not. I admit that the general government has nobly responded to our call, and with a promptness and efficiency beyond all praise, has made preparations to discharge its constitutional obligations to this state. Much is due from us on this account to the union. But the duty of Maine to herself remains unchanged. The property, for the protection of which we sent an armed posse, under the land agent and sheriff, remains still exposed, and the threat of expulsion from the territory and of invasion, which we sent our military force to repel, still remains pending over us, while British troops, it is understood, are daily concentrating near the line with the apparent purpose of carrying the avowed design of the lieutenant-governor of New Brunswick, into effect.

But, looking a little more minutely at the terms of this agreement, the objections to it are obvious. In the first place, it would make our movement upon the question of the boundary a retrograde movement. Instead of having made any advance toward the acquisition of our rights, and termination of the question in dispute, our position would not really be so favorable as it was before the occurrence of those events which have induced this "memorandum." Then we had exclusive jurisdiction over this portion of the territory. Under the agreement we should only have a concurrent jurisdiction with the province of New Brunswick, for we could not expel a night-trespasser without in the first place agreeing with the provincial government as to the manner of doing it. Its language is thus: "And if future necessity should arise for dispersing notorious trespassers, or protecting public property from depredation by armed force, the operation shall be conducted by concert, jointly or separately, according to agreements between the governments of Maine and New Brunswick."

Again this agreement is inadmissible, because of the irregularity of its terms. By it Maine is absolutely to withdraw her forces. But are the forces of the British government also to be withdrawn? Not at all. That government is simply to refrain from attempting to do what it never had the right or power of doing, that of expelling us from the territory. It is understood that a regiment of British troops, lately arrived from Quebec, is now at Madawaska, and there they may remain for ought to the contrary in the terms of the agreement, erect fortifications to their hearts' content, and exercise any power they please short of attempting to expel us from the territory.

Another objection to this agreement arises from its equivocal phraseology upon one point which might prove to be hereafter the source of much misunderstanding and difficulty. One of them is in regard to whether the armed posse under the land agent and sheriff is included in the "armed force" by the "memorandum" to be withdrawn from the territory. If the agreement should be construed against us, in this respect, we could not hereafter expel a single trespasser unless the governor of New Brunswick should kindly agree with us upon some mode in which it might be effected. To such an arrangement I trust Maine will never assent. She has been sufficiently trammelled heretofore in the exercise of her rights, and will not now voluntarily force new shackles for herself.

What, then, shall be done? The people of the state surely are not desirous of hurrying the two nations into a war. Such an event is anxiously to be avoided if it can be without dishonor. We owe too much to the union, to ourselves, and, above all, to the spirit and principles of christianity, to bring about a conflict of arms with a nation having with us a common origin, speaking a common language, and bound to us by so many ties of common interest without us by the most honorable necessity. Un-der these circumstances, I would recommend that, when we are fully satisfied, either by the declarations of the lieutenant-governor of the province of New Brunswick, or otherwise, that he has abandoned all idea of occupying the disputed territory with a military force, and of attempting an expulsion of our party, that then the governor be authorised to withdraw our military force, leaving the land agent with a sufficient posse, armed or unarmed, as the case may require, sufficient to carry into effect your original design, that of driving out or arresting the trespassers, and preserving and protecting the timber from their depredations.

From such an act of jurisdiction—an attempt so right and proper in itself as this, and so imperatively called for by the circumstances of the case, we should not be driven by any power on earth. We ought not, however, wantonly to do more than is necessary. We want no military force in the territory, if there be no military force against us. Brave men would not battle with the air. We do want, however, as much as we can, armed or unarmed, as the case may require, to resist the marauders and protect the timber; and we want no more. In pursuing this course, will we maintain our just and honorable position, we do nothing which our sister states can regard as unnecessarily provoking hostilities, and nothing which our provincial neighbors can view as indicating a hostile or even illiberal feeling.

These are my views, briefly and imperfectly expressed. Whether they coincide with your own or not, I repeat my determination to obey, so far as I may be able, whatever instructions you may be pleased to give.

JOHN FAIRFIELD,
Council chamber, March 12, 1839.

NOTE. Since the foregoing message was prepared, I have received a note from sir John Harvey, a copy of which is herewith communicated. From the spirit manifested, I shall entertain the hope that he will take such a course as will enable Maine to pursue that indicated in the foregoing.

WAR PROCEEDINGS IN NOVA SCOTIA.

Legislative council chamber, 26th Feb. 1839.

On motion of the hon. Mr. Stewart, Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and report such resolutions and other measures, as it may be proper to adopt in consequence of the invasion of the province of New Brunswick, by an armed force from the state of Maine.

Ordered, That Mr. Stewart, Mr. Ratchford, Mr. Wilkins, Mr. Campbell and Mr. Almon, be a committee to prepare the said resolutions.

Legislative council chamber, Feb. 27, 1839.

The committee appointed under the resolution passed yesterday, reported a series of resolutions, whereupon, on motion of the honorable Mr. Stewart, the following resolutions were unanimously passed:

Whereas, it appears to this house, that, under the pretence of removing trespassers, a forcible brood has been made by the authority of the state of Maine, upon that part of the province of New Brunswick which is claimed by the United States, but of which the exclusive possession and jurisdiction have ever been in Great Britain; and that the government of the said state has adopted measures to levy an armed force, and to raise a large sum of money, with the avowed object of committing further outrages upon the sovereignty and dominion of her majesty; And, whereas, as by agreement between the imperial government and that of the United States, Great Britain is to remain in such exclusive possession and jurisdiction, until the right thereto shall be determined, and negotiations are now pending for the amicable adjustment and determination of the said claim.

Resolved, unanimously, That this house regards with the deepest indignation, the said and unprompted attempt to wrest, by violence, the said possession and jurisdiction from our empire, distinguished as such by its justice, as by its power and greatness, and this house condemns as utterly unworthy and frivolous, the pretence by which the said state attempts to vindicate its extraordinary and most unjustifiable proceedings.

Resolved, unanimously, That these measures, if persisted in, may bring a destructive and unnatural war and its attendant horrors upon the people of two nations, whose common origin, language, and interest, render every well disposed inhabitant of both countries anxious to preserve uninterrupted the peace and friendly intercourse which have for a long period so happily existed.

Resolved, unanimously, With humble reliance upon Divine Providence, and looking for protection and assistance to the parent state, this colony will use its utmost endeavor to vindicate the sovereignty and defend the rights of Great Britain, whenever they may be assailed. And our fellow subjects in the sister colony may confidently rely that the people of Nova Scotia will, to the utmost of their power and ability, aid them in resisting every attempt to take forcible possession of a territory, the custody and safe-keeping whereof have been entrusted to them by their sovereign, until she shall have commanded them to surrender it.

Resolved, unanimously, That this house will cordially unite with the other branches of the legislature, in devising such measures as may be requisite to adopt in the present emergency to vindicate the sovereignty and integrity of the empire.

Resolved, unanimously, That a humble address be presented to his excellency the lieutenant-governor with these resolutions, praying that he will take such steps as he may think fit, to make known the sentiments of this house, and of the people of this province, to the government and the brave and loyal people of New Brunswick.

At five o'clock this day the president and members of the legislative council waited on his excellency the lieutenant-governor with the following address.

The humble address of the legislative council:

To his excellency lieutenant general sir Collin Campbell, K. C. B. lieutenant-governor and commander-in-chief, in and over the province of Nova Scotia, and its dependencies.

May it please your excellency—The legislative council have passed the accompanying resolutions, upon the subject of the recent outrages which have been committed upon that part of the province of New Brunswick claimed by the state of Maine, and the legislative council humbly pray your excellency to transmit them to the right honorable the secretary of state for the colonies, to be laid at the foot of the throne—and the legislative council further pray your excellency to transmit copies thereof to his excellency the governor-in-chief, and to his excellency sir John Harvey, the lieutenant governor of New Brunswick.

His excellency's reply.

Mr. President and honorable gentlemen of the legislative council

The sentiments and expression contained in these firm and spirited resolutions are most gratifying and acceptable to me.

You designate the unprovoked conduct of the authorities of Maine in its true colors, as being utterly unworthy and frivolous in endeavoring to vindicate its unjustifiable proceedings, by attempting to wrest from a neighboring state, during a period of peace, the custody of a territory with which they had been intrusted by their sovereign.

It is most gratifying to me to find that a feeling of entire unanimity prevades the legislature and people of this province, to assist in resisting, to the utmost, any aggression that may be attempted upon New Brunswick, and you may be assured that the parent state will afford you every aid and support.

I shall have great pleasure in transmitting to the right honorable the secretary of state, to be laid at the foot of the throne, sentiments so honorable from so highly respectable a body, and I shall not fail to communicate these resolutions to his excellency the governor general of British North America, and to his excellency sir John Harvey.

C. CAMPBELL.

Government house, 27th Feb. 1839.

RESOLVES OF THE ASSEMBLY.

Resolved, unanimously, That in consequence of information this day received from New Brunswick, of the proceedings on the part of the state of Maine, involving a proposed invasion of the neighboring province, this house deems it necessary to suspend all other business at present, in order to concert such measures as may be necessary to prepare for joining in repelling any such invasion, and defending the just rights of the neighboring province, as well as our own.

Resolved, That Messrs. Howe, Young, Doyle, Des Barres and Forrester, be added to the committee on the military defence of the province—that the committee wait upon his excellency the lieutenant governor, to request his excellency to furnish any information he may have received from New Brunswick.

1. Resolved, unanimously, That one-third of the militia force of the province between the ages of 15 and 45, be drafted by direction of his excellency, the lieutenant governor, and officered for active service, to the extent of eight thousand men.

Resolved, unanimously, That his excellency the lieutenant governor be authorized to require every regiment or battalion to select two hundred volunteers for every six hundred men, rank and file between the ages of 18 and 45, or in the like proportion for a greater or less number.

3. Resolved, unanimously, If a sufficient number of men in each regiment or battalion do not volunteer, that his excellency be authorized to fill up the number from the draft of such regiment, agreeably to law.

4. Resolved, unanimously, That such lists of men who shall have volunteered, or been drafted as aforesaid, when returned and approved by his excellency the commander-in-chief, or such person as he shall appoint for the purpose, shall be considered the lists of men liable to be first called on for actual service.

5. Resolved unanimously, That the lieutenant governor be authorized to appoint officers, to command such drafts or bodies of volunteers, for the regiment or battalion to which such drafts or volunteers may belong, or make such other arrangement, as may secure efficient officers to command such drafts or volunteers.

6. Resolved, unanimously, That his excellency the lieutenant governor be authorized to call into actual service, so many and such of the said drafts, or bodies of volunteers, as he may deem proper, and to make the necessary regulations for consolidating any number of such drafts or bodies into a regiment or regiments, as may be requisite and necessary, and to appoint lieutenants, adjutants and staff to each such regiment, in order to render the same efficient for actual service.

7. Resolved, unanimously, That his excellency the lieutenant governor be authorized to order any such drafts or volunteers, when required for actual service, into barracks, and to march them from one part of the province to another, as the exigency of the service may require, and beyond the frontier of this province, when necessary.

8. Resolved, unanimously, That his excellency the lieutenant governor be authorized to accept the service of any volunteer companies now formed, or which may be formed in this province, and to consolidate them into regiments or battalions, and to appoint officers for the same, and to take such measures generally as may be requisite to render, such battalions, regiments, or companies efficient for actual service; Provided, that such volunteer companies be willing to volunteer for service either in this province or in the adjoining province of New Brunswick.

9. Resolved, unanimously, That all non-commissioned officers and private soldiers, called into actual service, over and above the pay and allowance provided by her majesty, shall be entitled to additional pay from the treasury of the province.

10. Resolved, unanimously, That this house will make suitable provision, for the widows and orphans of such officers, non-commissioned officers, and rank and file, who may fall in actual service.

11. Resolved, unanimously, That his excellency the lieutenant governor be requested to direct an immediate enrolment to be made of the whole militia force of the province, between sixteen and sixty years of age, and to have the same divided into classes agreeably to law, and to have full and accurate returns made forthwith to the office of the adjutant general of militia, of such enrolment, and of the state, condition and efficiency of the arms, and of the quantity of ammunition possessed by each regiment or battalion of militia, or company of artillery.

12. Resolved, unanimously, That provision be made by law, for the due and proper organization of the militia, and for promoting its efficiency, by squad, company and regimental or battalion drills.

13. Resolved, unanimously, That his excellency the lieutenant governor be authorized to expend a sum of one hundred thousand pounds, if necessary, in the payment of the militia and other services incidental to the protection of this and the adjoining province, from invasion, and that this house will provide for the same.

After a very able and animated address from the hon. J. Uniacke, the house adopted the foregoing resolutions, and the hon. E. M. Dodd, who, in every case supports the dignity of the house, trusted the speaker would allow an exception to the rules customary, when he proposed that three hearty cheers might be given, to be joined by the gallery which, we rejoice to say, was heartily responded to by every individual present. Never have we before witnessed such a heart-string scene, nor never before were such cheers heard in our house of assembly.

The assembly resolutions were passed unanimously, and as a proper finale to the whole proceedings, one of the members, more loyal, or more valorous than his peers, moved that the house give three times three cheers, and that the assembled spectators be allowed to join in upon the occasion. The cheers were duly given, and the assembly adjourned.

PENNSYLVANIA.

The following letter from the late governor, Mr. Ritner, to the committee on the militia system, is in reply to a resolution calling for certain information relative to the ordering out of troops to suppress the mob at the meeting of the legislature.

Harrisburg, 5th Feb., 1839.

SIR:—I received at a late hour last evening your communication of yesterday's date, containing a resolution adopted by the committee on the militia system of the house of representatives, of which you are chairman, requesting me to inform the committee whether at the time I issued my orders to major general Patterson, to call into service the volunteer troops under his command, I notified the brigade in the 1st division, through the adjutant general, the time of service for which the said detachment was required—and also whether I issued an order to general Alexander, of the 11th division P. M. to discharge the troops under his command; and if so, at what time said order was issued.

I unequivocally but respectfully protest against the right of the legislature, or either branch of it, or any of its committees, to ask, or compel me to account for, or explain my official conduct, either examining me under oath, or addressing me in writing. If my official conduct has been in violation of the laws, there is a mode by which it can be investigated and punished. To that constitutional test I am most willing to submit.

Having thus protested with regard to my acts while governor of this commonwealth, I now, as a private citizen, waive my rights, and express my readiness to explain to you, to the legislature, and the public, every act of my official life. I court for the whole, the most rigid scrutiny, and especially for that part of it, connected with the unhappy disturbances which disgraced the seat of government during the greater part of last December.

In reply then to the somewhat peremptory demand of the resolution—I say: That I did not notify the brigade inspectors, through the adjutant general, of the time of service for which the detachment of the 1st division P. M. would be required, for the simple reason, that the adjutant general was then at his residence in Bedford county, and if I had waited until I could have communicated orders through him, the stain of blood might have been added to the stigma which now rests upon the character of the state, and the adoption of the amendments to the constitution might have been prevented by the continuance of the riot.

The emergency admitted of no such delay; neither could I then know how long the troops might be required; but I am proud to say, that I conscientiously believe, that the prompt measure then adopted, was mainly instrumental in restoring order, and preventing bloodshed. That the course pursued was within the limits of executive authority, in case of insurrection against the laws, I never had any doubt; and that it was so, is established by the fact, that the commanding generals felt no hesitation in obeying the orders issued on the occasion. They are both officers who know their duties, and who would not be induced to comply with an illegal order.

I would also beg leave to inform, that no orders were issued by me to either of the major generals, or to any other officers, (during the late rebellions and disgraceful riot), except those that are on file, and on record, in the secretary of the commonwealth's office, or in the possession of the general named in the resolution; of course copies of the orders which the committee seem desirous of obtaining from me, may be obtained officially from the sources just mentioned, to which I respectfully refer you. Your fellow-citizen, JOS. RITNER.

To col James Woodburn, ch. com. on the militia system, H. R.

GETTYSBURG RAIL ROAD—VETO MESSAGE OF THE GOVERNOR.

To the senate and house of representatives of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

GENTLEMEN:—It will always be with reluctance that I shall feel myself constrained to refuse the executive assent to any matter of legislation which has passed the representative and senatorial branches of the legislature. I would not, however, be in the line of duty to approve of a measure, in the justice or expediency of which I cannot concur. After mature deliberation and reflection, I have decided that I cannot approve of the resolution entitled "resolution relative to the Gettysburg rail road," presented to me on the 20th ultimo, and accordingly returned it to the senate, in which it originated with the following reasons for so doing.

The constitution provides that "no money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law." To preserve this salutary provision in its spirit, we should never permit that to be done indirectly which it prohibits from being directly. Hence we have seen the constant care and attention of the legislature to prevent the canal commissioners from incurring debts beyond the appropriations from time to time made. This would be altogether nugatory if, when a distinct and specific amount is appropriated, the canal commissioners by continuing the contractors at work after the appropriation to the object is exhausted, could involve the state in further responsibilities without the sanction of legislative enactment.

By the act of the 18th February, 1836, incorporating the bank of the United States, the 9th section of which authorises the canal commissioners to survey and locate the road in question, and to put not less than 20 nor more than 30 miles thereof under contract, the sum of two hundred thousand dollars is specifically appropriated to this work, and the 12th section expressly provides that "the canal commissioners shall not be authorized to incur any debt on the faith of the commonwealth, in any way or manner beyond the appropriation aforesaid." Here the original act by which this road was introduced into the public improvements of the state, without previous survey or examination, and with nothing to recommend it to public favor but the influence which its friends could bring in support of an act of legislation, since repeatedly and constantly disapproved by the people, prohibits the expenditure of money upon it beyond the specific appropriation.

On the 19th December, 1837, an act passed both branches of the legislature, appropriating forty-five thousand dollars towards the construction of the Gettysburg rail road, to be applied in payment of work actually done prior to the 1st day of January (then) next, and directing the canal commissioners to give notice to the contractors to suspend their work upon said road from and after the said first day of January. By a course wholly unexpected, and which, for the character and reputation of the commonwealth, it is hoped will never be considered a fit example for imitation, this 1st day of January, 1838, was made in point of law to mean the 1st of January, 1839, and thus the intention of the legislature, solemnly expressed by both branches, was for a time frustrated.

By an act of the 14th April, 1838, the further sum of one hundred and ninety-five thousand dollars was appropriated to this rail road, to be applied to the work already under contract, and the resolution which had previously passed the legislature, as before stated, and which became a law on the 9th of January, 1838, was repealed. But by the 6th section of this act it is provided that "the canal commissioners shall not be authorized to incur any debt (on the faith of) the commonwealth in any way or manner beyond the appropriation aforesaid, and no part of the aforesaid appropriation shall be applied to any other than the several specific purposes to which it is appropriated by the preceding sections of this act, nor shall any contracts be entered into for any new lines of canal or rail road not mentioned in this act, or for any extension of the lines herein named, beyond the limits prescribed by this act."

It was therefore the duty of the canal commissioners to have stopped the work on the road the moment the specific appropriation thereto was exhausted. But it appears this was not done, and the subject was brought to the attention of the legislature in the previous part of the present session. By a resolution passed by both houses, and approved on the 19th of February last, it was declared that from and after the 1st day of March, 1839, the work on the Gettysburg rail road should be suspended, and a temporary loan of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars was authorized for the purpose of paying the contractors on said road for work done, or that ought to be done, previous to that day, including the retained per centage, the accounts of the contractors to be settled by the auditor general and state treasurer, in the usual manner, according to law. In ten days after approving this resolution, I am called upon to approve another resolution, providing that the contractors on this road shall be permitted to continue their work until the first day of May next, unless they should sooner be paid the amount due them. What circumstances have transpired to change the determination expressed in the resolution of the 19th of February I have not been informed, and being left to gather the reasons for adopting the resolution, now returned to your body, from its language, I infer that they consist in the fact of the funds not being forthcoming on the 1st of March, to pay the contractors the amount claimed to be due them, and, therefore, the state is to incur a further debt in pursuing this work already suspended.

Whilst the commonwealth is bound to meet all her lawful engagements, persons entering into contracts with her, through her agents, are bound to ascertain and know the extent of the authority given by law to such agents. In the present instances, the contractors were bound to know the amount of the appropriations made, and that it was unlawful for the canal commissioners to expend any further sums, or to involve the state beyond such amounts.

If they continue the work afterwards, it was at their own risk, and to permit them now to go on, in the embarrassed state of the public treasury, and increase the expenditure on a work which a committee of your body, after a personal examination, declared to have been begun in folly, and the prosecution of which would be madness, would not, in my judgment, be promotive of the interests of the commonwealth, but would be a useless waste of the public money, and a legislative recognition and sanctioning of acts done in positive violation of existing laws.

Again expressing with a conscientious sense of duty, to dissent with the representatives of the people in this matter, I return the resolution to the senate for their further action thereon, according to the constitution of the commonwealth.

DAVID R. PORTER.

MR. WEBSTER'S ARGUMENT

In the supreme court of the U. States, Feb. 9, 1839.

The record, (said Mr. W.) presents this case:

The bank of the United States is a corporation created by a law of the state of Pennsylvania. By that act, the bank, among other functions, possesses that act of dealing in bills of exchange. In the month of January, 1837, having funds in Mobile, this bank, through the instrumentality of its agent,

Mr. Poe, purchased a bill of exchange to remit to New York. This bill, drawn at Mobile upon New York, and endorsed by Wm. D. Primrose, the defendant in this case, having been paid either at New York or by the drawer, the bank of the United States has instituted this suit in the circuit court of Alabama to recover the money due on the bill.

In the court below, it was decided that the contract by Poe in behalf of the bank was void, on two grounds: First, because it was a contract made by the bank of the United States in the state of Alabama; whereas a bank incorporated by the state of Pennsylvania can do no act out of the limits of Pennsylvania; Secondly, because Alabama has a bank of her own, the capital of which is owned by the state herself, which is authorized to buy and sell exchange, and from the profits of which she derives her revenue; and, the purchase of bills of exchange being a banking operation, the purchase of such bills by others, at least by any corporation, although there is no express law forbidding it, is against the policy of the state of Alabama, as it may be inferred from the provisions of the constitution of that state and the law made in conformity thereto.

It is admitted that the parties are rightfully in court. It is admitted also that the defendant is a citizen of Alabama, and that all the citizens who compose the corporation of the bank of the United States are citizens of the state of Pennsylvania, or of some other state besides Alabama. The question is, can they as a corporation do any act within the state of Alabama? In other words, is there any thing in the constitution or laws of the state of Alabama which prohibits, or rightfully can prohibit, citizens of other states, or corporations created by other states, from buying and selling bills of exchange in the state of Alabama?

In his argument, yesterday, for the defendant in this case, my learned friend, (Mr. Van de Graf), asked certain questions, which I propose to answer.

Can this bank, (said he), transfer itself into the state of Alabama? Certainly not.

Can it establish a branch in the state of Alabama, there to perform the same duties and transact the same business in all respects as in the state of Pennsylvania. Certainly not.

Can it exercise in the state of Alabama any of its corporate functions. Certainly it can.

For my learned friend admits its right to sue in that state, which is a right that it possesses solely by the authority of the Pennsylvania law by which the bank is incorporated.

We thus clear the case of some difficulty by arriving at this point, the admission on both sides that there are certain powers which the bank can exercise within the state of Alabama, and certain others which it cannot exercise.

The question is, then, whether the bank can exercise within the state of Alabama, this very power of buying a bill of exchange?

Our position is, that she can buy a bill of exchange within the state of Alabama; because there are no corporate functions necessary to the act of buying of a bill of exchange; because buying and selling exchange is a thing open to all the world, in Alabama as well as every where else; because, although the power to buy and sell bills of exchange be conferred upon this bank by its charter, and it could not buy or sell a bill of exchange without that provision in its charter, yet this power was conferred upon it, as were other powers conferred by its charter, to place the bank upon the same footing as an individual—to give it not a monopoly, nor an exclusive privilege, in this respect, but simply the same power which the members of the corporation, as individuals, have of unquestionable right to exercise. The banker, the broker, the merchant, the manufacturer, all buy bills of exchange as individuals; the individuals who compose a corporation may do it; and we say that they may do it, though they do it in the name of, and for, the corporation. We say, undoubtedly, that they cannot acquire power under the Pennsylvania charter to do acts in Alabama, which they cannot do as individuals, but we say that the corporation may do in their corporate character, in Alabama, such acts, authorized by their charter, as the members thereof would have a right to perform as individuals.

The learned counsel on the other side was certainly not disposed to concede, gratuitously, any thing in this case. Yet he did admit that there might be a case in which the acts of a corporation, created by one state, if done in another state, would be void. He supposed the case of a rail road company in one state sending an agent into another state to buy iron for the construction of the road. Without conceding expressly the point of law in that case, he admitted that it would be a case very different from the present; and he gave as a reason for this admission, that it would be a single special act, necessary to enable the corporation to execute its functions within the state to which it belonged, and in this respect differing from the case now under consideration. In what circumstance, it may well be asked, do the cases differ? One act only of the corporation of the bank of the United States is set forth in this record, and that act stands singly and by itself. There is no proof before the court that the corporation ever bought another bill of exchange than that which is the subject of this suit. Transactions of this nature must necessarily come one by one before this court, when they come at all, and must stand or fall on their individual merits, and not upon the supposition of any policy which would recognize the legality of a single act, and deny the validity of the dealings, or transactions, generally, of which that act is a part.

Then, as to the other reason stated by my learned friend in support of the idea that such a purchase of iron might be supported, he says it is, because, that, in that case, the purchase being made abroad solely to enable the corporation to perform its functions at home, might be considered legal, under the law of comity from one state to another.

Now, (said Mr. Webster), that supposed case is precisely the case before the court. Here is the case of a corporation established in Philadelphia, one of whose lawful functions is to deal in exchange. A Philadelphia merchant, having complied with the order of his correspondent in Alabama, draws a bill upon him for the amount due in consequence, goes to the bank of the United States and sells the bill.

The funds thus realized by the bank from the purchase of bills of exchange accumulate in Alabama. How are those funds to be brought back by the Philadelphia corporation within its control? The bank has unquestioned power to deal in bills of exchange. Can there be such a thing as dealing in exchange, with a power to act only on one end of the line? Certainly not. How, then, is the bank of Philadelphia to get its funds back from Alabama? Suppose that it were to send an agent there, and buy specie. Can the bank ship the specie? Can it sign an agreement for the freight, insurance, and charges of bringing it round? To do that would be an act of commerce, of navigation—not of exchange.

A power conferred upon a bank to deal in exchange would be perfectly nugatory, unless accompanied by a power also to direct its funds to be remitted. The practical result of a contrary construction would be, that this Pennsylvania bank may carry on exchange between Philadelphia and Reading, or Philadelphia and Lancaster, but not, by possibility, between Mobile, or any other city, or place in the south, or even with New York, Trenton, or Baltimore. Out of Pennsylvania it could only buy and remit. It could get no return. An exchange that runs but one way! What sort of an exchange is that?

Having cleared the case of some of these generalities, Mr. Webster proceeded to the exposition of what he considered a constitutional, American view of the question.

The record of this case finds that these plaintiffs, the members of the corporation of the bank of the United States, are citizens of other states, and that the defendant is a citizen of Alabama. Now, in the first place, (to begin with the beginning of this part of the question), what are the relations which the individual citizens of one state bear to the individual citizens of any other state of this union?

How did this matter stand before the revolution? Were these states ever colonies, what was the relation between the inhabitants of the different colonies? Certainly it was not that of aliens. They were not, indeed, all citizens of the same colony; but certainly they were fellow-subjects, and owed a common allegiance; and it was not competent for the legislative power to say that the citizens of any one of the colonies should be alien to the other. This was the state of the case until the 4th of July, 1776, when this common allegiance was thrown off. After a short interval of two years—after the renunciation of that allegiance—the articles of confederation were adopted; and now let us see what was the relation between the citizens of the different states by the articles of confederation. That government had become a confederation. But it was something more—much more. It was not merely an alliance between distinct governments for the common defence and general welfare, but it recognized and confirmed a community of interest, of character, and of privileges, between the citizens of the several states.

"The better to secure and perpetuate mutual friendship and intercourse among the people of the different states in this union," said the 4th of the articles of confederation, "the free inhabitants of each of these states shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of free citizens in the sever-citizens, and the people of each state all have a right to ingress to and from any other state, and shall enjoy therein all the privileges of trade and commerce," &c. This placed the inhabitants of each state on equal ground as to the rights and privileges which they might exercise in every other state. So things stood at the adoption of the constitution of the United States. The article of the present constitution, in fewer words and more general and comprehensive terms, confers this community of rights and privileges in the following form: "The citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states." However obvious and general this provision may be, it will be found to have some particular application to the case now before the court; the article in the constitution serving as the expanded form of this article in the constitution.

But this article of the constitution does not confer on the citizens of each state political rights in every other state, as admitted. A citizen of Pennsylvania cannot go into Virginia and vote at an election in that state; though, when he has acquired a residence in Virginia, and is otherwise qualified, as required by her constitution, he becomes, with formal adoption as a citizen of Virginia, a citizen of that state politically. But, for the purposes of trade, commerce, buying and selling, it is evidently not to the power of any state to impose any hindrance or embarrassment, or lay any excise, toll, duty, or exaction, upon citizens of other states, to place them, coming there, upon a different footing from her own citizens.

There is one provision, then, in the constitution, by which citizens of one state may trade in another without hindrance or embarrassment. There is another provision of the constitution by which citizens of one state are entitled to sue citizens of any other state in the courts of the United States.

This is a very plain and clear right under the constitution; but it is not more clear than the preceding.

Here, then, are two distinct constitutional provisions conferring power upon citizens of Pennsylvania and every other state, as to which they may do so in Alabama or any other state: citizens of other states may trade in Alabama in whatsoever is lawful to citizens of Alabama; and it, in the course of their dealings, they have claims on citizens of Alabama, they may sue in Alabama in the courts of the United States. This is American, constitutional law, independent of all comity whatever.

By the decisions of this court it has been settled that this right to sue is a right which may be exercised in the name of a corporation. Here is one of their rights then, which may be exercised in Alabama by citizens of another state in the name of a corporation. If citizens of Pennsylvania can exercise in Alabama the right to sue, in the name of a corporation, what hinders them from exercising in this same manner this other constitutional right, the right to trade? If it be the established right of persons in Pennsylvania to sue in Alabama in the name of a corporation, why may they not do any other lawful act in the name of a corporation? If no reason to the contrary can be given, then the law in the one case is the law also in the other case.

My learned friend says, indeed, that suing and making a contract are different things. True; but this argument, so far as it has any force, works against his cause. For it is a much more distinct exercise of corporate power to bring a suit than to make an agent or a contract. Why does he not undertake to be true when it says that a corporation of one state may sue in another? Why, that the corporation is there, in court, ready to submit to the court's decree, a party on its record. But in the case of a purchase of the bill of exchange, such as is the subject of this suit, what is assumed? No more than that George Poe bought a bill of exchange and paid the value for it on account of his employers in Philadelphia. So far from its being a more natural right for a corporation to be allowed to sue, it is a more natural right to be allowed to trade in a state in which the corporation does not exist. What is the distinction? Buying a bill of exchange is said to be an act, and therefore the corporation could not do it in Alabama. Is not a suit an act? If not doing? Does it not in truth involve many acts?

The truth is, that this argument against the power of a corporation to do acts beyond the territorial jurisdiction of the authority by which it is created, is refuted by all history as well as by plain reason.

What have all the great corporations in England been doing for centuries back? The English East India company, as far back as the reign of Elizabeth, has been trading all over the eastern world. That company traded in Asia before Great Britain had established any territorial government there, and in other parts of the world where England never pretended to a territorial authority. The bank of England, established in 1694, has been always trading and dealing in exchanges and bills on London, Amsterdam, and other parts of Europe. Numerous other corporations have been created in England for the purpose of exercising power over markets and things in territories wherein the power of England has never been exerted. The whole commercial world is full of such corporations, exercising similar powers, beyond the territorial jurisdiction within which they have legal existence.

I say, then, that the right, secured to the people of Pennsylvania, to sue in any other state in the name of a corporation, is no more clear than this other right of such a corporation to trade in any other state; nor even so clear; it is a further-fetched legal presumption, or a much greater extent of national courtesy or comity, to suppose a foreign corporation actually in court, in its legal existence, with its legal right of acting in its own name, than it is to allow an ordinary act to be done by its agent, on its own account, to be a valid transaction.

Mr. W. here referred to an opinion of this court directly bearing on this question. It was the case of the bank of the United States vs. Deveaux, decided in 1809. The bank here mentioned was the first bank of the United States, which had not, like the first, express authority given in its charter to sue in the courts of the United States. It sued, therefore, as its plaintiffs sued, in its name as a corporation; but with an avowal, as here, that its members were citizens of Pennsylvania, the action being brought against a citizen of Georgia. The only question was, whether the plaintiffs might not exercise their constitutional right to sue in the courts of the United States, although they appeared in the name of their Pennsylvania corporation; and the court decided that they might. "Substantially, and essentially," said chief justice Marshall, "the parties in such a case, where the members of the corporation are aliens, or citizens of a different state from the opposite party, come within the spirit and terms of the jurisdiction conferred by the constitution on the national tribunals." "That corporations composed of citizens are considered by the legislature as citizens, under certain circumstances, is to be strongly inferred from the registering acts. It never could be intended that an American registered vessel, abandoned to an insurance company composed of citizens, should lose her character as an American vessel, and yet this would be the case, if it were declared that the members of the corporation were to sue in their own name, out of view, and merged in the corporation."

The argument here is, that citizens, in the name of their corporation; because, in such a name, the law recognizes them as competent to engage in transactions, hold property, and enjoy rights proper for them as citizens.

If the court agree in this language of its own opinion as far back as the year 1809, it must be admitted that the rights of the people of Pennsylvania, as citizens of the United States, are not merged in the act of incorporation by which they are associated, and under which they are parties to this suit. If it were as a human being that did not argue to the obscure for the more obscure, it was certainly the life and chief justice of the United States. And what was his argument to prove that the citizens of one state may sue in another by a corporation? It is to be true said, that they may sue by a corporate name, because they are recognized by the court by a corporate name; whilst, directly opposing this conclusion, it has been held in this case, in the court below, that, whilst a corporation of one state may rightly sue in another, it cannot do any other act therein.

In this view of the case, (said Mr. W.), I see no occasion to invoke the law of comity or international courtesy to our aid. Here our case stands, independently of that law, on American ground, as an American question.

Now, as to the reason of the case. What possible difference can it make if these citizens of Pennsylvania can trade, buy and sell bills, in Alabama, whether the trading, or buying and selling, be under one agency or another? That Poe, (the agent of the bank of the United States at Mobile), could, under a power of attorney from a citizen of Philadelphia, buy and sell bills of exchange in Alabama, will not be denied. If, without an act of incorporation, several citizens of Philadelphia should form an association to buy and sell bills of exchange, with five directors or managers of its concerns; those five directors may send as many agents as they please into other states to buy bills of exchange. &c. Having thus formed themselves into this associated company, and appointed agents for the purpose of transacting their business, if they should go one step further, and obtain a charter from Pennsylvania, that their meetings and proceedings may more methodical, and the acts of the association more regular, and the acts of the difference, in the eye of reason, between the acts of the members of such a corporation, and the acts of the same individuals associated for the same purposes without incorporation, and acting by common agents, correspondents, or attorneys? The officers of a bank are but the agents of the proprietors; and their purchases and sales are loaded upon their property, and directed by their will, in the same manner as the acts of agents of unincorporated associations or partnerships. The Girard bank, we all know, was never incorporated until after Mr Girard's death; yet its proprietor, during a considerable part of his life, and until his death, acted as a broker. Could he not, during his life, send an agent into Alabama, and there purchase bills of exchange? And if his neighbors over the way chose to ask for an act of incorporation from the state of Pennsylvania, are they thereby any less entitled to the privileges common to all other citizens, than Stephen Girard was?

I agree, certainly, generally, that a state law cannot operate extraterritorially, as the phrase is. But it is a rule of law that a state authority may create an artificial being, giving it legal existence; and that that being, thus created, may legally sue in other states than that by which it is created. It follows, of course, as a consequence of the right of suit in another state, that may obtain judgment there. If it obtain judgment, it may accept satisfaction of that judgment. If a judgment be obtained in Alabama by the bank of the United States, would not acknowledgment of satisfaction by an agent of the bank be a satisfaction of the decree of the court? How is the fruit of a suit to be gathered, if the bank, by its agent, cannot do this act? What benefit can it do to this bank to be allowed to sue in Alabama, if it cannot take the money and for? But it is said, by the bank, because it cannot recover money in Alabama, because it cannot do an act there. According to this argument, although the power to appeal to law and the power to recover judgment exist, yet the fructus legis is all dust and ashes.

On the commercial branch of this question, (Mr. Webster continued), he would say but little. But thus much he would say: the state of Alabama cannot make any commercial regulation for her own emolument or benefit, such as should create any difference between her own citizens and citizens of other states. He did not say that the state of Alabama may not make corporations, and give to them all privileges which she do not give to her citizens. But he did say, that she cannot create a monopoly to the prejudice of citizens of other states, or to the disparagement or prejudice of any common commercial right. Suppose that a power of laying occasion to purchase bills of exchange should be the credit of bills sold by the bank of Alabama; or suppose (what is within the reach of possibility) that the bank of Alabama should fail; may not a citizen buy bills elsewhere? Or is it supposed that the state of Alabama can give such a preference to any institution of her own in the buying and selling of exchange, that no exchange can be bought and sold within her limits but by that institution? It would be, doubts, doing the state great injustice to suppose that she could entertain any such purpose.

In conclusion of the argument upon this point, (said Mr. Webster), I maintain that the plaintiffs in this case had a right to purchase this bill, and to bring judgment upon it. For the same reason that they had a right to bring this suit, they had the right to do the act upon which the suit was brought.

But, if the rights of the plaintiffs, under this constitutional view of the case, be doubted, then what has been called the comity of nations obliges the court to sustain the plaintiffs in this cause.

The term "comity" is taken from the civil law. Vattel has no distinct chapter upon that head. But the doctrine is laid down by other authorities with sufficient distinctness, and in effect by him. It is, in general terms, that there are, between nations at peace with one another, rights, both national and individual, resulting from the comity or courtesy due from one friendly nation to another. Among these is the right to sue in their courts respectively; the right to travel in each other's dominions; the right to pursue one's vocation in trade; to the citizens proper of each country, which belong they are not precluded from doing by some positive law of the state. Among these rights, one of the clearest is the right of the citizen of one nation to take away his property from the territory of any other friendly nation, without molestation or objection. This is what we call the comity of nations. It is the usage of nations, and has become a positive obligation on all nations. I know (said Mr. Webster) that it is but customary or voluntary law; that it is a law existing by the common understanding and consent of nations, and not established by the government of nations by any common superior. For this reason, every nation, to a certain extent, judges for itself of the extent of the obligation of this law, and puts its own construction upon it. Every other nation, however, has a right to do the same; and it, therefore, any two nations differ irreconcilably in their construction of this law, there is no resort for settling that difference but the ultima ratio regum.

The right of a foreigner to sue in the courts of any country may be regulated by particular laws or ordinances of that country. He may be required to give security for the costs of suit in any case, or not to leave the country until the end of the controversy. He may possibly be required to give security that he will not carry his property out of the country till his debts are paid. But it, under pretence of such regulation, any nation should impose unreasonable restrictions or penalties on the citizens of any other nation, the power of judging that matter for itself lies with that other nation. Suppose that the government of the United States, for example, should say that every foreigner should pay in the public treasury ten, twenty, or fifty per cent. of any amount which he might recover by suit in our courts of law. Or would not the practice be such an extension upon the citizens of other nations but a just ground of complaint; and, if not redressed, a ground of war, much more sufficient than most of the causes which put nations at arms against one another? What is, in fact, now the question, which has assumed so prominent an aspect, between the government of France and Mexico? One of the leading causes of difference between the two countries, so far as I understand it, is not that the courts of Mexico are not open to the citizens or subjects of France, but that the courts do not do justice between them and the citizens of Mexico; in other words, that French subjects are not treated in Mexico according to the comity of the law of nations. [Mr. Webster said he did not speak of the merits of this question, into that he did not enter; he spoke only of things alleged between the parties.] The court (said Mr. Webster) into Vattel, and you will find that this very right to carry away property, the proceeds of trade from a foreign friendly country, by exchange, is a well understood and positive part of the law of nations. Suppose that there existed no treaties between the United States and France or England, guaranteeing these rights to each other's citizens; those rights would yet exist by tacit consent and permission. Suppose this government, in the absence of treaties, were to shut its courts against the citizens of either nation, (to do so would be only a violation of the comity of nations,) and should grant them no redress upon complaint being made; it might unquestionably be ground of war against the United States by that nation.

There are in London several incorporated insurance companies. Suppose a ship insured by one of these companies was wrecked in the Chesapeake bay. A big cargo was wrecked in the Chesapeake bay, and the vessel insured by which she was insured, demanding whether the insurers may not come and take this property, and bring an action for it, if necessary, in any court in this country, state or federal? They may recover by an action of tort against the wrong-doer. They may reply their property, if necessary, or sell it; or reft it; or send it back. Unquestionably, if any country were to debar the citizens of another country of the enjoyment of these common rights within its territorial jurisdiction, it would be cause of war. I do not mean that a single act of that sort would be a declaration of war; but it would be an act of should bring on a war; but it would be a violation of our duty under the law of nations, as to justify war. According to the present construction of the contract below, these insurance companies would be deprived of their rightful remedy. You let them sue, indeed; but that is all.

Mr. Webster here referred to a case tried some time ago in the circuit court of the Massachusetts district, in which he was counsel, in which a vessel insured in Boston was wrecked in Nova Scotia, and was abandoned to the insurers. The insurance office sent out an agent, who did that which the owner of the vessel said was an acceptance of the abandonment. On the question whether the agent of the Boston office accepted the abandonment, (said Mr. Webster), the court decided the case. If we had said that we sent him down, it would be, but that his agency ceased when he got to the boundary line of the state, and he could do no act when he got beyond it, and the court has agreed with us, we might, perhaps, have gained our cause. But it never occurred to me, nor probably to the court, that the agency of our agent terminated the moment that he passed the limits of the state.

The law of country is a part of the law of nations; and it does authorize a corporation of any state to make contract beyond the limits of that state.

How does a state contract? How many of the states of this union have made contracts for loans in England? A state is sovereign, in a certain sense. But, when a state sues, it sues as a corporation. When it enters into contracts with the citizens of foreign nations, it does so in its corporate character. I now say, that it is the adjudged and authorized law of the world, that corporations have the same right to contract and to sue in foreign countries as individuals have. By the law of nations, individuals of other countries are allowed in this country to contract and sue; and we make no distinction, in the case of individuals, between the right to sue and the right to contract. Near can such a distinction be sustained in law in the case of corporations. I have, in history, in the books, many laws of nations to be found (except the disputed case from Virginia) in which a distinction is drawn between the rights of individuals and of corporations to contract and sue in foreign countries in regard to things, generally, free and open to every body? In the whole civilized world, at home and abroad, in England, Holland, and other countries of Europe, the equal rights of corporations and individuals, in this respect, have been indisputed until now, and in this case; and if a distinction is to be set up between them at this day, it is with the counsel on the other side to produce some semblance of authority or show of reason for it.

But it is argued, that though this law of comity exists as between independent nations, it does not exist between the states of this union. That argument appears to have been the foundation of the judgment in the court below.

In respect to the law of comity, it is said, states are nations; they have no national sovereignty; a sort of residuum of sovereignty is all that remains to them. The national sovereignty, it is said, is conferred on this government, and part of the municipal sovereignty. The rest of the municipal sovereignty belongs to the states. Notwithstanding the respect which I entertain for the learned judge who presided in that court, I cannot follow in the train of his argument. I can make no diagram, such as this, of the partition of national character between the state and the general governments. I cannot soap it out, and say so far is national, and so far municipal; and here is the exact line, where the one begins and the other ends. We have with us Alachua Laplace, and we never shall have, with his Alachua nige Poltigue, able to define and describe the orbit of each sphere in our political system with such exact mathematical precision. There is no such thing as arranging these governments of ours by the laws of gravitation, so that they will be sure to go on forever without impinging. These institutions are practical, admirable, glorious, blessed creations. Still they were, when created, experimental institutions, and if the convention which framed the constitution of the United States had set down in it certain general definitions of powers, such as have been alleged in the argument of this case, and stopped there, I verily believe that, in the course of the fifty years which have since elapsed, this government would have never gone into operation.

Suppose that this constitution had said, in terms, after the language of the court below, all national sovereignty shall belong to the United States; all municipal sovereignty to the several states; I will say, that however clear, however distinct, such a definition may appear to those who use it, the employment of it in the constitution could only have led to inter-confusion and uncertainty. I am not prepared to say that the states have no national sovereignty. The laws of some of the states—Maryland and Virginia, for instance—provide punishment for treason. The power thus exercised is certainly not municipal. Virginia has a law of abridge that is a power exercised against a foreign nation. Does not the question necessarily arise, when a power is exercised concerning an alien enemy—enemy to whom? The law of escheat, which exists in many states, is also the exercise of a great sovereign power.

The term "sovereignty" does not occur in the constitution at all. This constitution treats states as states, and the United States as the United States; and by a careful enumeration declares all the powers that are granted to the United States, and all the rest are reserved to the states. If we pursue, to the extreme point, the powers granted, and the powers reserved, the powers of the general and state gov-vernments will be found, it is to be heard of, impinging, and in conflict. Our hope, is, that the candor and patriotism of the states, and the wisdom of this government, will prevent that catastrophe. For myself, I will pursue the advice of the court in Deussen's case; I will avoid nice metaphysical subtleties, and all such needless theories; I will keep my feet out of the traps of general definition; I will keep my feet out of all traps; I will keep to things as they are, and go no further to inquire what they might be, if they were not what they are. The states of this union, as states, are subject to all the voluntary and customary law of nations. [Mr. Webster here referred to, and quoted a passage from Vattel, page 61, which he said, clearly showed that states conformed together as are the states of this union, must be considered as such component parts of the law of nations as any others.]

If, for the decision of any question, the proper rule is to be found in the law of nations, the law adheres to the subjects. It follows the subject through no matter in what place, high or low. You cannot escape the law of nations in a case where it is applicable. The air of every judicature is full of it. It pervades the courts of law of the highest character, and the court of pic-poudre, ay, even the constable's court. It is part of the universal law. It may share the glorious eulogy pronounced by Hecker upon law itself, that there is nothing so high as to be beyond the reach of its power, nothing so low as to be beneath its care. If any question be within the influence of the law of nations, the law of nations is there. If the law of comity does not exist between the states of this union, how can it exist between a state and the subjects of any foreign sovereignty?

Upon all the considerations that I have given to the case, the conclusion seems to me inevitable, that if the law of comity does not exist between the states of this union, it cannot exist between the states individually and foreign powers. It is true a state cannot make a treaty; she cannot be a party to a new chapter on the law of nations; but the law which prevails among nations—the customary rule of judicature, recognized by all nations—binds her in all her courts.

I have heard no answer to another argument. If a contract be made in New York, with the expectation that it is to be there executed, and suit is brought upon it in Alabama, it is to be decided by the law of the state in which the contract was made. In a case now before this court, there has been a decision by the court of Alabama, in which that part of New York, and admitted in Alabama. Why take notice in Alabama of the law of New York? Because, properly, there are cases in which the courts in Alabama feel it to be their duty to administer that law, and to enforce rights accordingly. That (said Mr. Webster) is the very point for which we contend, viz: the court in Alabama should have given effect to rights exercised in that state by the plaintiff in the present case, under the authority of Pennsylvania, without prejudice to the state of Alabama.

After all that has been said in argument about corporations, they are but forms of special partnership, in some of which the partners are severally liable. The whole end and aim of most of them, as with us, is to concentrate the means of small capitalists in a form in which they can be used to advantage.

In the eastern states, manufactures too extensive for individual capital are carried on in this way. A large quantity of goods is manufactured and sold to the south, out of cotton bought in the south, to the amount of many millions in every year. Upon the principle of the decision in the court below, the manufacturers of the goods and the growers of the cotton would be equally precluded from recovering their dues. What will our fellow-citizens of the south say to this? If, after we have got their cotton, they cannot get their money for it, they will be in no great love. I think with these new doctrines, about the comity of states and nations,

Again, look at the question as it regards the insurance offices. How are all marine insurances, fire insurances, and life insurances, effected in this country, but by the agency of companies, incorporated by the several states? And the insurances made by these companies beyond the limits of their particular states, are they all void? I suppose that the insurances against fire, effected for companies at Hartford, in Connecticut, alone, by agents all over the northern states, may amount to an aggregate of some millions of dollars. I remember a case occurring in New Hampshire, of a suit against one of those companies for the amount of an insurance, in which a recovery was had against the company; and nothing was said, nor probably thought, of such a contract of insurance being illegal on the ground that a corporation of Connecticut could not do an act or make a contract in New Hampshire. Are those insurances all to be held void, upon the principle of the decision from Alabama?

And as to notes issued by banks: if one in Alabama hold the notes of a bank incorporated by Pennsylvania, are they void? If one be robbed of such notes, is it no theft? If one counterfeits those notes there, is it no crime? Are all such notes mere nullities, when out of the state where issued?

Reference has been made to the statute books to show cases in which the states have forbidden foreign insurance companies from making insurances within their limits. But no such prohibition has been shown against insurances by citizens of, or companies created in, the different states. Is not this an exact case for the application of the rule exceptio probat regulam? The fact of such prohibitory legislation shows that citizens of other states have, and that citizens of foreign powers had, before they were excluded by law, the right to make insurances in, and every one of the states.

Mr. Webster next called the attention of the court to the deposit law passed by congress on the 23d of June, 1836. It was (said he) one of the conditions upon which, under that act, any state bank should become a depository of the public money, that it should enter into obligations "to render to the government all the duties and services heretofore required by law to be performed by the late bank of the United States, and its several branches or offices;" that is, to remit money to any part of the United States, transfer it from one state to another, &c. But that act required, also, something more; and it shows how little versed we in congress were (and I take to myself my full share of blame), in the legal abstractions of the doing of acts in one state by corporations of other states. The first section of that act provides, that "in those states, territories, or districts, in which there are no banks," &c., the secretary of the treasury "may make arrangement with a bank or banks in some other state, territory or district, to establish an agency or agencies in the states, territories, or districts, so destitute of banks, as banks of deposit," &c. Here is an express recognition by congress of the power of a state bank to create an agent for the purpose of dealing as a bank in another state or territory.

It has been said that, as there is no law of comity under the law of nations between the states, it remains for the legislatures of the several states to adopt, in their conduct towards each other, as much of the principle of comity as they please. Here, then, there is to be no negotiation between the states, to determine how far they will observe this law of comity. They are thus required to do precisely what they cannot do. States cannot make treaties nor contracts. A state cannot negotiate. It cannot even hold an Indian talk! And now, I would ask, how it happens, at this time of the day, that this court shall be called upon to make a decision contrary to the spirit of the constitution, and against the whole course of decisions in this country and in Europe, and the undisputed practice under this government for fifty years, overturning the law of comity, and leaving it to the states, each to establish a comity for itself?

Mr. W. here took leave of the question of the power of a corporation created by one of the states to make contracts in another.

I now proceed (said Mr. W.) to consider whether there be any thing in the law or constitution of the state of Alabama which prevents the agent of the bank of the United States in that state from making such a contract as that which is the foundation of this suit.

It is said that the buying of a bill of exchange by such agent is contrary to the policy of the state of Alabama; and this is inferred from the law establishing the bank of Alabama; that bank being authorised to deal in bills of exchange, and the constitution of the state authorising the establishment of no other than one bank in the state.

This (said Mr. W.) is a violent inference.

How does the buying or selling of bills of exchange in Alabama, by another purchaser than the bank of Alabama, infringe her policy? Because, it is said, it diminishes the profits which she derives from the dealings of the bank. Profit is her policy, it is argued; gain her end. Is it against her policy for Mr. Biddle to buy bills, because his bank is incorporated; and not against her policy for Mr. Girard to buy bills, because his is not incorporated? Or, how far does she carry this policy imputed to her? Is no one to be allowed to buy or sell bills of exchange in Alabama but a bank of her own, which may or may not be in credit, and may or may not be solvent? It would be strange indeed, were any state in this union to adopt such a policy as this.

But, if the argument founded on this inferred policy of Alabama amounts to any thing, it proves, not that incorporated citizens of other states cannot buy or sell bills there, but that it is the policy of Alabama to prevent other citizens from buying bills at all in Alabama.

I think (said Mr. W.) that there is no justification for the inference of any such policy on the part of the state of Alabama. By referring to Aikin's Digest of the laws of that state, it will be found that she has carried her policy a little further than merely the establishing of a bank. Her public officers are authorised to receive the notes of banks of other states in payment of dues to her; and she has enacted laws to punish the forgery of notes of other banks. Now, taking her acts together, considering them as a whole, the inference which has been drawn from her establishment of a state bank under her constitution is certainly not sustained.

To consider this argument, however, more closely: it is assumed by it, first, that the state meant, by her legislation, to take to herself all the profits of banking within her territorial limits; and, secondly, that the act of buying and selling a bill of exchange belongs to banking.

The profits of banking are derived more from circulation than from exchange. If the state meant, through her bank policy, to take all the profits of banking, why has she not taken all the profits of circulation? Not only she has done no such thing, but she protects the circulation of the notes of banks of other states.

Mr. W. begged now to ask the particular attention of the court to this question: What is banking? Alabama, in reference to banking, has done nothing but establish a bank, and given it the usual banking powers. And when the learned counsel on the other side speak of banking, what do they mean by it? A bank deals in exchange; and it buys or builds houses also; so do individuals. If there be any thing peculiar in these acts by a bank, it must be not in the nature of the acts individually, but in the aggregate of the whole. What constitutes banking, must be something peculiar. There are various acts of legislation by different states in this country for granting or preventing the exercise of banking privileges. But has any law ever been passed to authorise or to prevent the buying by an individual of a bill of exchange? No one has ever had of such a thing. The laws to restrain banking have all been directed to one end, that is, to restrict the unauthorised circulation of paper money. There are various other functions performed by banks; but, in discharging all these, they only do what unincorporated individuals do.

What is that, then, without which any institution is not a bank, and with which it is a bank? It is a power to issue promissory notes with a view to their circulation as money.

Our ideas of banking have been derived principally from the act constituting the first bank of the United States, and the idea of that bank was borrowed from the bank of England. To ascertain the character and peculiar functions of the bank of England, Mr. W. had referred, and referred the court, to various authorities; to McCulloch's Commercial Dictionary; to Smollett's continuation of Hume's England; to Godfrey's History of the bank of England, in Lord Somers's Tracts, 11th volume, 1st article; to Anderson's History of Commerce, &c.

The project of the bank of England was conceived, Mr. W. said, by Mr. Paterson, a Scotch gentleman, who had travelled much abroad, and had seen somewhere, (he believed in Lombardy), a small bank which issued tickets or promises of payment of money. From this he took the idea of a bank of circulation. That was in 1694. At that time neither inland bills nor promissory notes were negotiable or transferable, so as to enable the holder to bring suit thereon in his own name. There was no negotiable paper except foreign bills of exchange. Mr. Paterson's conception was, that the notes of the bank of England should be negotiable like notes, or transferable from hand to hand, payable at the bank in specie, either on demand, or at very short sight. This conception had complete success, because there was then no other inland paper, either bills or notes, which were negotiable. The whole field was occupied by bank of England notes. In 1698 inland bills were made negotiable by act of parliament; and in the fourth year of queen Anne's reign promissory notes were made negotiable. Of course, after this, every body might issue promissory notes; and where they had credit enough, they might circulate as money. There is not much of novelty in the inventions of mankind. Under this state of things, that took place in England which we have seen so often take place among us, and which we have put to the account of modern contrivance. Large companies were formed, with heavy amounts of capital, for purposes not professedly banking; one, especially, to carry on the mining business on a large scale. These companies issued promissory notes, payable on demand, and these notes readily got into circulation as cash, to the prejudice of the circulation of the bank of England. But parliament being at this time in great want of ready money for the expenditures of the war on the continent, the bank proposed to double its capital, and to lend this new bill of it to government, if government would secure to the bank an exclusive circulation of its notes. The statute of the 6th of Anne, chapter 22, was accordingly passed; which recites that other persons and divers corporations have presumed to borrow money, and to deal as a bank, contrary to former acts; and that upon it is enacted, that "no person, nor more than six persons in partnership, shall borrow, use, or take up any money on their bills and notes, payable at demand, or at less than six months from the borrowing." This provision has been often re-enacted, and constitutes the banking privilege of the bank of England. Competition was not feared from the circulation of individual notes. Hence individuals or partnerships of not more than six persons have been at liberty to issue small notes, payable on demand; in other words, notes for circulation. And we know that in the country such notes have extensively circulated; but private bankers in London in the neighborhood of the bank, though it was lawful, have not found it useful to issue their own notes. So that the banking privilege of the bank of England consisted simply in the privilege of issuing notes for circulation, while that privilege is forbidden, by law, to all other corporations, and all large partnerships and associations.

This privilege was restrained in 1826, so as not to prohibit banking companies, except within the distance of sixty-five miles of London; and, at the same time notes of the bank were made tender in payment of all debts, except by the bank itself. This provision may be considered as a new privilege; but it does not belong to the original and essential idea of banking. Mr. McCulloch remarks, and truly, that all that government has properly to do with the banks is so far as they are banks of issue. Upon the same principle, the banks of other countries of Europe are incorporated, with the privilege to issue and circulate notes, as their distinctive character. Here Mr. W. explained the character of the bank of Belgium, &c. Now, how is it in our own country? When our state legislatures have undertaken to restrain banking, the great end in view has been to prevent the circulation of notes. Mr. W. here referred to the statute books of Massachusetts, Maine, Rhode Island and New Hampshire, for restraining unauthorised companies from issuing notes of circulation. He then turned to the statute of Ohio, imposing a punishment for unauthorised banking. Her law defines, in the first place, what constitutes a bank, viz: the issuing of notes which pass by delivery, and intended for circulation as cash. That (said Mr. W.) is the true definition of a bank, as we understand it, in this country. Mr. W. referred also to the laws of other states, Maryland, New Jersey, Missouri, Pennsylvania, Delaware, North Carolina, South Carolina, Virginia, Georgia, all to the same effect. The law of the state of Alabama herself, said he, is much more important, in this view of the case, than that of any other state. The constitution of the state of Alabama was established in 1819; the law creating the bank of Alabama was passed in 1823. The constitution and this law are all the authorities from which the inference has been drawn of the policy of the state of Alabama. Did she suppose by this law that she was establishing such a monopoly of the purchase of bills of exchange as has been contended for in this case? Certainly not. For, by a law passed afterwards, she restrained the circulation of unauthorised bank notes; that is, notes not issued by some authorised banks. But did she, also, restrain dealings in exchange? She did no such thing. Nor is there any thing, either in the constitution or the law of the state of Alabama, which shows that by banking she ever meant more than the circulation of bills as currency. There is nothing, therefore, in any law, or any policy, of Alabama, against the purchase of bills of exchange by others as well as by the bank of Alabama. She has prohibited, by law, other transactions which are clearly banking transactions; but she has not touched this. If even her banking policy includes as well buying exchange as circulation, and she guards against competition in the one, and leaves the other open, who can say, in the face of such evidence, that it is her policy to guard against what she leaves free and unrestrained?

Is there any thing in the constitution, or any ground in the legislation of Alabama, to sustain the allegation which has been made of her policy? If not, is the existence of such a policy to be established here by construction, and that construction far-fetched?

Mr. W. here rested his argument on this case, which, he said, had been discussed by others so ably as not to justify his occupying the time of the court by going further into it.

The learned counsel on the other side had, in the course of his argument of yesterday, alluded to the newspapers, which, he said, had treated the decision of the court below scornfully. Mr. Webster said he was sorry to hear it, for the learned judge had acted, in his decision, he had no doubt, under a high sense of duty. I have been told, (said Mr. W.) but I have not seen it, that a press in this city, since this case has been under consideration in this court, has undertaken to speak, in a tone something approaching to that of command, of the decision upon it to be expected from this court. Such conduct is certainly greatly discredit to the character of the country, as well as disrespectful and injurious to the court.

A learned gentleman on the other side said, the other day, that he thought he might regard himself, in this cause, as having the country for his client. He only meant, doubtless, to express a strong opinion that the interest of the country required the case to be decided in his favor. I agree with the learned gentleman, and I go, indeed, far beyond him in my estimate of the importance of this case to the country. He did not take pains to show the extent of the evil which would result from undoing the vast number of contracts which would be effected by the affirmation here of the judgment rendered in the court below, because his object did not require that; his object was to diminish the prospect of mischief, not to enlarge it. For myself, I see neither limit nor end to the calamitous consequences of such a decision. I do not know where it would not reach, what interests it would not disturb, or how any part of the commercial system of the country would be free from its influences, direct or remote. And for what end is all this to be done?

What practical evil calls for so harsh, not to say so rash, a remedy? And why, now, when existing systems and established opinions, when existing law and the public sentiment, have both concurred in what we have been taught, practically, so safe and so useful, why now, and why here, seek to introduce new and portentous doctrines? If I were called upon to say what has struck me as most remarkable and wonderful in this whole case, I would, instead of indulging in expletives, exaggerations, or exclamations, put it down as the most extraordinary circumstance, that now, within a short month of the expiration of the first half century of our existence, under this constitution, such a question should have been made; that now, for the first time, and here, for the last place on earth, such doctrines as have been heard in its support should be brought forward. With all the respect which I really entertain for the court below, and for the arguments which have been delivered here on the same side, I must say that, in my judgment, the decision now under revision by this court is, in its principle, anti-commercial and anti-social, new and unheard of in our system, and calculated to break up the harmony which has so long prevailed among the states and people of this union.

It is not, however, for the learned gentleman, nor for myself, to say, here, that we speak for the country. We advance our sentiments and our arguments, but they are without authority. But it is for you, Mr. Chief Justice and judges, on this, as on other occasions of high importance, to speak, and to decide, for the country. The guardianship of her commercial interests; the preservation of the harmonious intercourse of all her citizens; the fulfilling, in this respect, of the great object of the constitution, are in your hands; and I am not to doubt that the trust will so be performed as to sustain, at once, high national objects, and the character of this tribunal.

TWENTY FIFTH CONGRESS,

THIRD SESSION—SENATE.

March 3. Mr. Pierce moved that his friend, the senator from Georgia, (Mr. Culbert), be permitted to record his vote in the journal on the passage of the bill giving to the president of the U. States additional powers for the defence of the U. States in certain cases against invasion, and for other purposes, as he was absent from extreme indisposition when the vote was taken.

Mr. Benton observed that, if there was any one case in the world on which he would agree to dispense with this important rule, it would be this—in which the senator was compelled, from extreme indisposition, to be absent when the vote was taken on an important question, on which every gentleman wished his vote to appear. But he deemed the rule of such vital importance, that it ought not to be departed from in any instance.

The president was under the impression that the rule being imperative, it could not be departed from without the unanimous consent of the senate.

Mr. Pierce would not have made this motion, but for the peculiar circumstances of the case. At an important bill to provide for the defence of the country had been brought in from the other house, and the question on its passage taken late at night, soon after the senator from Georgia had been compelled, from extreme indisposition, after a protracted and exhausting session, to leave the chamber. Under these circumstances, the senator from Georgia wished his vote to appear on the journal in favor of the bill.

Mr. Benton observed that the very decision made by the chair, was given when he first came into the senate, by Mr. Gaillard, the then presiding officer, who was one of the most urbane gentlemen he ever knew. Mr. Gaillard declared that, if the mover was not adhered to, there would be no termination of the business of the senate. If one gentleman was permitted to come in under certain circumstances, another gentleman would claim to come in under other circumstances, and there would be no knowing where it would end.

The president said the motion was already decided on.

Mr. Ruggles asked leave to withdraw the memorial of Thomas Jefferson Smith, which he had presented some days since, for the reason that he had discovered that it contained language derogatory and personally offensive towards W. A. Whitehead, another memorialist on the same subject, whose memorial had been withdrawn for a similar reason by the senator from Michigan. He observed that he certainly should not have presented it, had he been aware of the indecorum in the language of the memorial, to which his attention had since been called.

Mr. Smith, of Indiana, presented several joint resolutions of the legislature of that state, which, on his motion, were ordered to be laid on the table and printed, it being at too late a period of the session to take any further order upon them.

An act for the improvement and survey of certain rivers, and the repairs of certain roads in Florida, was taken up, and Mr. Allen offered as an amendment a proposition for the United States to apply the proceeds of their stock in the Louisville and Portland canal to the purchase of stock held by individuals, with the view to absorb the ownership of the stock; which was supported by Messrs. Allen, Walker, Benton and Crittenden, and opposed by Messrs. Clay, of Alabama, Smith, of Connecticut, and Sevier, and was rejected—ayes 6, noes 23.

The bill was then read a third time and passed. The bill to provide for taking the sixth census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States, was read a third time and passed.

An act to authorize the construction of certain improvements in the territory of Wisconsin, and for other purposes, was taken up, and after some remarks from Messrs. Hubbard, Walker, Clay, of Alabama, Norrell, Buchanan and Lyon, it was laid upon the table.

A great number of bills from the house, whose titles have been heretofore given, were read a third time and passed.

A message was received from the house of representatives, stating that they had suspended the joint rule, so as to permit the house to send to the senate the bill making an appropriation for the erection of a fire-proof building for the post office department, and asking their concurrence therein; which was agreed to.

The bill was then taken up, carried through its several stages as in committee of the whole, and by unanimous consent, read a third time and passed.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, moved to reconsider the vote on the passage of the bill to incorporate the Washington Male Orphan Asylum and Manual Labor School in the city of Washington. This bill, he said, had passed in the course of the evening without exciting much attention in the senate, and he himself assented to its passage, without being acquainted with its details. The truth was, he looked towards the seat of the senator from Ohio, who he understood intended to oppose this bill, and not seeing him there, he supposed that his objections were removed. Since the passage of the bill, however, he had examined some of its details, and he was convinced that had they been understood, it could not have passed the senate. It allowed this corporation to take charge of any unprotected orphan found in this city, and work him till twenty-one years of age, or bind him out to any other person. The bill also took the control of these orphans from the chancery court, and left them there with out any remedy, wholly at the disposal of this corporation, whether well treated or not—a thing unheard of in the legislation of any civilized country. He said not so too harsh a term when he said, that he had authorized the corporation to catch every unprotected orphan in the District, and hold them in servitude. The bill was degrading to this unfortunate class of persons, and was opposed to principles that had been deemed sacred for ages. By the laws of the country from which we have derived our jurisprudence, the care of these orphans is confided to one of their highest judicial tribunals; but this bill takes the orphan from the courts, and turns him over, without appeal, to an irresponsible corporation.

Mr. Allen thanked his friend from Alabama for calling the attention of the senate to this subject. The principle of the bill was simply this: it was to incorporate a few citizens of this district to take charge of all the unfortunate orphan children found within its limits, and to work them till of age. The bill did not impose on the corporation the obligation of teaching these children trades, or, in fact, of teaching them any thing at all. The whole of the unfortunate orphan children of this District who have no one to protect them, are to be turned over to this corporation, to be worked as slaves till they are twenty-one years of age. And this was not all. This corporation was to have the power of transferring the services of these children to any one they pleased; and no court whatever would have the power of releasing them from servitude. He would undertake to say, that if the whole history of the civilized world was searched into, a parallel to this bill could not be found. It was odious for its injustice, odious for its cruel and odious for its rapacity; and the whole of this odious principle was covered up in a mass of words. It was very imposing, too, in its title, being called, or rather miscalled, an orphan asylum. If there was any thing true on earth, it was that governments should be the protectors of the poor, the fatherless, and the needy; and here you propose to turn over the most unfortunate of these to a heartless corporation, to be worked as slaves. Mr. A. contended that though congress, as the local legislature of the District, had the guardianship of these orphans, it had no right to transfer them to a corporation. Nothing could be said to justify this bill.

Mr. Wall made a few remarks in defence of the bill, contending that it was not liable to the objections of the senators from Ohio and Alabama, and went into a history of the rise and progress of the institution, which, he said, was founded in motives of benevolence.

After some remarks from Mr. Clay, of Alabama—the question was taken on the reconsideration, and carried; and the bill was then laid on the table.

A message was received from the house of representatives, stating that they had not concurred in the amendments of the senate to the bill making appropriation for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the government for the year 1839; the amendments were, first, to strike out the provision that the printing of the executive departments should be done by contract; and the second was, striking out the provision for distributing copies of the Documentary History of the United States to the members of the senate and house of representatives.

Mr. Wright moved that the senate insist, and that a conference with the house be asked; which was agreed to.

Numerous bills from the house were acted on; after which the senate took a recess until 6 o'clock.

Evening session. Mr. Wright, on the committee of conference, appointed to consider the disagreement of the two houses on the amendments of the senate to the general appropriation bill, reported that the managers appointed to conduct the conference on the part of the senate, and the managers on the part of the house, had agreed to recommend to their respective houses to adopt the following course: that the senate should recede from so much of its amendment as provides for the manner of executing the printing for the executive departments, with an amendment providing that the printing shall be done in the city of Washington; and that the senate insist on so much of their amendment as relates to the distribution of the Clarke and Force papers to members of the senate, leaving it in the power of the house to make the distribution to its own members, while any such distribution to members of the senate is prohibited.

Mr. Benton said he never would agree to this report, and he demanded the yeas and noes on concurring in it. This system of distributing books had grown up to an enormous abuse, indeed the most enormous abuse in our government. He would oppose it to the last; and if the appropriation bill was lost in consequence, and the government stopped, why let the responsibility rest on those who would incur the risk for the sake of securing to themselves three or four hundred dollars' worth of books.

Mr. Wright asked that the questions on concurring with the recommendations of the committee of conference be taken separately, which was accordingly ordered.

Mr. Tallmadge inquired whether the bill would be lost, in case either of the two houses would agree to recede from the ground taken by them.

The president answered that that question was not before the committee; but it was obvious that if one house should insist on its amendments, and the other should insist on its disagreement, and no compromise could be effected, the bill would be lost.

Mr. Tallmadge observed that if the house of representatives saw fit to vote for a distribution of books to its members, he would be willing to let them take the responsibility, and settle the matter with their constituents. He would, therefore, vote for concurring with the recommendations of the committee of conference.

Mr. Norvell said that if any principle was involved, it applied as well to the distribution to the members of the house as of the senate. He should, therefore, vote against concurring in the report.

Mr. Walker rose for concurring with the committee. If that was not done, the result would be that the whole bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the government would be lost. The government, throughout all its departments, legislative, executive, and judicial, would be brought to a close; and that, too, at a period of all others the most unfortunate. Other senators might think it would be less dangerous to lose this bill than to suffer members of the house to vote themselves a few books. He hoped the senator from Michigan would reconsider his determination, and let the report of the committee be concurred in.

Mr. Benton said that the consequence of the senate adhering to the resolution it had taken on the subject of the distribution of these books, might be the loss of the bill now pending; and as that bill contains the appropriations necessary for keeping the government in action, gentlemen were a great deal alarmed at the danger of the government's stopping short. They would like to see the result of the vote? It will rest on those who have personal interests in these books; and those members, therefore, who are to receive these books, ought not to be permitted to vote on this question, in which they are personally interested.

The president here said that the discussion was not in order, that, by the joint rules, when a committee of conference was asked for by one house, and assented to by the other, the report of the conference, together with all the papers, should first be presented to the house that assented to the conference. Under this rule, therefore, the report and papers were sent by the secretary to the house of representatives.

A message was received from the house of representatives, stating that the house had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the amendments to the general appropriation bill, and resolved that the bill do pass accordingly.

The question was then taken on concurring in that part of the recommendation of the committee of conference as relates to the printing of the executive departments, and carried.

The question then recurring on concurring in that part of the report which relates to the distribution of the Clarke and Force documents—

Mr. Benton warmly opposed concurring in the agreement. He objected to it because it made a distinction between the two houses—allowing a distribution of books to the members of the house, while it refused a distribution of the books to the senate. He objected to it because a distribution of books to either house was wrong in principle. Several gentlemen seemed to fear that if the senate insisted on its amendment, the appropriation bill would be lost, and the wheels of government stop; but could they suppose there was any member of either house who would be willing to break up this government for the sake of retaining his share of these books, which was not worth more than three hundred and thirty dollars at the price they cost the government, and which it sold to Mr. Templeman, or any other bookseller, would not bring the full or quarter of that sum. Now he was determined, as far as it depended on him, to put it to the test, whether any member of congress would be willing to put an end to this government for the sake of retaining his three hundred and thirty dollars' worth of these books.

Mr. B. here enlarged on the growing evil of this system of distributing books to members of congress; and in illustration, alluded to the manner in which another proposition to distribute books had been run through the senate last night. A resolution was offered by a senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. Webster), to distribute among the members two volumes relating to the land laws. He had given full notice of his opposition to this resolution, and his intention to oppose it when it came up for consideration. Yet, in the course of a fatiguing session of eight or nine hours, he had been absent from his seat but a few moments, and in those few moments this distribution was galloped through. It was presented to the senate while he (Mr. B.) was in his seat; objected to by him; then withdrawn; taken up in his absence, and hastily run through. This being a wrong concern was one of the most crying abuses in our system. There was no end to it—it ran round in a continued circle. In the first place, a sufficient number of books are ordered to supply the members of a congress. At the ensuing session, the new members are to be supplied; and this is easily done, and in the following manner: some of the members who had already received copies, may sell them to Mr. Templeman, and he sells them at a small advance to the publishers, and they are furnished to the new members at government prices as new books, who, in their turn, sell them to Mr. Templeman, and the process goes on ad infinitum, so that the original fifteen hundred copies may supply fifteen thousand members, the government, at every re-election of the senate, paying the full price. He hoped the senate would insist on its amendment, and let the people of the country see what members of congress were willing to break up the government to hold on to the books they had voted to buy.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, said he had never voted for a purchase or distribution of books in his life. He was opposed to the whole matter, and thought it a most serious abuse. He would not, however, incur the hazard of such a serious embarrassment as would result to the government from the loss of the appropriation bill. He would, therefore, vote for agreeing to the report of the committee of conference, and let the members of the house take the responsibility of voting books for themselves.

The question was then taken on agreeing with the report of the committee of conference, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 24, nays 7, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Campbell, Foster, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Lewis, Merrick, Nicholas, Nor ell, Pierce, Ranne, Sevier, Smith, T. Johnson, Sanborn, Swift, Tallmadge, Walker, Webster, Williams, of Maine, Williams, of Mississippi, and Wright—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, White Niles, Robinson, Smith, of Connecticut, and White—7.

The honorable William R. King having temporarily retired from the chair.

Mr. Tallmadge submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the thanks of the senate be presented to the honorable William R. King, for his able, impartial, and dignified conduct as presiding officer of this body.

Mr. Davis heartily concurred in the resolution, and hoped that it would meet with the unanimous concurrence of the senate.

Mr. Southard hoped the word "unanimous" would be inserted in the resolution.

Several members were heard at the same time expressing the same wish.

Mr. Tallmadge modified his resolution by inserting the word unanimous, and the resolution was then unanimously adopted.

Mr. Tallmadge moved that a joint resolution for the distribution, in part, of the Madison papers, be taken up; which was agreed to, and the resolution was passed.

Mr. T. moved that the 16th and 17th joint rules be suspended, so as to permit this resolution to be sent to the house for concurrence; which was also agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Wright,

Ordered, That the secretary inform the house of representatives that, having completed the legislative business before them, the senate was ready to adjourn.

A message was received from the house of representatives by Mr. Garland, their clerk, stating that they had passed a joint resolution for the appointment of a joint committee, to wait on the president of the United States and inform him that the two houses of congress had completed the business before them, and were ready to adjourn, if he had no further communications to make.

On motion by Mr. Hubbard, the resolution was approved in, and Mr. Hubbard and Mr. Fulton were appointed on the part of the senate.

A message was received from the house of representatives, stating that they had passed the joint resolution of the senate for the distribution, in part, of the Madison papers.

Mr. Benton, asked what resolution? He had been in his seat, with the exception of a few minutes, the whole day and the whole night, and he had not the least recollection of any resolution of the kind having passed, and this was the first intimation he had that any such resolution was before the senate.

Mr. Allen also said that he had no knowledge of any such resolution having passed, and he believed he was in the chamber at the time of its passage.

Mr. Williams, of Mississippi, stated that he was in the chair when the consideration of the resolution was called for by the senator from New York, (Mr. Tallmadge). The resolution was taken up, considered and adopted, with all the forms that are used on the passage of a resolution. He wished to know if the senator from Missouri intended to impute any incorrectness of conduct to the chair in the proceedings on the resolution.

Mr. Benton. Not at all—not at all. He was out of his seat at the time, and knew nothing of what was done, or how it was done; he only knew it was quickly done. He was out of his seat but a few minutes; was invited out of it into a near room; was, in fact, invited out several times before he went; and was out but a few minutes. He knew nothing of what was done until since he came back.

He certainly imputed no blame to the senator from Mississippi, neither thought it, or imputed it.

Mr. Trich said he had looked at the resolution, and found that it contained the certificate of the secretary, that it had passed. Without making any complaint as to the irregularity with which that resolution passed, he would only say, that if their secretary, or the secretary of any other body, distributed books under a resolution thus passed, he would so far as he (Mr. W.) was concerned, do it upon his responsibility.

Mr. Tallmadge said, that as to the responsibility attending this resolution, he avowed himself willing to meet it there or before the country. He had called on the resolution, and it had been acted on at his instance. He acknowledged that advantage had been taken of time and circumstances, but the same advantage had been taken of him and others in various instances. He did not pretend to be much of a Jackson man, but he was perfectly willing, as regarded his participation in this matter, to meet the responsibility.

Mr. Hubbard, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the president of the United States and inform him that the two houses of congress having finished the business before them, were ready to adjourn, provided he had no further communications to make, reported that they had performed the duty assigned them, and had received for answer that the president had no further communications to make to congress, and requested them to wish to each member of the senate a safe return to his family and his home.

Mr. Trich moved that the senate now adjourn. Mr. Hubbard hoped that the senate would not adjourn until they had consummated the business before them; that they would disregard this message, which had been sprung upon them—and spring upon them in an irregular manner, during the discussion of a pending question—and complete the business before them.

The question on adjournment was taken and decided in the negative.

Mr. Benton said this resolution could not pass. It was in the power of any one member to stop it, and he should use every effort to do so. It was then after midnight—it was two o'clock—there is not a quorum of the senate present; messages of adjournment have passed between the two houses and with the president, and no act, save the adjournment, can be done except by unanimous consent, which hides and covers up irregularities. The resolution had better be dropped; it cannot be passed until the senate is present. Mr. B. said it was now after two o'clock, and half past two o'clock, and he moved that the senate do now adjourn, and that the hour be entered on the journal. It was now half past two o'clock on the 4th day of March, and the constitutional existence of the senate was at an end. This was the fact, and he wanted it on the journal.

Mr. Tallmadge inquired if the motion to enter the hour on the journal was in order.

The president stated that by the rules, any member who moved an adjournment had the right to have the hour at which such motion was made entered on the journal.

The entry was accordingly made on the journal. The president said that before taking the question on adjournment, he would ask the indulgence of the senate, for a few remarks. He regretted exceedingly that he had left his situation in the chair for a moment, as it had led most probably to unpleasant feelings. He had hoped that at this hour, when they were about to separate, nothing would have occurred to mar the harmony of the body, or interrupt the feelings of personal kindness so appropriate to the occasion. He had endeavored, while presiding over their deliberations, to which he had been called by the kindness of the senate, to discharge his duties to the extent of his ability—faithfully he believed, honestly he knew he had; and he regretted, deeply he regretted, that any thing should have occurred during his temporary absence from the chair, to induce unpleasant feelings, and prevent a harmonious adjournment.

Mr. Benton said that every word spoken by the president [Mr. King], went into his heart, and found a resting place there. Like him, he wished a harmonious adjournment; like him, he wished all to separate with feelings of personal kindness; and that for very purpose he had moved the adjournment. It was the quiet and easy way to get rid of an unpleasant subject; to avoid a struggle which will lead to no results; for the resolution could not become a law. He wished to drop it as it was; and then there would be nothing to mar the kind feelings which prevailed, and which all would wish, with the president, to see preserved.

The question was then taken on the adjournment, and decided in the negative—ayes 6, noes 12, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Hubbard, King and Williams, of Mississippi—5.
 NAYS—Messrs. Foster, Fulton, Lyon, Merrick, Nicholas, Norvell, Roane, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall and Wine—12.

Mr. Benton said it was now entered on the journal that it was half past 2 o'clock in the morning, and no quorum, only eighteen members present; and he now made a motion, which was addressed to the president himself. In doing so, he would cite the example of Mr. Mason, whom they all knew, and to whom no man was more scrupulous. Mr. Mason held that at 12 o'clock at night, on the 31 of March of the short session, his powers as a senator ceased, and if the senate was not willing to adjourn at that time, he went away. Now, Mr. President, (said Mr. B.) I believe that at this hour half past 2 o'clock in the morning of the 4th of March, you have no authority here, and I have no right to address you. I therefore mean to make the question with you, whether, at this hour, you have power to act. The chair has given notice that he is going to sign the resolution, and I object to it. It is the 4th of March, and no quorum.

The president said it was a very common thing at the close of the congress to sit and do business after midnight on the 31 of March.

Mr. Benton said he knew it was, but in such cases the fact was kept out of the journals; all appeared there to have been done on the 31 of March. The journal went on headed the 31, and the approval of the president bears date the 31. But now this is not the case. The time is marked on the journal; it is marked the morning of the 4th, and the whole proceeding will be invalid on its face.

The president was of opinion that he could not sign the resolution when a quorum of the senate was not present, and so stated to the senate.

Mr. Benton said, as there was no quorum present, he hoped the senate would adjourn.

Several members said they hoped not; that a quorum would be soon present, and said that the chair could dispatch the sergeant-at-arms after the absences.

Mr. Benton said he had no right to send the sergeant-at-arms after members; that all power over senators was at an end.

The question was then taken on adjournment, and decided in the negative.

Mr. Merrick then made a few remarks in relation to the passage of the resolution. He said he was interested in the senate, but knew not of the passage of this resolution. In fact, he did not know that the resolution had been presented for the consideration of the senate, until he was informed that it had passed. He was in favor of the object of the resolution, and would have voted for it if he had been aware of its having been before the senate.

Mr. Walker said, in regard to the resolution, he had understood such a one was to be offered, and not having been offered, he had concluded that it had been abandoned. The first actual knowledge he had of the resolution being before the senate, was hearing its title pronounced by the voice of his colleagues, (Mr. Williams). I did not know what it meant. He read the resolution. I heard him distinctly put the question; and the various questions that are usually put on the passage of a resolution, were put as fully, and as clearly as they generally are, and the question was carried as fairly, and the senate was, as full, as it was when a majority of the acts passed by that body were carried.

Mr. Roane said that he knew no more of the passage of that resolution than the child unborn. He must have been in the chamber at the time, but he had never heard it called up, nor any question taken on it. With respect, however, to these Madison papers, he looked on them in a very different light from the trash that was so often published by congress. He had received this very evening, from a distinguished gentleman in Virginia, a letter asking information about them. It was a letter abounding with good sense, and ploring a proper estimation on these papers. With this letter in his hand, he went round to the seat of his friend from Missouri, and endeavored to soften his rigid resolution with regard to the distribution of books, so as to make the Madison papers an exception. He endeavored to put these papers in contrast with the trash that was put abroad under the sanction of congress, which may, perhaps, form the materials for a spurious history of the country. He represented that these Madison papers had already been published, and that there would be an abridgement, after paying for them, to put them away in the garret, with the trash that has lumbered there among the cobwebs of time. The senator from Missouri stated the terms on which he would agree to the distribution of this particular work, and that was to make a general distribution throughout the union and into every state; and he desired me to go to the secretary's table, and get the clerk to make out a list of the general distribution of documents, and then he would support it. Mr. R. then descended at length on the great value of the Madison papers; the importance that the information contained in them should be disseminated as widely as possible, and the absurdity of locking them up from the public view, after having paid for printing them. He did not consider the works of James Madison of the same nature with those publications with which it had been the custom of the two houses to supply their members—a custom more honored in the breach than in the observance—and he hoped that the resolution of the senator from Missouri, with regard to distributing books, would not, like the rigid laws of the Medes and Persians, be applied to them.

Mr. Benton said the reference of the senator from Virginia (Mr. Roane) to him was correct; he had refused to agree to a distribution of the Madison papers to the members of congress, but was willing to a general distribution, according to the general distribution of documents, and desired the senator from Virginia to get that list from one of the clerks, and either omit the members of congress, or a quorum to pay the cost. This general distribution would carry the work into every state—its senate and house of representatives—its executive offices—its colleges and universities—to all the literary offices of the general government—to the library of congress—to the offices of the secretary of the senate and clerk of the house of representatives, and many others. It would distribute eleven or twelve hundred copies, and place them in every part of the union, and in the best hands for preservation and for use. Gentlemen were debating as if the only alternatives were between an exclusive and gratuitous distribution of these papers to members of congress, or a consignment of them to the worms in the garret, and an everlasting loss of them to mankind. This was rather wild. The distribution which he proposed would have saved them from the worms, would have given them to the whole union, and to all mankind; it would have curtailed nobody but members of congress.

The president said that on further consideration, and consulting the clerk, he was of opinion that it did not require a quorum to be present at the time the signing of the resolution. It was not proper to be done by the chair to authenticate the act. Holding this opinion, he would now proceed to sign the joint resolution.

Mr. Benton said the signing could only be done in the presence of the senate, and there was no senate when there was no quorum. Every signing was a public act. The presiding officer gave an audible notice of it; the senate ceased to act; no senator could speak; nothing could be done while the president was signing. Mr. B. was ready of opinion that acts could only be signed when the senate was formed and a quorum present.

The chair then signed the resolution.

Mr. Allen said that the resolution could not now go to the president for his signature. There is no committee of the house of representatives which is necessary to form the joint committee, to call the members on the part of the senate to carry it out. The house of representatives had adjourned and dispersed, and the two members who composed part of the joint committee to take bills to the president, had ceased to exist as members of congress; the body to which they belonged had ceased to exist.

The resolution could not be carried; there is no authority existing which could carry it.

Mr. Foster said that he would carry it. He was a member on the part of the senate of the joint committee, and he had once carried a bill to the president alone, but he had ascertained that he had made a mistake.

[Mr. Foster and Mr. Merrick, the committee on the part of the senate, then left the chamber with the joint resolution.]

Mr. Benton said the impediments were not yet surmounted, there was a little difficulty to be encountered, when the committee got back. He had the rules in his hand, and would read them at the proper time. It is now 4 o'clock on the morning of Monday the 4th of March; the house of representatives adjourned and gone, and no quorum here. There are obstacles ahead.

Mr. White said he would state what he knew respecting the passage of this resolution. He had just come into the senate chamber, when he heard the senator occupying the chair [Mr. Williams] ask if a resolution should be taken up. He gave a very particular designation it escaped my ear. The presiding officer put the question, and it was passed, several voices voting in the affirmative. Not knowing what it was, what it contained, I asked for the reading of it, and it was handed to me. As there was no discussion on the subject, no division asked, and none taken, and consequently deeming the question an unimportant one, he voted neither ay nor no. He himself was opposed to the principle of distributing books among the members of congress; but none of those whose head he was accustomed to follow on this subject, opposing this resolution, and on looking around and observing that the senator from Missouri [Mr. Benton] was not in his seat, he thought it was an unimportant matter, and did not expect to hear any thing more about it.

[The committee who waited on the president for his signature to the joint resolution, having arrived in the senate chamber.]

Mr. Benton rose to a point of order—to have things done in order. One of the most salutary acts of the two houses is that of sending bills to the president to be signed; it has to be done in a prescribed form, and reported and recorded in a prescribed form. Upon this depends all the questions connected with the two days' constitutional right of the president to retain a bill—his culpability if he does not return it—the prevention of the return by the adjournment of congress—the efficacy of the bill as a law if not returned in time, unless prevented by an adjournment. All this makes the presentation of the bill to the president one of the most formal and serious acts of legislation; and therefore the rules had carefully provided to make the presentation a matter of record in each house of congress—a record, the verity of which could not be impeached, and which would require no extrinsic evidence to support it. A standing committee was to carry it; that committee was to be joint; it was to be composed of two members from each house; and these two members of each house were to make report to their houses, respectively, that the bill has been presented, carefully stating the day on which it was presented; and then this report was to be entered on the journals of each house.

[Mr. B. here read the rules, to show that he stated them correctly.]

He said these rules could not have been complied with in this case. The joint standing committee was dissolved by the dissolution of the house of representatives. The hall committee of the senate was a novelty without the other hall from the house of representatives. No record could be made in the house of representatives, which had been adjourned for two hours, and no such record can be made here, as the rules imperatively require. I call the attention of the secretary of the senate to the rules in the entry which he is to make. The senators will report what they have done; and that is, they went without the committee of the house to the president, and went on the 4th of March; and there ends the work for which we have been kept here so many hours. It drops now, as I proposed it should drop three hours ago.

Mr. Merrick reported that within the last hour the committee had placed in the hands of the president a joint resolution for the distribution, in part, of the Madison papers.

Mr. Tallmadge moved that the senate adjourn sine die.

Benton asked if a majority of the senate could adjourn sine die. He thought they could only adjourn from day to day, until a quorum was present.

The president decided that the senate could adjourn sine die, and

The senate adjourned, sine die, at 20 minutes past 4 o'clock, A. M.

CHRONICLE.

A new continent. Capt. Pendleton, of the whole ship Caledonia, recently arrived at S oinington, reports having met at Talcahuana with commodore D'Urville's exploring expedition. The new continent the commodore spoke of discovering in S. lat. 60, capt. Pendleton has no doubts Palmer's Land discovered by the Americans in 1820-21. Commodore D'Urville told him—

The briny pyramidal shower from the blows of the Leviathans of the deep were continually in view during the day light, in every direction, and were constantly so near, a d around the corvettes, that ever and anon could be heard the sounding roar of those giants of the ocean breaking through the air in their spoutings to obtain their respirations.

The crews of the French squadron, from the bad construction of the vessels, suffered greatly from scurvy.

Lead ore. The York Republican of Thursday says; "We were shown a few days ago by a gentleman, an apparently very rich specimen of lead ore, which he informed us was discovered in the quarry of Mr. Adam Babn, in Hellam township, about midway on the turnpike road between York and Wrightville. The same quarry has produced very numerous specimens of lead ore, and the following is the result. We are not informed of the extent of the vein of lead ore, which had just been discovered, and was not traced far when the specimen was taken out which was exhibited to us."

Presidents of the United States. The Savannah Georgian of Friday, the 15th instants, says: "Ex-president Jackson to-day completes his 72d year, having been born on the 15th of March, 1767. General Washington died in his 63th year; Mr. Adams, the elder, in his 91st; Mr. Jefferson in his 84th; Mr. Madison in his 86th; and Mr. Monroe in his 73d year. Ex-president J. Q. Adams is now in his 74th or 75th year; Mr. Van Buren is 57 or thereabouts.

London gin shops. The rev. Dr. Weight, curate of St. George the Martyr, in his address on the opening of the national schools in that parish, stated that a calculation had been made of the number of persons that frequented fourteen gin shops in that parish in a week, and the following is the result: 14,243 men, 15,550 women, and 18,339 children, making a total of 299,137, or 7,419 per diem in each.

Havre general hospital. "An act of impartiality," says the London Atlas, "which deserves to be recorded, has lately been shown by the authorities of Havre, who, desirous of extending the usefulness of the general hospital of the town, and anxious to promote the comfort of the foreign inmates, chiefly composed of British and American seamen, have appointed Mr. Parrall, an English practitioner, resident in the place, to be one of the medical officers of the institution and head of the foreign ward. This is, probably, the only appointment of the kind on the continent."

Tobacco inspection. Inspected in the city and county of New York, in the year 1835, with the average price per pound, and the probable value thereof, as near as could be ascertained:

7,920 hds., mostly Kentucky, weighing net 7,504,000, at $10,	$750,400 00
Amount of the gross receipts of the office in 1833,	13,738 25
Expenses, comprising clerks hire, warehouse rent, coopers, laborers, nails, and other materials,	16,719 50
Net receipts	$2,078 75

In the city of Philadelphia, from the 12th March, 1833, to 31st December, 1833, the quantity of tobacco inspected was 3,470 hds.

In Baltimore, during the year 1833, the quantity of tobacco inspected was 23,626 hds.

Another steambot burned. A slip from the New Orleans Bulletin brings us an account of the burning of the steambot Galenia, captain Delahoussaye, on the 7th inst., while navigating the bayou Teche, about 14 miles from the mouth of the bayou. The passengers were all in bed when the alarm was given, and scarcely had time to escape with their lives. The origin of the fire is unknown. It broke out in the hold nearly under the ladies' cabin—and the principal part of the cargo being of a combustible nature, in a few moments the boat was completely enveloped in flames. The officers and crew used every exertion to save the lives and property of the passengers. From the Planter's Banner we take the following account of the cargo and passengers.

A quantity of provisions was thrown overboard and will be recovered. She had 40,000 sugar and 100,000 molasses on board, 20,000 of which was in casks. The boat was insured to the amount of $5,000. Capt. Delahoussaye will lose about $7,000. J. P. Miller has lost $2,000 in merchandise; Messrs. Davidson, of Cincinnati, $2,000 in merchandise; Messrs. Hartman and Peot, of this place, have also lost merchandise to the amount of about $1,000. Mrs. Morse, of St. Martinsville, lost $25 and her baggage—not 3,000 as reported by the Bulletin.

The Galenia was declared beyond her usual time, in consequence of having got aground in lake Chicot. Annexed are the names of as many passengers as we could procure.

Mrs. Delahoussaye, Mrs. Pelier Delahoussaye, Mr. and Mrs. Davidson and children, Mrs. Mace, P. D. Richardson, E. P. Dwight, W. Moore, Dr. Sullivan and N. L. McCasle.

Fast travelling. It is stated in the Wilmington (N. C.) Journal that the mail is now carried from New York to Charleston, (by way of the Wilmington and Raleigh rail road) in eighty-four hours.

Pennsylvania appointments. The Harrisburg Keystone states, that the 2d of April has been fixed by the supreme court for the argument in Philadelphia of the quo warranto writ against Judge Darlington, of Chester county. This question involves the principle of judicial rotation under the amended constitution, and is of great importance, both to judge Darlington and all future judges of the courts of common pleas. The counsel for the commonwealth are the attorney general and colonel J. M. Porter, and for the respondent Mr. Sergeant and Mr. Meredith.

For Liberia. The executive committee of the colonization society at Washington, announces that the ship Saluda is expected to arrive at Philadelphia, about the middle of June, and that she will return to Liberia, and will be ready to take emigrants or goods, from Philadelphia about the 25th of July, and from Norfolk, where the ship will touch for the purpose, about the 1st of August. The Saluda is fitted out as a packet, is a fast sailer, and has the best accommodations for passengers. This affords a favorable opportunity for emigrants.

The temporary state loan of seventy-five thousand dollars has been taken by the Harrisburg bank.

Consul. The president of the United States has also appointed Manuel Alvarez consul for the city of Santa Fe, in Mexico.

Maryland. At a meeting of the whig members of the legislature of Maryland, held on Tuesday evening, the 19th inst. at Annapolis, Revery John, esq., of Baltimore, and John N. Steele, of Dorchester county, were appointed senatorial delegates from that state to the whig national convention.

New Hampshire. Among the devices at the recent election was a hand bill, issued at the Newport office. It was a wood engraving of a coffin, about a foot long, with a death's head and bones at the top, and upon which was the following inscription, in starting characters:

IN MEMORY OF

JONATHAN CILLEY,

The Independent Democratic Representative in Congress, from the State of Maine, who was deliberately murdered in open day,

BY HENRY A. WISE,

(Whig leader in Congress, from Virginia.)

FEBRUARY 23d, 1838.

Democrats of New Hampshire! The blood of the murdered Cilley cries to you from the ground for vengeance! Remember that the whig party are all implicated in this most atrocious MURDER; for they openly approve of it! Note, then, the Democratic tincter, and prostrate the whig party as they have the LAMENTED CILLEY.

Judge Wilkinson and Mr. Mardach have been acquitted at Harrodsburg, Ky. They were principals in the murderous affray that occurred at the Galt House, in Louisville, last winter, which resulted in the death of one or more persons. The jury were out but three or four minutes; eleven of the jurors were for rendering a verdict of "not guilty" without leaving the box, but the twelfth objected to that course. Col. Robertson, Mr. Hardin, judge Rowan, and the hon. S. S. Prentiss, of Miss., were the counsel for the accused.

The baths of Philadelphia. Owing to the copious supply of water from Farmont, it is the good fortune of Philadelphia enjoy the luxury of bathing, in a way superior to most cities of Europe or America, as the following table will show. It is taken from the last year's report of the watering committee:

The city proper has 1,673 private baths,	paying	$5,061 00
Doing public, one of which pays		300 00
The other 9 pay		360 00
Northern Liberties, 195 private baths,		877 50

Two thousand one hundred and sixty-four baths, supplied with an undiminished quantity of water, for seven thousand eight hundred and eighty-seven dollars!

Not. Gazette.

Appropriations by congress. As soon as we can find room for it, we will publish the list of appropriations made at the last session of congress. The following summary will suffice for the present.

Civil and diplomatic	$9,010,031 57
Army, fortifications, and military academy	16,556,233 65
Navy	5,130,731 64

Current expenses of the Indian department	1,745,007 25
Preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities	1,856,774 00
To promote the progress of the useful arts	9,259 92
Private claims	45,065 27

Louisiana. Governor Roman has vetoed several internal improvement bills passed by the Louisiana legislature. They were acts, loaning the credit of the state in the form of bonds, to the amount of $4,500,000, in favor of incorporated companies, to expedite the construction of the Sabine and Port Hudson rail road; the Atchafalaya rail road; the Barataria and Lafourche canal; and the Baton Rouge and Clinton rail road.

His objection is to the system of loaning bonds to internal improvement companies, as not sufficiently safe to the state, from their generally unproductive character. He has also objections arising from the amount of borrowing and the interest to be paid, and the interference of the proposed loan with former loans, and the credit of the state.

The bill granting the aid of the state to the New Orleans and Nashville rail road company has passed both branches of the legislature. This measure will secure the completion of the rail road, from New Orleans to the Mississippi state line.

The English bark Ambassador lately arrived at the port of Houston, Texas, from Liverpool, and is to be taken on to Galveston, and Port Hudson, and to the market. This is the commencement of a direct trade between England and Texas.

The house of representatives of the state of Michigan has passed a bill incorporating a state bank, with nine branches. The Detroit papers suppose that it will also pass the senate.

Earthquake at Porto Rico. Porto Rico papers received in New Orleans give the particulars of the disasters which happened at St. Lucie, in consequence of the late earthquake which was felt in almost all the French Antilla islands. The commotion is said to have continued for more than thirty seconds, and even all the houses built of fine stone were considerably, if not of less damage. The parochial church of Castries, an edifice remarkable for its beauty and strength, has been thrown down in many places. The iron casern known by the name of the casern of Mons Fortune, bears the marks of the shock, and most of the pavilions in which the officers dwell are uninhabitable. The town of San Juan, the capital of the island, has suffered. The belfry of the church has fallen, and most of the houses have been overturned. The total losses amount to a considerable sum.

Illinois. During the late session of the Illinois legislature, liberal provision was made for the prosecution of works of internal improvement. A rail road is ordered to be built from Rushville to Erie, on the Illinois river, and $100,000 appropriated for its construction. Another rail road is ordered to be built at Carlinville, to intersect the Alton and Terre Haute road. Appropriations are made for the Embarras, Spoon and Big Muddy rivers, and additional ones to the Little Wabash and Rock river. Twenty-five thousand dollars were ordered to be distributed out of the internal improvement fund, to purchase raw cottons made in two years since, which have no rail road to the market through them, Cass county gets $3,500. Scott is also to get $2,000, to be expended on the road leading from Winchester to Augusta, in Pike county. A bill was also passed appropriating $4,000,000 for the continuation of the Illinois and Michigan canal. This sum, it is supposed, will secure the certain and early completion of the work.

Baltimore American.

Commerce of Philadelphia. We learn from the Commercial List, that during the years 1837, and 1838, the number of arrivals on goods, and passengers, and from foreign countries direct into the port of Philadelphia, have been as follows, viz:

	Value of imports.	Amount of duties.
1837,	$10,130,438	$1,820,993 21
1833,	10,417,815	2,109,955 30

Showing a considerable increase during the past year. The prospects for the present year are flattering, as the number of arrivals have greatly increased, and many of the cargoes have been large and valuable.

Rhode Island. The democratic republican convention of this state have nominated Nathaniel Bullock, of governor, and Benjamin B. Thurston for lieutenant governor, of Rhode Island.

Mississippi. The Natchez Courier estimates the debt of the state at sixty millions of dollars, which will be paid in about fifteen years.

Temperance. The Lynn Freeman says, "the cause of temperance has had an unfavorable effect upon the receipts of our inland house. A few years ago we had now enough there to make, in shoe making and repairs of roads, over $2,000,000 worth of carrying on the farm. Now there are not enough to carry on the farm."

The burning mine. The Paville Emporium, in speaking of Mr. Dougherty's coal mine near that place, which took fire in January, two persons being suffocated by it, adds that "it still continues to burn, and no exertions have impeded the progress of the flames. The mouth of the drift and every air-hole have been tightly closed for plaster, and in a few moments it has burst forth in another quarter with a volcanic explosion. At first, the coal was so hot that the clippings and loose coal were on fire; but from the length of time and increasing fury of the flames, it is now almost beyond doubt that the solid body of coal is burning. It is the jugular vein—the largest in Broad mountain, and its great eminence precludes the possibility of extinguishing the flame by turning the course of some stream."

NILES' NATIONAL REGISTER.

FIFTH SERIES. No. 6.—VOL. VI.]

WASHINGTON CITY, APRIL 6, 1839.

[VOL. LVI.—WHOLE No. 1,436

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED, EVERY SATURDAY, BY WILLIAM OGDEN NILES, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

☞The painful event which compelled the editor of the "REGISTER" to absent himself from his post during the present week, will render an apology for the contents of the present number unnecessary.

DEATH OF HEZEKIAH NILES
It is our painful duty to announce the death of HEZEKIAH NILES, the founder of this work, who died at Wilmington, Delaware, on Tuesday morning last, in the 63d year of his age. In the absence of the editor of the "REGISTER," we can do no more than give place to the following notice of his father's death, from the Delaware Journal of the 3d instant. A more extended biographical notice will be published hereafter.

From the Delaware Journal.
DIED, this morning, at his residence in this place, HEZEKIAH NILES, esq. in the 63d year of his age.

Mr. Niles will long be remembered as the able and patriotic editor of the Baltimore Weekly Register, a work which, during the better days of the republic, exercised a most salutary influence upon the policy, institutions and interests of the country. As a writer, his style was forcible, perspicuous and original; his memory was a storehouse of facts and statistics; and in every thing he wrote or published, an ardent patriotism, only equalled by as ardent a love of truth, and gave to his writings a popularity, weight and influence throughout the country, honorable alike to him and to those who so justly appreciated the united influence of talent, truth and patriotism. The Register, by its character and circulation in every part of the civilized world—was read in the palaces of kings, in the haunts of commerce, and in the cabin of the pioneer; it is referred to as an authority in courts of justice and in legislative assemblies; and at this day, constitutes the best and truest foundation extant of the history of our country, for the period over which it extends. As the founder and editor of a work, which contains a fuller and more faithful record than any other, of all the facts and events of his time; which sustained with enlightened and patriotic zeal the best and dearest interests of his country; which nobly advocated the cause of order, law and morality, the name of Hezekiah Niles will take a high stand among the patriots and benefactors of his country.

In private life, the deceased was one of the most amiable of men. A truer, or more constant friend, never lived—nor a more deeply attached husband and father. The gentler elements were so entirely mixed up with his nature, that harshness or unkindness found no abiding place in his bosom.

About three years since, with health broken down by the unremitting labor of more than twenty years, he removed from Baltimore to his native place—Wilmington—the residence of his youth and early manhood, the spot to which he had always looked back with fond affection, as the scene of his happiest days, and the haven in which he wished to find his final repose. He came but to linger, to suffer and to die. A distressing disease—one of those visitations with which an inscrutable Providence afflicts alike the just and the unjust—laid him on a bed of lingering illness and pain, from which he has at length found relief in that change which must come to all; and to none whose memory will be more deeply cherished than that of Hezekiah Niles.

☞We sincerely congratulate our readers upon the pacific aspect of the northeastern boundary question, which having gone back to the general government, (from which, by the way, it should never have been wrested), is, we hope, in a fair train of adjustment. The means by which this desirable change in the condition of the question was effected, are explained in the correspondence published in another page, which reflects the highest honor upon all the parties to it—but especially upon gen. Scott, whose untiring zeal, enlightened forecast and prudence, have been mainly instrumental in effecting the present settlement of the question.

Vol. VI. No. 6.

☞We have this week commenced the publication of the reports of the majority and minority of the committee appointed to investigate the defalcations of Samuel Swartwood, &c., and hope to complete them in five successive numbers of the "REGISTER" without materially interfering with the insertion of other articles claiming attention, although they make a book of 293 pages of document size. A copy of these reports could not, perhaps, be purchased for the price demanded for the entire volume of the "REGISTER," of the contents of which they will constitute a very small portion, and they will, no doubt, be acceptable to our readers, one of whom in an hundred have not seen a copy of the reports as published by order of the house of representatives.

☞The legislature of Pennsylvania adjourned on the 27th ult. to meet on the 9th inst.

BOMBARDMENT OF BUENOS AYRES. The Boston Transcript of Tuesday evening contains the following extract of a letter to a gentleman in that city, dated Rio Janeiro, Feb. 1, 1839.

There is a French frigate now in port which will sail day after to-morrow for the river, with materials on board for the purpose of bombarding or taking Buenos Ayres. The French are determined to assault the place; the government informed the English admiral of their intentions, and the latter despatched a vessel which arrived yesterday with orders for the English squadron to proceed down to protect the English residents there, otherwise to receive them on board. Before you receive this, Buenos Ayres will be in the hands of the French, or else the former will have yielded to the demands of the latter. This you can depend upon as being correct. Yours, truly,

SPECIAL MINISTER TO ENGLAND. The Eastern Argus of Monday denies, on authority, that the governor of Maine, its congressional delegation, and a majority of the members of the legislature, have signed an application to the president for the appointment of Mr. Webster as special minister to England.

In reply to the above, the N. Y. Commercial asserts that the recommendation has been made, and that the papers connected with it have been transmitted to the president.

CONNECTICUT ELECTIONS. The elections are over in that state, and the result is in favor of a whig governor, and a gain of six members to congress of the same politics. We annex a list of the members of congress elect, with their majorities.

A very large proportion of scattering votes were cast by whigs.

BANK SUSPENSIONS. Accounts from New Orleans states that the Commercial rail road bank at Vicksburg, has suspended specie payments. This is the bank whose stock has been running down in New York and Philadelphia for some days past, and the accounts, now received, show that the holders of the stock, who forced it into market, acted on information.

The branch of the bank of Darien, located in Savannah, has suspended specie payments. A letter from Savannah says the bank, and most likely all its branches, will follow suit. The state of Georgia owns half the stock.

The bills of the Hawkinsville bank of Georgia, and the Monroe R. R. bank of Macon are also refused by the other banks.

The N. York Express of Friday says—The news from the south is worse. Letters in town state that all the banks in Mississippi, except the Union bank at Jackson, have suspended specie payments.

STOCKS, &c. The Philadelphia U. S. Gazette states that the change in the presidency of the United States bank, slightly affected the stock in the market, as the announcement of that change came late in the morning.

Vicksburg bank stock looked downwards again and confidence in its worth was of course diminished. In New York the U. S. bank stocks sold at from $12 to $10. A further decline was expected.

The New York Express of Saturday last says, that the announcement that Mr. Bidde had resigned his post as president of the United States bank, created a great deal of excitement in Wall street this morning. Crowds of soon collected to learn the cause of the resignation. The impression at first was, that the resignation would have an unfavorable influence on stocks. The letter, however, soon became public, and, when the fact was announced that the bank was left in great prosperity, and that Mr. Bidde only desired repose from his labors, the public mind became quite relieved. Stocks, instead of falling, advanced. Even the stock of the bank of the United States was sustained.

Stocks. Notwithstanding the great excitement in the street, there was a general rise of stock. A good feeling manifested—increased confidence—large sales—Delaware went up—Kentucky rose—Harlem up—and stocks generally improved. United States, which was expected to fall, sold at 113-4 a 112, the same as yesterday.

From the U. S. Gazette of yesterday.

Notwithstanding the frequent complaints of the scarcity of money, we perceive that there is an advance in prices of stocks. For sales at the first and second boards we refer to the regular report. We learn, however, on inquiry, that considerable business was transacted after the close of the regular and normal meetings. For Vicksburg, holders demanded 38, while 57 were offered and refused—84 was offered for Kentucky, 84 asked. Wilmington and Baltimore rail road stock looks up again, 51 were bid, and 52 asked. For U. S. Bank 114 were bid and 115 asked.

Several shares of Philadelphia bank were made at 103, and subsequently some were sold at 106, and the same was offered for more but refused. This is a much more favorable state than we have reported for several days, and we hope that it is indicative of the approach of ease in the money market. The New York Journal of Commerce says: Letters from London, by the Siddons, say that colonel Gamble, president of the Union bank of Florida, has just completed the negotiation for which he went out, of a million and a half of Florida stock."

AMERICAN SECURITIES IN ENGLAND. A letter to the editors of the New York Courier, dated London, February 21, says:

"The feeling in relation to American securities is daily more favorable. Inquiries in relation to state bonds are very general, and many new descriptions meet a ready sale.

Among those recently offered, the Indiana sterling five per cents, and Florida six per cents, have both found purchasers at 95.

Those of Indiana have been negotiated, it is understood, through the house of Horsley Palmer, esq. for account of the North American Trust and Banking company of New York.

As the present feeling continues, the stocks of the state in good credit will hereafter find currency in the market to an extent that has not been realized since the ever memorable revision of 1836-7.

DR. DYOTT, THE BANKER. The Philadelphia papers state that the grand jury of that city have found a true bill containing the following counts:

1. Colluding and contriving with T. B. and C. W. Dyott, to conceal goods, value $100,000.
2. Fraudulently conveying to T. B. and C. W. Dyott, goods, value $50,000.

7. Fraudulently conveying to Julia Dyott furniture, value $1,000.
8. Concealing goods and merchandise, value $50,000.
9. Concealing $300,000 in money.
10. Concealing $100,000 in money.
11. Concealing $10,000 in money.

All with the expectation to receive future benefit to himself, and with the intent to defraud his creditors.

THE GREAT PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH CASE. This great and exciting controversy has been decided by the verdict of the special jury, impanelled in the case, in favor of the new school party. A quo warranto was taken out at the relation of the trustees elected by the new school party, to eject from office the trustees appointed by the old school party in the general assembly of 1835. Judge Rogers of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, before whom the cause was tried, charged the jury in favor of the relators, holding the excoision of the four synods of the Western Reserve, Geneva, Genesee and Utica, by the general assembly, in 1837, to be unconstitutional and void. On the question of organization he charged the jury that if the delegates were prevented from hearing the question or voting by the clamors, arts or measures of the new school party or audience, then the Bemen or new school assembly was illegal formed, and the relators must fail; but if they believed the confusion to have been the act of the defendants or of those who supported the Elliott, or of the school assembly, then they could take no advantage of their own wrong act, and the verdict must be for the relators. Messrs. Meredith, Wood and Randall for relators—Messrs. Ingersoll, Preston and Hubbell for defendants. The jury retired for a few minutes, and returned with a verdict against the defendants. The defendants have moved for a new trial on the law.

LOSS OF LIEUTENANT PAUL. The New Orleans Bulletin contains the following particulars of the loss of lieutenant Paul:

U. S. Ship Vandavia, off Tampico bay, March 11, 1839.

Messrs. Editors: About one o'clock yesterday morning, being forty miles to the northward and eastward of our present anchorage, acting lieutenant Henry J. Paul, whilst relieving the deck, lost his foothold and fell overboard from the poop.

In falling he struck the after gun, and was so stunned that he was unable to reach the left buoy, which was cut away immediately by lieutenant Gist, and fell but a few feet from him. The ship was instantly hove to, and a boat lowered for the purpose of making search. During its absence blue lights and false fires were burnt on board, and the sea was so lighted up that he might have been easily found. In an hour the boat returned with the left buoy, but our esteemed and unfortunate mess-mate had sunk to rise no more. Very respectfully, your obedient servant. J. VAUGHN SMITH, Surgeon.

STEAMBOAT ACCIDENT. The New Orleans Bulletin of the 26th ult. states that in ascending the Mississippi river, a few miles below Memphis, on her voyage to Louisville, the steamer Diana was discovered to be on fire. The moment the alarming fact was known, the hatches were closed and covered over with wet blankets, to arrest the progress of the flame, which was about bursting from the hold where it was first kindled. The boat was rounded to, and her head turned to the shore. In a few minutes she was at the land. The passengers and deck load were then safely deposited on the bank. The captain and crew afterwards proceeded to extinguish the fire, in which they succeeded, but not without the most strenuous exertions. The boat itself sustained little or no injury, but all the cargo in the hold was more or less damaged. The accident occasioned a detention of only six hours; after which the Diana resumed her voyage to Louisville.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT. The committee on imprisonment for debt in the Massachusetts legislature, introduced on the 24th ult. the following comprehensive bill on that subject.

Be it enacted, &c. as follows:—From and after the fourth day of July next, no person shall be imprisoned on any civil process founded in any action or proceeding instituted exclusively for the recovery of any debt: Provided, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect any provisions of law for the punishment of acts of fraud.

LEGISLATURE OF MARYLAND. On Tuesday last the bill, which seems to be an annual proposition, for the incorporation of a Real Estate bank, was finally disposed of in the house of delegates, by referring it to the consideration of the next general assembly.

Maryland improvements. The house of delegates had, yesterday afternoon, under consideration, the bill reported on Monday, by Mr. Spence, from the committee of ways and means, entitled an act to provide ways and means to meet the subscriptions on the part of the state, to works of internal improvement. This bill contains provisions for the conversion of the state six per cent. bonds issued to the Chesapeake and Ohio canal and Baltimore and Ohio rail road companies under the act of 1835, into 5 per cent. sterling bonds; and we learn, as stated in substance yesterday, that there is now good grounds for indulging the hope, that this bill, after undergoing such amendments, as will secure the necessary degree of aid to all the leading works of improvement in which the state is interested, will in that shape receive the sanction of both houses, and become a law. A consummation devoutly to be wished, as placing the great interests of Maryland on a sure foundation.

P. S. Since writing the above, we learn by our letter to-day from Annapolis, that the bill has been under discussion in the house, and that several amendments, offered with a purpose of defeating the measure, had been "unanimously voted down." Thus, and thus far, the auguries are quite favorable.

[Ball. Patriot.]

ATTEMPTED MAIL ROBBERY. The Richmond Courier of Monday says:—We understand that there was an attempt made to rob the mail between Fredericksburg and Potomac creek, on Saturday morning. The mail cart which preceded the passenger stages, was about a mile from the creek on the road to Fredericksburg, when attacked. It was overthrown, and the driver was so much weakened by his fall and the blows he received from the robber, as to be unable to defend the mail.

Fortunately, one of the passenger stages arrived just as the villain was about to cut loose the mail, and he ran off without it. The man who made the attack seemed to be alone.

CENAGA LAKE. Certainly nothing can much surpass the novel beauties of the scenery of this lake. The water transparent as the most polished mirror, and its surface undisturbed by a single ripple. Numerous volcanic islands, or large clumps of dark green bushes, whose branches dip into the lake, are scattered in all directions. Large birds of the most spotless white plumage had settled on the boughs, at sight of which, joined to the perfect transparency of the sky above, and the sweet blandness of the morning air, filled as it was with delicious perfume, transported us back to the nursery tales of fairy land. All that was wanting to complete the illusion was to be shut out from the presence of those foul-mouthed beasts, the bogas, who were the only mar to the enjoyment of so lovely a scene.

Even the very dullest of my companions could not share the admiration, and feel with me the effect produced by the surrounding view, which was thus so enchantingly presented. Far away in the back ground towering in view, the mountains of the Santa Marta range. To witness a sunrise on the Cenaga is certainly worth all the harassing fatigue one is obliged to endure in order to reach it. [Stewart's Bogota.]

FLORIDA. On Monday afternoon last fifteen of capt. Rowell's men, on a scout near the Sandy Ford in Jefferson county, discovered the trail of Indian on the plantation of Mr. Patterson. On pursuing a short distance, two Indians were discovered setting on the fence; a dash was made by the scout under lieutenant Wynn, when, on nearing the fence, they were fired on by a large party of Indians concealed behind it. Two men were killed and two wounded, one supposed mortally. The volunteers returned to the scene, and the Indian, who was one of their party, made a hasty retreat, leaving one of their party dead on the field. Early next morning captain Newsum's company, a company of dragoons, and regulars, and volunteers from Monticello, to the number in all of about two hundred men, went in pursuit. The trail was very large, and was pursued to the Augustine road, where the party scattered and again united a short distance south of the road where the trail was again taken by our forces. The course of the Indians was towards the large swamp and hammocks on the Ecofeence. The party was estimated to number from 70 to 80. The individuals killed were George Donaldson and Daniel Finn an old resident in the neighborhood. Joshua Gray and W. Anderson wounded, the latter supposed mortally. [Floridian of 23d March.]

In the last Georgian we find the subjoined gratifying intelligence:

We rejoice in being able to correct the intelligence heretofore published of the death of major Noel, of the army. It was communicated by our correspondent, who is incapable of stating what he had no reason to believe, and the painful feelings which his friends must have experienced on learning it, we regret were excited by our publication, the correctness of which was not then questioned, as the wound was previously stated to have been mortal. He is spared, we trust, to confer still more honor on his self, his friends and his country.

"Garey's Ferry, E. F., March 22, 1839.

"Dear sir: The news of major Noel's death has proved to be untrue. He is alive and getting well

Gen. Taylor and staff are expected here, to-day. Harvey leaves shortly for Indian river. Another letter, (with an extract of which we have favored) dated Fort Hamilton, March 22d, says: Eight companies of the 4th artillery are to be landed and proceed to Fort Columbus as soon as the 7th infantry arrives to receive them. Captain Brown's at Suymra, and captain Washington's at Augustine, have not been designated for relief, by the middle of April I think not many of the 4th artillery will remain in the nation. The 7th infantry is daily expected at Tampa, and general Taylor will probably arrive here this evening."

AN ODD FISH—POISSON D'AVRIL. The Boston friends of the 1st April contains an account of a most curious monster, said to be in the possession of Robert T. Lincoln, esq., agent of the New York Western Lumber company, who has just returned from St. Peters river, near the head of steamboat navigation, on the Upper Mississippi! It is called an American Orang Outang, or Wild Man of the Woods. The following is the description of the animal, which makes a good "April fool" story!

"By invitation of Mr. Lincoln, who is an old acquaintance, we went down to his rooms to examine this monster. He is a horrid looking creature, and his hands are very strongly of the fabled satyrs, as we detected them in our own mind. He is about eight feet three inches high, when standing erect, and his frame is of giant proportions in every part; his legs are not straight, but like those of the dog, and other four-footed animals, and his whole body is covered with a hide very much like that of a cow. His arms are very large and long and ill proportioned. It does not appear from his manner that he has ever walked upon "all fours." The fingers and toes are mere bunches, armed with stout claws. His tail is covered with thick, coarse, black hair, like the mane of a horse. The appearance of his countenance, if such it may be called, is very disgusting—nay, almost horrible. It is covered with a finer and lighter coat of hair than the rest of the body; there is no appearance of eye brows or nose; the mouth is very large and wide, and similar to that of a baboon. His eyes are quite dull and heavy, and there is no indication of cunning or activity about them. Mr. Lincoln says he is beyond dispute voracious, as he universally rejects bread and vegetables, and eats flesh with great avidity. He thinks it is of the orang outang species; and from what we have seen, we are inclined to consider him wild animal, somewhat resembling a man. He is, say the least, one of the most extraordinary creatures that has ever been brought before the public, on any part of the earth, or the waters under the earth, and we believe will prove a difficult puzzle to the scientific. He lies down like a brute, and does not appear to possess more instinct than common domestic animals. He is now quite tame and quiet, and is only confined by a stout chain attached to his legs.

"This is the first creature of the kind, we believe, ever found on this continent. It was to be expected, however, that in penetrating the remote recesses of the new world, monsters would be found, and that natural curiosities brought to light; and it has been a matter of surprise to many that so little of the marvellous has ever been discovered. But we need not tell what the wilds of the far northwest, the shores of Lake Superior, the regions of the Rocky mountains, and the vast territory of the Oregon, say yet bring forth."

PRISON INVESTIGATION. The committee of the House of assembly, directed to investigate Mount Pleasant state prison, have finished their arduous labors, and returned to Albany. Their report may be expected next week. What that report may be, we are unable to say; but we have no hesitation in declaring that there is sufficient testimony of a clear and unimpeachable character in the hands of the committee, to fasten the charges of ignorance and incompetence on some of the inspectors, and peculation upon others, while on the part of the agent and deputy, the scourging of convicts with lotions, slugging their limbs in a vice, whipping with cats upon with wire, shooting convicts in their cells, inflicting from one to five hundred lashes with a six lidded cat, the feeding, or rather starving men upon scarcity and insufficient allowance of unwholesome food, have been proven a part and parcel of their great system. [H. River Chronicle.]

ACCOUNT OF AMERICAN MANUFACTURES BY AN ENGLISHMAN. At a great anti-corn law dinner recently given at Manchester, England, one of the speakers in the course of his remarks, made the following statement; that in 1814 the people of America consumed one hundred bales of cotton. Last year the consumption was nearly three hundred thousand bales, entirely the growth of the short period which has elapsed since 1814. She now stands in point of consumption, where we stood in the year 1816. Sixteen years ago, Lowell, the Manchester of America, was a desert. Its forest echoed no sound but that of the cataract. Its iron spins and manufactures forty thousand bales of cotton per annum. There is a concentrated water power, amounting to five thousand horses' power, which equals one-half of the water power of Great Britain which is applied to the cotton manufacture and to one-sixth of all the steam power so applied. In 1832, America exported two millions, eight hundred thousand dollars worth of cotton goods. In 1836, and half of 1837, she exported twenty thousand bales of her cotton manufactures round the Cape of Good Hope to India and China, and thirty-four thousand bales to the markets of America. Neither is it in the cotton manufactures alone that she is advancing. In 1835, she had seventeen millions of sheep and lambs. In 1838, twenty-three millions, which, at three pounds per head, give sixty millions pounds of wool, the whole of which is manufactured there. Inferior woolsens are sold as cheap in New York as in the cloth-halls of Leeds. For the last two years our manufacturers have worked without receiving any profit.

IMPORTANT DISCOVERY CONNECTED WITH RAIL ROADS. During the last month or six weeks, crowds of persons, evidently of a superior class of society, have to the surprise of the inhabitants of the quiet neighborhood of Soho, been seen wending their way towards, and inquiring their way to, an obscure house No. 6 Canille street, near Soho square. In the course of the past week the excitement has greatly increased by a vast assemblance of the nobility, members of the administration, fellows of colleges and of scientific institutions, eminent engineers, naval architects, surveyors, rail road directors, painters, and a whole host of the patrons of arts and sciences, of whom were (as we found out by following in the wake) attracted thither by the exhibition of a model of a locomotive steam engine, which, in the opinion of the most apparently simple and unpretending acting and harmonising therewith, are destined to work the following wondrous changes and improvements in the present system of steam carriage conveyance—a desideratum and a "consummation devoutly to be wished."

"The engines and trains cannot possibly go off the railway or upset.

"They can run on any required curve with speed, safety and minimum degree of friction.

"They can ascend and descend all activities that can be required in railways, and with speed and convenience.

"They are relieved of all the dead weight rendered necessary by the present system, and are no heavier than is required to bear the load of goods and passengers.

"The carriage bodies and weight will be almost on the ground.

"They will be less expensive than those at present in use; and the immense expenditure of tunnelling, embankments, cuttings, &c. &c. will be entirely avoided.

"The repairs of the railway, the 'wear and tear' of the engines and trains, will be much less expensive than those now in use.

"The inconvenience and enormous outlay of cutting through parks or other peculiarly situated property, is avoided by the power of giving the line any desired direction."

The ingenious inventor and patentee of this new system, which he illustrates with great clearness, is Mr. Kollman, a gentleman well known in the circles of the aristocracy and the scientific circles. He attends in Cambridge street three days in a week, for the purpose of exhibiting his model and engine, the latter of which has been beautifully manufactured at the expense of £3000; and is on the scale of one and a half inch to a foot. ADJUSTMENT OF THE BOUNDARY QUESTION.

From the Globe of Monday night. We publish gen. Scott's letter to the secretary of war, announcing the conclusion of an amicable and honorable adjustment of the difficulties which existed on our northeastern boundary. To the high character of gen. Scott and gen. Harvey, who conducted this negotiation, and to the circumstance of the personal relations of friendship and regard existing between them, as well as to the earnest desire of our countrymen, and the republican friends to avoid a collision between the two great families of the Anglo-Saxon race, the matter is indebted for this fortunate result. The country is once again in the hands of the federal government, to which it rightfully belongs, and no doubt will receive the serious and prompt attention which its importance merits.

Head quarters, eastern division, Augusta, Me. March 26, 1839.

Sir: I have the happiness to enclose herewith two copies of the arrangement entered into through my agency, between the governor of Maine and the lieutenant governor of the province of New Brunswick.

The copy of my official note to sir John Harvey, with his acceptance of the arrangement, is in the hands of the governor of Maine, and another copy of the same official note, followed by the acceptances of the lieutenant governor and the governor, was yesterday transmitted by me to sir John Harvey. At the same time I sent him copies of two orders which were yesterday issued by the governor of Maine—the first disbanding the thousand detached militia which has been held in reserve at this place, and the second recalling the military force of the state from the disputed territory; and directing the organization of the civil posse, that is to be held by the state in that territory. The papers so transmitted, and which bore the signature of the governor of Maine, or that of his adjutant general, were officially certified by me.

I trust that the arrangement between the governor and lieutenant governor, together with my humble agency, in bringing it about, will be satisfactory to the president and the department. The arrangement, I have no doubt, will be executed by the parties to it in good faith and in cheerfulness. In haste I have the honor to remain, with high respect, your obedient servant, WINFIELD SCOTT.

Hon. J. R. Poinsell, secretary of war. As a proof of the friendly disposition of the governor of New Brunswick, we add the following: Government house, Fredericton, March 23, 1839.

MY DEAR GENERAL SCOTT: Upon my return from closing the session of the provincial legislature this day, I was gratified by the receipt of your very satisfactory communication of the 21st instant. My reliance upon you, my dear general, has led me to give my willing assent to the proposition which you have made yourself the acceptable medium of conveying to me, and I trust that as far as the province and the state respectively are concerned and will have been put, by it, to all border disputes, and a way opened to an amicable adjustment of the national question involved. I shall hope to receive the confirmation of this arrangement on the part of the state of Maine at as early a period as may be practicable; and as it is my intention to proceed to Woodstock early in the ensuing week, I request you to have the goodness to address it to me at that place.

I shall certainly use my best endeavors to protect the timber on the valley of the St. John, within the disputed territory, from depredators, and shall probably place, for this purpose, a small civil force at the disposal of the warden.

I grieve to learn that there is so little chance of my seeing you upon the present occasion; but I wish you to give me some ground for holding that I may have the high gratification at as early a period as may be compatible with your many important and arduous duties.

Believe me to remain, my dear general, with sentiments of warm esteem, regard and respect, your faithful friend. (Signed) J. HARVEY.

P. S. I readily consent to all my letters to you, being considered as semi-official, and thank you for the suggestion. (Signed) J. H. Major general Scott, &c. &c.

From the Augusta (Me.) Journal, March 26. Head quarters eastern division, U. S. Army, Augusta, Maine, March 21, 1839.

The undersigned, a major general in the army of the United States, being specially charged with maintaining the peace and safety of their entire northern and eastern frontiers, having cause to apprehend a collision of arms between the proximate forces of New Brunswick and the state of Maine on the disputed territory, which is claimed by both, has the honor, in the sincere desire of the United States to preserve the relations of peace and amity with Great Britain—relations which might be much endangered by such untoward collision—to invite from his excellency major general sir John Harvey, lieutenant governor, &c. &c. a general declaration to this effect:

That it is not the intention of the lieutenant governor of her Britannic majesty's province of New Brunswick, under the expected renewal of negotiations between the cabinets of London and Washington on the subject of the said disputed territory, without renewed instructions to that effect from his government, to seek to take military possession of uat territory, or to seek, by military force, to expel therefrom the armed civil posse or the troops of Maine.

Should the undersigned have the honor to be favored with such declaration or assurance, to be by him communicated to his excellency the governor of the state of Maine, the undersigned does not in the least doubt that he would be immediately and fully authorized by the governor of Maine to communicate to his excellency the lieutenant governor of New Brunswick, a corresponding pacific declaration to this effect:

That, in the hope of a speedy and satisfactory settlement, by negotiation between the governments of the United States and Great Britain, of the principal or boundary question between the state of Maine and the province of New Brunswick, it is not the intention of the governor of Maine, without renewed instructions from the legislature of the state, to attempt to disturb by arms the said province in the possession of the Madawaska settlements, or to attempt to interrupt the usual communications between that province and her majesty's upper provinces; and that he is willing, in the mean time, to leave the questions of possession and jurisdiction as they at present stand—that is, Great Britain holding, in fact, possession of a part of the said territory, and the government of Maine denying her right to such possession; and the state of Maine holding, in fact, possession of another portion of the same territory to which her right is denied by Great Britain.

With this understanding the governor of Maine will, without unnecessary delay, withdraw the military force of the state from the said disputed territory—leaving only, under a land agent, a small civil posse, armed or unarmed, to protect the timber recently cut, and to prevent future depredations.

Reciprocal assurances of the foregoing friendly character having been, through the undersigned, interchanged, all danger of collision between the immediate parties to the controversy will be at once removed, and time allowed the United States and Great Britain to settle amicably the great question of limits.

The undersigned has much pleasure in renewing to his excellency major general sir John Harvey the assurances of his ancient high consideration and respect.

WINFIELD SCOTT.

To a copy of the foregoing, sir John Harvey annexed the following:

The undersigned, major general sir John Harvey, lieutenant governor of her Britannic majesty's province of New Brunswick, having received a proposition from maj. general Winfield Scott, of the United States army, on which the foregoing is a copy, hereby, on his part, signifies his concurrence and acquiescence therein.

Sir John Harvey renews with great pleasure to major general Scott the assurances of his warmest personal consideration, regard and respect.

J. HARVEY.

Government house, Fredericton,

New Brunswick, March 28, 1839.

To a paper containing the note of general Scott, and the acceptance of sir John Harvey, gov. Fairfield annexed his acceptance in these words:

Executive department, Augusta, March 25, 1839.

The undersigned, governor of Maine, in consideration of the foregoing, the exigency for calling out the troops of Maine having ceased, has no hesitation in signifying his entire acquiescence in the proposition of major general Scott.

The undersigned has the honor to tender to major general Scott the assurance of his high respect and esteem.

JOHN FAIRFIELD.

We learn that general Scott has interchanged the acceptances of the governor and lieutenant governor, and also that governor Fairfield immediately issued orders recalling the troops of Maine, and for organizing the civil posse that is to be continued, for the time, in the disputed territory. The troops in this town will also be immediately discharged.

The two branches of the Maine legislature met at half past 5 o'clock on Monday morning.

The governor was informed that the two houses were ready to adjourn. The secretary notified the houses that he had no further communication to make. Votes of thanks were passed to the president of the senate and speaker of the house, and they made speeches of acknowledgment, and the two houses then adjourned.

From the New York Express.

We have seen a letter, dated Bangor, March 24th, which states that a rumor had reached that city, that a party of our troops, consisting of a sergeant and ten men, were sent about six miles north of Fort Fairfield, for the purpose of arresting trespassers; that having arrived at an opening in the woods, they were surrounded by a party of about sixty men; and that a skirmish ensued, in which three of their men were wounded. The letter states that gen. Holsdon immediately left the fort with 100 men, leaving orders for 100 more to follow immediately, with the intention to cut off the retreat of the belligerent party. An express, it is stated, passed through Fort Augusta.

We have no means of judging of the correctness of the above. The latest news we have from Bangor was brought by the steamer Bangor, which left Frankfort, on the Penobscot, at 5 o'clock on Monday morning. As Frankfort is some twenty miles below Bangor, it is possible that the passengers for the boat left the city early on Sunday, and before this news reached there. The Boston papers of Tuesday do not mention the matter.

The following spiteful paragraph if from the Royal Gazette of Halifax, the good people of which region would desire nothing better than a war between the two countries, on account of the golden harvest they would expect to reap from the event:

"A special minister, it appears, is to be sent to England. If Great Britain consults her own dignity, she will have nothing to do with that envoy—nor ought she to negotiate further on the subject of the disputed territory, while the act 'giving to the president additional powers for the defence of the United States,' &c. is in existence. Had the U. States government rested satisfied with the arrangement entered into with Mr. Fox, for preventing any violent collision upon the northern border of the union, and then determined upon sending a special ambassador to England, all would have been well, and the mission might have been attended with results satisfactory to both parties; but the position they have assumed is grossly insulting to Great Britain, and is one to which she cannot for a moment submit without the sacrifice of all national character."

The following communication from the president was transmitted to the New York legislature, in reply to the resolutions passed by that body, some weeks since, on the subject of the Maine boundary question.

Washington, March 29, 1839.

To the house of assembly of the state of New York.

It affords me great satisfaction to acknowledge the receipt of sundry resolutions of your honorable body expressing its approbation of the course pursued by the federal executive, and of the action of congress, in relation to the controversy between the state of Maine and her Britannic majesty's province of New Brunswick; announcing also the determination of your state to second the efforts of the general government in preserving pacific relations with Great Britain, and to hold herself in readiness if necessary, to aid in resisting encroachments upon the territory of any portion of the union.

For the expression of these sentiments, and for the entire unanimity with which it was made, I tender my respectful and grateful acknowledgments.

The assembly of New York may rest assured that to effect an amicable adjustment of the controversy in question no efforts on my part will be omitted, that are consistent with reason and justice, and with that sacred respect for the character of the country, which being paramount to all other considerations, can never be disregarded. Should these efforts prove unsuccessful, a result I cannot allow myself to expect, the federal government will rely with confidence on the proffered co-operation of your great state; a confidence alike justified by the proceedings which have been communicated to me in your behalf, and by the known fidelity of the citizens of New York to the honor and interests of our common country. With great respect, your obedient servant,

M. VAN BUREN.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

From the Philadelphia Commercial Herald, March 29.

RESIGNATION OF N. BIDDLE, ESQ. will be seen, from the subjoined letter, that this distinguished gentleman, who, for more than twenty years, has presided over the interests of the United States bank with such signal success, has resigned his situation. We learn that Mr. Biddle will, with his family, visit Europe. Thomas Dunlap, esq. has been unanimously elected president of the bank. The vacancy occasioned by the withdrawal of Mr. Biddle could not have been filled by a more able financier than Mr. Dunlap. His election to that most important post will be highly gratifying to the community of which he has been so long a most valuable member.

Bank of the United States, March 29, 1839.

At a meeting of the board of directors of the Bank of the United States, held at the banking house this morning, after the ordinary business of the day was completed, Nicholas Biddle, esq., president, communicated to the board his intention of resigning his place in the institution, and took leave of his colleagues in a brief valedictory, marked not only by his usual felicity of expression, but singularly cha-acterized by an eloquent pathos, which was wholly irresistible among his old and tried friends—his fellow-laborers for the last twenty years.

Upon Mr. Biddle's withdrawal, the following letter from him to the directors was presented and read:

To the board of directors of the bank of the U. States: Gentlemen: I execute a purpose which, as you are aware, I have long meditated, and which I intimated to the stockholders at their first meeting under the new charter; that of retiring from the direction of the bank. It is now more than twenty years since I entered its service. They have been years of intense labor, and they have earned for me a right to claim the relaxation and repose which at an advancing age and precarious health require. I have waded anxiously for the most appropriate moment at which I could be best spared, but hitherto, whenever I have sought the retirement I so much needed, some difficulty, in which my service was deemed useful, always interposed to detain me. None such exists now. All the political dissensions connected with the bank for the last ten years, have ceased; all its extraordinary efforts for the protection of our national interests are happily ended; and the bank has returned to its accustomed channels of business in peace. I can therefore withdraw, at length, with convenience; and I do it more readily, because I leave the affairs of the institution in a state of great prosperity, and in the hands of able directors and officers.

This separation from friends, with whom I have been so long and so agreeably associated is among the most painful acts of my life; and I pray you to accept, at parting, my sincere wishes for the personal welfare of you all.

N. BIDDLE, president.

Philadelphia, March 29, 1839.

Whereupon Manuel Eyre, esq. was, on motion of Joseph R. Ingersoll, esq. called to the chair, and the following resolution, offered by Mr. Ingersoll, was unanimously adopted, and a committee, consisting of J. R. Ingersoll, Ambrose, White and Caleb Cole esqrs., appointed to present the same to Mr. Biddle.

Resolved, That the directors have learned, with unfeigned regret, the intention of Mr. Biddle to withdraw from his situation as president of the bank of the United States.

For many years, the best interests of the institution under his especial guardianship have been protected and promoted with devoted fidelity, untiring zeal, and shining abilities. In both periods of its corporate existence, it has been exposed to continued assaults and surrounded with complicated difficulties. Power and prejudice have arrayed themselves against it in active hostility; popular feeling an official influence have been exercised in anxious attempts to disturb its arrangements and check it prosperously. But it has not ceased to prosper. More than one moneyed and political crisis has threatened the institutions of the country with serious loss or absolute destruction. The country and its institutions have as often survived the crisis, and they now stand erect, and almost unharmed, from the perils which they have been exposed. During these eventful periods, arduous efforts have been made under heavy burdens have been sustained by the bank of the United States, and the largest and most effective share of successful exertion has been contributed by its presiding officer.

The board of directors owe it to themselves, and to the stockholders whom they represent, in accepting with deep reluctance the resignation now tendered to them, to record their grateful acknowledgment to a gentleman, whose unrivalled skill in finance unwearied devotion to his duties, firm and independent conduct in the midst of obstacles, elevated and honorable principles, and courteous and urbane deportment, have marked with unflinching uniformity an arduous career; who, having performed so much and so faithfully, leaves the institution with which he is identified prosperous in all its relations, strong in its abilities to promote the interests of the several communities by which it is surrounded, cordial in its association with sister establishments, and secure in the respect and esteem of all who are connected with it in foreign as well as domestic intercourse.

It was then moved by J. R. Ingersoll, esq. that the board do now proceed to the election of a director in the place of N. Biddle, resigned, when it appears upon the ballot that Thomas Dunlap was unanimously elected a director to supply the vacancy Mr. Dunlap's resignation of his office as second assistant cashier was presented to the board by J. Cow perthwait, esq. cashier, and accepted.

Whereupon, on motion, the board proceeded to the election of a president, and upon counting the ballots, it appeared that Thomas Dunlap, esq. was unanimously elected president of the bank of the United States; and the same committee were requested by the chairman to inform Mr. Dunlap of his election, and request his acceptance of the appointment.

Upon taking the chair, Mr Dundas said: Gentlemen: I beg you to accept my cordial and respectful thanks for the confidence you have been pleased to repose in me. The trust conferred by you on me is one of the deepest responsibility. I feel it my duty to assume this prominent share in the administration of this great institution in the most prosperous condition of public affairs, and in the happiest circumstances of our moneyed transactions, might well appal the most self-confiding, but I follow in instant succession a gentleman whose singular ability, firmness, integrity and skill, have been devoted with untiring energy and on forwardness to the best interests of the stockholders and of his country, for twenty consecutive years, is a task which few, if any, can be found equal. Without your generous confidence, I should shrink from it, and in pledging myself to fidelity, zeal and unremitting devotion to its interests, I must thank myself wholly upon you; upon the talents, assiduity, discretion and unflinching determination for the right which have characterized your board from its origin. In our hands all will be safe; and in the hope of being sustained by your frank support, I now, with undiminished trust in my own powers, tender to you, and to those we represent, the best energies I possess in the service to which you have called me.

THE NORTHERN FRONTIER.

It will be seen by the following extracts that the difficulties on the northern frontier are by no means at an end. Buildings on both sides of the line have been burned, and the excitement of the inhabitants increasing.

The St. Albans Messenger of March 28th, says: Fires on our frontier seem to increase in a fearful rate. For the last two weeks there have been over a score of fires almost every night. Apparently they are alternately each side of the line. Retaliation appears to be the order of the night. We are not able to state the extent of the burning, but presume from the number of fires seen from this place, and that we have heard, that quite a number of buildings have been burned, the greater part of them barns, and the most of them situated in Champlain and Oletown. In the latter place we are informed that a large house was burned on Friday night last, and on the Friday night previous two barns belonging to it. Last Sunday night one or two barns in Albany were destroyed.

A private correspondent of the Burlington Sentinel, under date of March 22, writes: Captain Poirer's company of regulars are ordered to leave next to Rose's Point, and leave to-morrow morning; the company stationed at Troy are also withdrawn, to join the head quarters of the regiment at Pittsburgh.

The excitement at Rose's Point is very great, in consequence of the burnings which have been kept up for nearly two weeks. Quite a number of the families are moving out of the place, or rather the male part of them. You can form little idea of the alarm and confusion which prevail there as soon as night falls.

Every man in the place is on duty, and fifty mounted dragoons are stationed on the lines; yet, with all this precaution, they have fires all around them. Several fires have occurred within sight of the guard, and while they were extinguishing one, another has broken out in another direction.

Latter still. By a letter from Albany, dated Monday last, we learn that implicit reliance may be placed, we learn, that the barns belonging to Mr. Covey, an enterprising farmer, in Albany, were burned by a gang of "loyal volunteers" on the Saturday night previous.

Six or eight head of cattle, two horses and about ten tons of hay were also destroyed. Our correspondent adds that scarcely a night had passed to three weeks, without the heavens being illuminated by the light from some incendiary fire in that vicinity.

From the Montreal Herald.

Clarenceville, 25th March, 1839.

SIR: I beg to inform you of the particulars of a small affair that took place in this neighborhood last night, or rather early this morning. About 3 o'clock an armed party from the United States, in sleighs, drove down on the ice until opposite our picket on Beach Ridge, (the scene of some of their burning), and then commenced firing small arms, but without effect, as our picket had disposed of themselves under cover, awaiting their nearer approach, the distance being too great for precise aim. The brigands then fired a cannon and then decamped in the direction of Alburg Springs. A detachment of the Queen's light dragoons, and the light company of Colonel Dyer's regiment, arrived soon after in support of the picket, and marched up to the line, near which a body of the brigands remained until the near approach of our force.

Upon our arrival at the spot on the ice, from where the firing took place, we found the cannon, a wooden one, burst, and a new United States musket with an iron six pound ball, and a quantity of cannon shot lying scattered about. From the appearance of some pieces of the wooden cannon, I am led to believe that several of the brigands were wounded by its bursting, marks of blood being distinctly visible on the pieces and ice around. The firing on the pickets in this vicinity is not an unusual occurrence, but from the distance the shots came from, and our precaution in placing the sentries under cover, no damage has been received. Had the cannon not burst, we have every reason to suppose that a more extended attack was intended, as we are informed that a considerable force from another point convenient to us was in readiness to march, in and as Nelson, Cook, Gagnon and Grogan are now at the springs, only four miles distant, another attack is expected.

The Montreal Courier states that a barn and stable at St. Johns, belonging to a volunteer named Harrison, were burned by an incendiary on the morning of the 5th.

The recent ordinance respecting the admission of aliens into the province has caused some uneasiness and it is feared that it will prove an impediment to the usual intercourse by steamboats on Lake Champlain. The steamboat company is said to have serious intentions of running their boats no farther than Champlain village.

From the Buffalo Commercial Advertiser.

Colonel Prince, and the Sandwich affair. It will be recollected that after the affair at Sandwich, U. C. much blame was attached to col. Prince for the course which he pursued towards the patriot prisoners who fell into his hands. According to the statements then made of his conduct, it was evidently characterized by wanton cruelty; but we are gratified to perceive that upon an inquiry instituted by the lieutenant governor and major general commanding, colonel Prince is fully exonerated from the imputation of having been guilty of acts of wanton cruelty.

We extract the following paragraph from a general order issued from the adjutant general's office at Toronto the 20th March:

"The lieutenant governor cannot too strongly express his disapprobation of the terms and spirit in which the printed statement has been framed, and of the act, manner, and place of its publication; nor can he omit particularly to notice the very inconsistent and reprehensible conduct of colonel William Elliott, who, in the first place, presided at a public meeting, at which the course of summary execution adopted by colonel Prince, to a limited extent, at Windsor, was strongly recommended to be indiscriminately pursued on all occasions of invasion; and afterwards pledged himself to the truth of statements, highly colored and exaggerated, implicating that officer, and having a direct tendency to lower the character of the militia service, in which colonel Prince and his accusers were alike engaged, as well as to aggravate the feelings of hostility along the frontier, already, unhappily, too much excited."

The order then declares that "these circumstances impose on the lieutenant governor the painful necessity of dispensing with the future services of colonel William Elliott in her majesty's militia of the Upper Province."

The London Spectator, in speaking of Lord Durham's report on Canadian affairs, says:

"It should be as gratifying to the American people as to the colonists who it most concerns. For the first time, an eminent English statesman treats colonists with the respect which is due to a free people; concealing nothing from them, not attempting to delude them with vague generalities, but admitting and enforcing their just causes of complaint, proving their grievances, and insisting that their interests should be consulted, by allowing them to manage their own local affairs in their own way. For the first time, an eminent English statesman officially avows in respect for the Anglo-Saxon people of the United States, and honestly attributes the wonderful career of prosperity to the English principle of local self-government, which they inherited from their ancestors and ours. Wellington and Peel seem to long for a war with America, or to imagine that they can avert it by denunciation and threats. Lord Durham shows in what utter ignorance they have charged the American government with bad faith; proves that whatever risk there may be of a war on the Canadian frontier is owing to the lawless and disorganized state of the British dominions; and declares that it is only by giving a government to our own people, who have had none, that we can hope to avert collision, which may end in war. Which is the better statesmanship—whether the wiser diplomacy—Peel's or Durham's? We need not stop to ask a question about the policy of such a nullity as the Melbourne cabinet."

TEN DAYS LATER FROM ENGLAND.

The packet ship Roscoe, captain Delano, arrived Thursday morning, and brought Liverpool papers of the 25 h and London of the 27th ult.

The London papers of the 23d February publish the resolutions of inquiry offered by Mr. Cushing, and adopted in the house of representatives the last of January, relative to the boundary lines between the United States and the British possessions, the alleged violation of neutrality on the Canadian frontier, and particularly in relation to the seizure and destruction of the steamboat Caroline. These resolutions are regarded as breathing a spirit of hostility. The Herald suggests that an English army of observation on the line would produce the happiest consequences on the question of adjustment.

It was known in London that governor Fairfield had communicated a confidential message to the Maine legislature on the subject of the timber deductions.

The earl of Zetland died suddenly on the 19th of February. He was created an earl at the coronation. Former title lord Dundas.

The French government has ordered an extraordinary credit of 2,200,000*l.* to be opened to the minister of marine and colonies, to be thus appropriated: To repair the damages done to the military buildings at Martinique, 500,000*l.*; subvention to the interior service of the colonies, 900,000*l.*; accessory services, 800,000*l.*

The Mexican blockade. The subject of the Mexican blockade was exciting a good deal of attention in London. The blockades are reported as highly injurious to British commerce. Several vessels had returned with their cargoes, and notice had been given that the packets were to be restrained from bringing home specie.

The queen had offered to mediate between France and Mexico, but the offer was rejected. Mexico had intimated a desire for the mediation of England.

Lord Normanby was sworn in as colonial secretary on the 23d of February. His successor in the government of Ireland had not yet been named.

The court circular of February 23d states that on the preceding day the bishop of Vermont, U. S. had an interview with lord Melbourne.

Nothing further of importance in relation to Canada had occurred. In the house of lords on the 19th instant the earl of Winchelsea made a motion for copies of any correspondence that may have taken place relative to the appointment of Mr. Turton.

Lord Melbourne disclaimed having any thing to do with the appointment. He had written a private letter to lord Durham on the subject, stating his disapprobation, and requesting that the appointment might be rescinded. Lord Durham declined, as he considered his honor pledged in the matter.

Lord Durham in reply said:—He had considered, and he still believed, that it was the privilege of all governors to appoint honorary executive councillors. Honorary executive councillors were distinguished from municipal councillors. There was a legal distinction in such offices. Honorary executive councillors were nominated by the governor. There was nothing upon which they could come officially before the government. He distinctly asserted—and he was sure whatever their lordships might think of his Canadian administration that they would give credence to his word—he solemnly assured them that nothing could have induced him to alter any appointment which he might have given to his learned friend, provided that it did not commit the government. He did not shrink from the responsibility of this appointment. He had made it on his own responsibility. He cared not for either the private or the public letters. He had felt his honor pledged. Nothing could have induced him to rescind the appointment. He had tendered his resignation after that. He had tendered his resignation, but nothing could have induced him to accept it. He believed the expression he used at the time was, that he would rather cut off his right hand. Nothing could have induced him to make himself necessary to the vilification which had taken place of that gentleman. As to the public letters, he thought the public had a right to their being published. He was not ashamed of them. He hoped the noble viscount would, at all events, allow him to read that part of his own (lord Durham's) letter which referred to the subject. It would be a satisfaction to him if every word of both the public and private letters were published. He was very much obliged to his noble friend (lord Brougham) for having come forward and said what he had said concerning his knowledge of Mr. Turton's character. He (lord Durham) had known that gentleman from youth. They had been separated by circumstances, he (Mr. Turton) having gone to India and he (lord Durham) having ever been in England. He obtained in India the appointment of advocate general, being appointed to that situation by lord Combermere. He held the appointment for a length of time. He was confirmed in it by lord Amherst. It was to the satisfaction of the court and council, who took the extraordinary step of voting him a certain large salary, and of passing a vote of thanks to him. He (lord Durhan) after this had not seen why there should be any objection to his giving him this temporary situation in Canada. The advocate generalship was the first legal appointment in India, being tantamount to our attorney generalship. He had felt himself (lord Durhan) not precluded from employing this gentleman and availing himself of his great abilities. This gentleman had been elected by the inhabitants of Calcutta and other towns to high situations. Let him observe that all the circumstances of Mr. Turton were known in India at the time all he had been speaking of took place there concerning him. The noble earl proceeded to say that Mr. Turton was not paid. He had not received any thing. He (lord Durhan) would be ready to meet the noble earl (the earl of Winchelsea) both upon the private and the public question. He would be ready to enter upon the question of adultery as in connection with official employments, though the noble earl must not be surprised if he pledged himself, that if he was obliged to do it, there was no one who had committed adultery who had been officially employed, who might not expect to have his case brought forward by him (lord Durhan) upon that occasion. The noble earl concluded by saying, that if the noble lord (Winchelsea) was at any time disposed to move for the documents which had been referred to, he would be ready to second him.

The earl of Winchelsea said he was not deterred—he was not daunted. He was actuated by public motives. If the noble earl brought forward any case of the description he had spoken of, he (lord Winchelsea) would support him in it.

The motion was then negatived without a division.

London, Feb. 23. This being the eve of the settling day for the account in the English market, it has been chiefly occupied by the brokers and jobbers with the arrangements of their differences. It appears to have proved a "bear" account, and is rather heavier than for some time past. This circumstance has created, as usual, a little more business, but in the quotations there has not been any particular alteration.

A confident rumor has reached us, that lord Palmerston, not being able to withstand the exposure made by Mr. Urquhart, in regard to the Portfolio correspondence, has followed the example of lord Glenelg, and made himself scarce in Downing street.

[United Service Gazette.]

Public attention was excited to an insult said to have been offered to the British flag by the prince de Joinville, who was the officer commanding the corvette, on board which the Mexican pilot, dragged by force from under the protection of the British flag, was compelled to go, in order to steer that vessel, to the harbor of his own countrymen. The London Morning Herald designates it as an act of the most insolent premeditation. It was, however, a mistake on the part of the prince de Joinville, and the rear admiral had made a communication on that subject to the French government.

Motions were made in both houses of parliament on the 18th and 19th instant, "that evidence be heard at their bars in support of a total abolition of the laws relating to coin," negatived in the house of lords without a division, and in the house of commons by a majority of 198 in a house of 533 members present.

London, Feb. 27. Explosion of fire-damp. Twenty-three lives lost. A explosion of fire-damp took place on Monday week, a coal pit near Whitehaven, whereby twenty-three persons lost their lives. The accounts from Prague confirm the statement that Austrian corps of 30,000 men is preparing to march, if necessary, to the Rhine.

The "Courier Belge" publishes a plan which, it says, has been determined on by the conference for the partition of the country, in case that the government and chambers should refuse the treaty of the 24 articles. Antwerp is to be given to England, a part of Flanders to Holland, Hainault to France, and Liege to Austria. We need not say that the plan of partition is most ridiculous, and that the Courier Belge has been imposed on.

The B-lics question was in Paris deemed settled. The accounts from Brussels received in the course of Saturday were held to justify the expectation.

The Gazette de Commerce of St. Petersburg publishes a comparative table of the merchandise exported from St. Petersburg, on which duty was paid, during the last four years. The total value is as follows: In 1835, 107,030,066 rubles; in 1836, 129,601,862; in 1837, 136,510,941; and in 1838, 157,325,135 rubles.

From the east. Mr. McNeill, the ambassador to Persia, finally left Teheran on the 31 of January, giving orders to the British officers in the Persian service to proceed to Bagdad, and there wait further instructions. The Persian court had shown no symptoms of a desire for reconciliation with England.

TWO DAYS LATER FROM ENGLAND.

By the packet ship Sheffield, captain Allen, from Liverpool, March 2, we have London papers of the 1st, and Liverpool of the 2d instant. The news is of importance. The cotton market had recovered all the depression previously felt. The trade of Manchester had recovered. The export of gold to the continent ceased, and English funds advanced.

Mr. Stevenson had long interviews with lord Palmerston and lord John Russell on the 28th of February.

Lord Glenelg has expressed to lord Durhan the queen's satisfaction, and that of her government, with his report on the affairs of Canada.

The proceedings of parliament are not of any interest. Lord John Russell has been defeated in the attempt to shut the Westminster theatres during the night. Mr. Seargent Falfour's copy-right law, after a brilliant speech from that gentleman, was passed to a second reading by a majority of 36.

In the house of lords on the 13th of February, some two or three hundred petitions from land owners were presented, against the abolition of the corn laws, and almost as many in favor. Lord Brougham opened the debate on the subject with a long and vigorous speech, concluding with a motion that the petitions be referred to a committee of the whole, with a view to the production of evidence, which was rejected, without division. That of Mr. Villers also, in the commons, was lost by a vote of 361 to 172. Lord Brougham's speech on the subject was one of his most remarkable displays of oratorical power.

On the same day the earl of Winchelsea inquired whether it was the intention of lord Melbourne to lay on the table any papers relating to the appointment of Mr. Turton. Lord Durhan said that lord Melbourne had no part in making the appointment referred to. It was one that did not require the confirmation of any minister—he had made it on his own responsibility; and he was ready to defend it. The person referred to had rendered him an essential service, and if again placed in a similar situation, he would again avail himself of the talents of that person. Lord Brougham took part in the debate. We give a specimen in his caustic treatment of an interruption.

Lord Wicklow—"Hear hear!"

Lord Brougham—"Yes, you cry hear, hear! but you don't understand. (Loud laughter.) Now, I wish you to understand as well as I can, and to comprehend as well as understand, and to digest as well as comprehend—to exercise your excellent understanding as well as your good ears, and then when you have done that to decide justly."

Lord J. Russell hoped to introduce the bill for establishing the government of the Canadas before Easter.

Sir Robert Peel asked if the government contemplated actual legislation on the subject of Canadian affairs. Lord John Russell said he did.

In the house of commons, Mr. Harvey gave notice that he would move an address to the crown relative to lord Durhan's Canadian appointment. He said it might, perhaps, be convenient for him to state, that it was his intention to found on this, the return to that address, a motion that might affect the seats of certain honorable members.

In the house of lords, lord Sandon postponed for a fortnight his motion on the blockade of Mexico. The inquiries into the circumstances attending the assassination of lord Norbury excited much interest. Great anxiety was felt on the subject of the impression of a well-formed boot seen near the scene of the murder.

The Times states that "the attention of the Paris press being still monopolized by the electoral question, we cannot find in them a single paragraph that would interest our readers."

The Chartists. On Monday evening the Radical's chapel, at Middleton, was crowded to excess, when John Flint, a schoolmaster, from Heywood, gave a lecture on the propriety of having fire arms; in the course of which he said, that all those who intended to break their shuttles and cut up their looms, if the national petition was rejected, must hold up their hands, and this was done by about three fourths of the parties present. The lecturer added, that he should only wait till the 2d of March. Since meeting, many are expected to give up working after the 2d of March. The firing at night still continues. [Manchester Guardian.]

The conduct of the prince de Joinville in taking the Mexican pilot from an English vessel, is again severely commented upon by the opposition journals.

The agitation in regard to the corn laws had somewhat subsided since both houses of parliament had refused to take evidence in committee of the whole. Large meetings, notwithstanding, had been held in several parts of the kingdom.

Much gloom is said to rest upon commercial affairs in Paris. Nine new failures were declared on the 26th. The returns of the receipts and disbursements of the saving bank on the 24th and 25th showed the increase of alarm or of distress. The payments on those days exceeded the lodgments by a sum of more than 200,000; the former having amounted to 700,000; while the latter had been only 492,000. The Debits and the Constitutional public opinion stirring appeals to the electors, and the Quotidienne vehemently protests against the conduct of the government, for the corruption which it alleges is resorted to by the Mole cabinet to procure the return of the ministerial candidates.

Bank of England. The following notice was posted at the bank of England on Thursday last: "The governor and company of the bank of England give notice that on and after the 28th instant they will receive applications for loans upon the deposit of bills of exchange not having more than six months to run, or exchequer bills, India bonds, and other approved securities; such loans to be repaid on or before the 23d of April next. Interest at the rate of 3 1/2 per cent. for sums not less than £2,000."

London, 12 o'clock. The close of session was closed yesterday by the failure of Messrs. Ashley & Son, of Regent street, bankers and army agents; but we are happy to learn that their affairs are in a small compass; their debts, it is said, will not exceed £30,000. The stock market is firm. Consols are 93 to 93 1/2 for money, and 93 1/2 to 93 3/4 for account. New 3 1/2 per cents, 100 1/2 to 100 3/4. Exchequer bills 65 to 66 premium.

Two o'clock. The notice of loans at the bank appears to have had a favorable effect on the stock market. Consols are now 93 to 93 1/2 for money, and 93 1/2 to 1 1/2 for account. Exchequer bills have reached 68 premium. The discord which reigns in the camp of Don Carlos has given confidence to the holders of Spanish bonds, and those securities have risen to 19 1/4. Dutch bonds remain at yesterday's prices. No material variation in shares.

Wrecked goods. For the last two or three weeks considerable quantities of soft goods and hardware, of all descriptions, have been brought to London in wrecks of the Pennsylvania, the Lockwood, and the Victoria, and have, from time to time, been disposed of by public auction. The drapers and hardware dealers, who have been the principal purchasers, have exhibited their respective lots in their windows with (for the worst part) the trifling reduced prices affixed to each article; and by the additional aid of large bills, announcing "further arrivals from the wrecks," "More large lots of goods," "Just arrived, extensive lots of linens, lawns diapers, caubric han kerchiefs, table cloths, covers, &c., from the wreck of the Pennsylvania," and so forth,—the parties, if we may judge from the crowds that beset their premises, have, since the fatal catastrophe that threw these articles in their way, been driving a most successful business, thus verifying the old saying, that "it is an ill wind that blows nobody good." Certain it is the retail sales have been extensive, whether from the cheapness, or supposed cheapness of the damaged goods, or from, in some instances, (who knows!) an idea amongst intended voyagers, or emigrants, that in a shirt or garment, fashioned out of materials that had once been "wrecked," they would possess a charmed habilliment that would serve them against all similar disasters, we shall not say. In one hardware shop in Dale street, we find "250 pair of wrecked fire irons advertised, besides fenders, tea trays, and finally fish hooks, in bundles of 500, for the small sum of one penny!—for the articles comprise literally from a best bower anchor to a cambric needle." And to crown the whole a quantity of "fire shovels, just made out of wrecked iron." The force of wrecking could no further go. What recommendation this will be to the shovels we are at some loss to conceive; but if we mistake not, the mania that has spread abroad to purchase the articles received from the ill fated vessels, superinduces an absurd suspicion that this is not the only "manufactory of wrecked goods" in the town. Who knows how many pieces of goods that have been "shopkeepers" for many years for lack of purchasers, have been brought down from their dusty shelves, and have been moistened and outwardly smeared with sand and mud, have been displayed amongst the "last lots from the Pennsylvania," before the eyes of sympathizing customers as having veritably been "wrecked?"

FRANCE.

London, Feb. 28. The Paris papers of Tuesday have arrived, but bring no news of importance. Ministers were supposed to have suggested much alarm to the electors on the warlike propensities they attributed to the coalition. It was consequently expected that the struggle in the ensuing elections would be more close than had been anticipated.

Each gloom is said to rest upon commercial affairs in Paris. Nine new failures were declared on Monday. The return of the receipts and disbursements of the Saving bank on Sunday and Monday showed the increase of alarm or distress. The payment of those days exceeded the disbursements by a sum more than 200,000*fr.*; the former have amounted to 700,000*fr.* while the latter had been only 100,000*fr.* The Hollando Belgic question had lost all its interest in Paris. It was scarcely mentioned on the Bourse. Nothing new had reached from Brussels. The late frightful executions at Estella, by order of gen. Maroto, appear to have shocked even the best friends of Don Carlos.

Nine new failures were declared in Paris on the 27th. Little or no business was done on the Paris Bourse.

A supply of corn having arrived from Turkey, a fall in the price of bread had taken place.

We cut the following from the Paris correspondence of the New York American, writing under date of February 14.

The National anticipates war between France and the United States, from the Mexican privateering scheme. It argues that a country so powerful as France "cannot allow her commerce to become the prey of New York, Charleston and New Orleans speculators"—that she will be obliged to hang as pirates the pretended Mexican privateersmen, sailing from the ports of the United States—that "the American people en masse, jealous as they are of the kind of naval and political supremacy which they arrogate to themselves in the new hemisphere, will raise an outcry for reprisals; which, and the increasing irritation about the blockades of Mexico and Buenos Ayres, the cabinet at Washington cannot long resist, and thus war must ensue."

The intelligence received to-day from Belgium is more and more pacific; the chambers have been convoked at Brussels for the 19th inst. and it is generally expected that the executive government will announce to them its accession to the decision of the London conference. The terms of the king of Holland's resignation to the same fiat, might serve as a good formula, to Leopold. The acquiescence of the Belgian senate is understood to be certain; but opinion is divided concerning the vote of the house of representatives. This body consists of one hundred and three, of whom nearly one hundred will be present. The radicals of Brussels and Paris claim sixty of them, for the desperate project of resistance at all hazards; while the Belgian ministry count upon the same number for the opposite policy. According to all the accounts, the crisis become every day more and more distressing and ruinous for the industrial classes, and sensibly increased the disposition toward submission, which some of the Belgian journals proclaim to be general. It is not known, exactly, what the five allied powers will do, in the very improbable event of a legislative refusal, or a popular convulsion.

SWARTWOUT DEFALCATIONS.

Report of the committee of investigation, chosen by ballot, by the house of representatives, January 17 and 19, 1839, on the subject of the defalcations of Samuel Swartwout and others, and the correctness of the returns of collectors and receivers of the public money; also, the report of the minority of the committee.

RESOLUTIONS CREATING THE COMMITTEE—25TH CONGRESS, 3D SESSION.

Congress of the United States,

In the house of representatives, January 17, 1839.

Resolved, That the communication from the president of the United States, of the 8th of December, 1838, relating to the defalcation of the late collector of the port of New York, except so much as relates to the modification of the revenue laws, be referred to a select committee of nine members, to be appointed by the house, by ballot, whose duty it shall be to inquire into the causes and extent of the late defalcations of the custom house, at New York and other places, the length of time they have existed, the correctness of the returns which have been made by the collectors, and naval and other officers, and the deposit banks, respectively; and all such facts connected with said defalcations as may be deemed material to develop their true character.

Be it further resolved, That the said committee be required to inquire into, and make report of, any defalcations among the collectors, receivers and disbursers of the public money, which may now exist; who are the defaulters; the amount of defalcations; the length of time they have existed; and the causes which led to them; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

The house proceeded to appoint said committee by ballot; and Messrs. Hurlin, of Kentucky, Curfiss, of New York, Wise, of Virginia, Dawson, of Georgia, Smith, of Maine, Hopkins, of Virginia, Queen, of Georgia, Foster, of New York, Wagner, of Pennsylvania, were elected.

ADDITIONAL RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE COMMITTEE—25TH CONGRESS, 3D SESSION.

Congress of the United States.

In the house of representatives, January 19, 1839.

On motion of Mr. Wise, Resolved, That the select committee of nine, elected by the house to investigate the late defalcations of public officers, have power to elect a clerk; to employ a printer, to print for its own use its journal and other papers required to be copied for its members; that the committee have leave to proceed to New York or other places for the purpose of prosecuting its inquiries; and that the members thereof be excused from attendance upon the house until it shall have made its report.

REPORT OF THE MAJORITY.

Prefatory remarks.

The select committee chosen by the house of representatives on the 17th and 19th ultimo to investigate the defalcations of Samuel Swartwout, late collector of customs at the port of New York, and of other officers, have devoted to the faithful discharge of the duties assigned them the limited time allowed for the purpose by the shortness of the present session of congress; however, that the whole field of inquiry presented by the resolution appointing the committee could not be properly traversed to report thereon, either satisfactorily to the country or to the committee, during the short remainder of the present congress. This impressed upon the committee, at once, a resolution, which has been rigidly adhered to, of limiting the investigation to such branches of the subjects referred to them as had most deeply excited public anxiety and alarm, and to undertake only so much of these as might be thoroughly exhausted within the allotted period of the committee's researches. But, the important searches which have been attained, notwithstanding the disadvantages adverted to, cannot fail to inspire the country with a confident hope that the spire of obligation which will rest upon the successors of the present congress to resume and complete the great work of investigation and reform of the alarming condition and abuses of the executive departments of the government, from the highest to the lowest, and from the nearest to the remotest functionaries, will secure the prompt and efficient attention which its magnitude demands.

Guided solely by the character of the developments which the investigation imposed upon them by the house has elicited, the committee cannot resist the conviction, that at no period in the history of the federal government has there been deeper or better founded cause than exists at this date to desire a prompt and efficient reform in the "status of reform" which summation of that signal "exists of reform" which public sentiment, many years since, inscribed on the list of executive officers in characters too legible to be overlooked, requiring, "particularly, the correction of those abuses which have brought the patronage of the federal government into conflict with the freedom of elections, and the contraction of those causes which have disturbed the rightful course of appointment, and have placed our continued power in UNFAITHFUL or INCOMPETENT HANDS."

The first procedure of the committee, after organizing itself for business, was, to visit the city of New York, to inspect there, in person, the original records and papers of the custom house, in conjunction with the examination of such witnesses as might be supposed capable of shedding light upon the inquiry involved by the defalcations of Mr. Swartwout. Thenceforward, this branch of the investigation was conducted pursuant to the resolution of the house, viz: to ascertain "the causes and extent" of those defalcations; "the length of time they have existed;" "the correctness of the returns which have been made by" Mr. Swartwout, and by the naval officer at New York, and by other officers connected with the adjustment of his accounts.

Concurrently with the investigation of Mr. Swartwout's defalcations, those of William M. Price, late district attorney at New York, were likewise kept in view; and the fullest practicable extent of information respecting them has been obtained, and will be adverted to in the sequel of this report.

"The correctness of the returns which have been made" by the present collector of customs and the naval officer, respectively, at the port of New York, was also sought to be examined by the committee while in that city. Considering that "the customs collected at New York equal nearly two-thirds of the whole amount in all the United States," as stated in the special report of the secretary of the treasury on Mr. Swartwout's defalcations (house doc. 13, page 6, of the present session), the committee did not suppose that they should faithfully discharge their duty to the house, or pay a proper deference to that patriotic distrust which pervades the country at the present time, in regard to the affairs of the custom house at New York, were they to limit their inquiries to the returns of the late collector and naval officer, and neglect entirely those of their successors, which must, at all times, be to the country of equal interest with the former, and, at the present time, of even more immediate importance to the security of the national treasury. But, in the execution of so much of this part of their inquiries as related to the present collector at New York, they were compelled to encounter most unexpected obstacles, interposed by the collector himself, and setting at defiance the authority delegated to the committee by the house. The facts connected with the baffled endeavors of the committee to obtain information for the house and country from this officer of the executive branch of the government, who is in immediate charge of and control over public moneys that "equal nearly two-thirds of the whole amount" collected from customs "in all the United States," will be more specially detailed in a subsequent portion of this report.

The committee will remark here, that in the outset of the investigation they have made, they supposed it both proper and safe to place themselves somewhat confidently under the guidance of the several special reports which had been made to the house upon the subject of Mr. Swartwout's defalcations, by the treasury officers, previous to the appointment of the committee; combining, in this view, reports from the secretary of the treasury, the first comptroller, the solicitor, and first auditor of the treasury, as exhibited in house document 13. It, however, very soon became evident that those reports were not to be implicitly relied on as auxiliaries in finding out either the law or the facts of the case; and that, on the contrary, they furnished but an oblique view of both the causes and duration of Mr. Swartwout's defalcations, as also of the law and many material facts which develop the true character of those defalcations. Of necessity, therefore, these reports, although emanating from the highest orders of official functionaries employed in the collection and disbursement of the public revenue, became the subjects of as cautious and critical examination as any other portions of evidence which the case presented; and, as such, it will be obligatory upon the committee to treat them in this report.

In reviewing the details of their labors, so that the progress and results of them may be presented in the simplest form, the committee propose to consider—

- Part 1. The defalcations of Mr. Swartwout.
- Part 2. The defalcations of Mr. Price.
- Part 3. The correctness of the returns which have been made by the present collector and naval officer at the port of New York, respectively.
- Part 4. Defalcations among receivers of the public money.

"Inaugural address of president Jackson, March 4, 1829.

Part 5. Facts connected with the foregoing defalcations, and deemed material to develop their true character.

Each of the devisions thus proposed will properly involve the law appertaining to it, as the appropriate adjunct of its facts. And as the language of the law itself will in each instance be cited in detail, that its authority and injunction may be correctly understood by every one, so the language of the individual testimony relied on in each instance may be adduced, and that its import and force may be left neither to uncertain construction nor doubtful inference. The increased fidelity of their report, in the estimation of the committee, will be, by this mode, an ample offset to its consequent enlargement.

Before proceeding to the general topics of this report, already laid down, it may be proper here to express the deep sense of disappointment and regret of the committee, in not being able to communicate to the house one document that was called for at an early day, regarded as having an important and interesting influence upon the judgment which the house might form on the subject of defalcations among public officers, and the causes which have led to their multiplication. It will be perceived from the following letter, that the committee availed itself of the earliest period after their organization, to make a call upon the president to furnish a list of the defalcations that have taken place among collectors, receivers and disbursers of public money, and other public officers, since the 4th of March, 1829, showing the amount of each, &c.

More than four weeks have now elapsed since that call was made upon the president, and the only information which the committee have obtained to report upon to the house is embraced in the following letter, the distinguishing feature of which information is, that it still more than even the whole remainder of the session will be requisite to answer the call. From this the committee are compelled, reluctantly, to mer, either—

1st. That the accounts and records of the several departments, in general, are so incomplete and defective as not to exhibit, without great labor and delay, the true relations of collectors, receivers and disbursers of the public money, and of other officers, to the government, so as to distinguish debtors from defaulters, and creditors from both; or 2dly. That the number of the defaulters have multiplied so rapidly since 1829, under the system of accountability pursued towards collectors, receivers and disbursers of the public money, and other officers, as to preclude the practicability of securing an account current of their defalcations upon the records of the departments, with all the clerical force at the command of those departments under existing laws and appropriations.

If either inference be just, (and none other of equal weight seems to be fairly deducible from the letter of the secretary of the treasury,) it manifests a general laxity of administration, which demands the earliest application of suitable remedies within the reach of congress and of the country.

For papers Nos. 1 and 2, referred to in the subjoined letter, reference is respectfully made to the journal of the committee.

Treasury Department, February 15, 1839

Sir: The president, on the 23d ultimo, referred to this department the following resolution passed by the investigating committee:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to cause this committee to be furnished by the proper executive department with a tabular showing the defalcations which have occurred among the collectors, receivers and disbursers of public money, and other public officers, since the 4th day of March, 1829; the names of the defaulters; the amount of each defalcation; when each case occurred; the length of time each case has existed; what steps have been taken by the proper departments or officers to prosecute the defaulters and to secure the United States, in each case; and what defaulters are retained in the same offices in which they became defaulters, or have been appointed to other offices."

I accompanied it by a request that all the information desired should be procured early as practicable, and submitted by me to the committee. Accordingly, on the same day, I enclosed copies of it to the other departments, and also to the proper bureaus in the treasury department, and desired that replies might be furnished, so far as in their power, and soon as in their power, to the several inquiries made. I further requested the bureaus connected with this department to employ any extra assistance that could be advantageously applied in hastening their answers.

I would now inform the committee that great progress has been made in respect to those parts of the answers connected with the register's office, and all which could be made, consistent with the difficulty and extent of the labor, in the third auditor's office. But it is feared that, on account of this labors, and the great mass of previous calls by committees, and by the two houses of congress, which are also to be answered, besides transacting the current business in the different bureaus, the whole detail and tabular statement required cannot be completed during the session. Every effort, however, which, under all the circumstances, can be made, is believed to be exerted to meet the call at the earliest day practicable.

In respect to the last branch of the resolution, asking "what defaulters are retained in the same offices in which they became defaulters, or have been appointed to other offices," I am able at present to present the report of the register, from his office, which exhibits such names as are on his books connected with the state and treasury departments. It is annexed, and contains no name as to this, and but one as to the state department. That one is commodore D. Porter; and by the correspondence annexed, it will be seen that he does not consider himself a defaulter, though he stands charged on the register's books for a complained sum on account of prize money, as explained in the papers (Nos. 1 and 2).

Respectfully,
LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the treasury.

Hon. James Hurlan, chair. of invest. committee.

Referring to the order heretofore proposed the committee will now proceed to consider—

PART I.

THE DEFALCATIONS OF MR. SWARTWOUT.

This branch of the report divides itself with reference to—1st. Their extent. 2d. Their duration. 3d. Their causes.

1. THE EXTENT OF MR. SWARTWOUT'S DEFALCATIONS.

There seems to be no cause to doubt the correctness of the reports of the treasury officers, as to the extent of Mr. Swartwout's defalcations, viz: ($1,225,705 69), one million two hundred and twenty five thousand seven hundred and five dollars and sixty-nine cents. At any rate, though the aggregate may be varied by further adjustments, this is no more nor less than the indebtedness which his own books of accounts exhibit against him; and, what is of no less importance than that may be a matter of surprise to the house and country to understand, this indebtedness of Mr. Swartwout to the government, now constituting the measure of his defalcations, great and alarming as it is, is no more nor less than has been shown official quarterly returns, made with periodical regularity, and for the investigation of the accounting officers of the treasury department.

On the accounts of Mr. Swartwout to the end of the last quarter preceeding his leaving the office of collector, viz: up to December 31, 1837, no difference whatever, not to the amount of a dollar, has arisen between him and the accounting officers of the treasury. In regard to all transactions up to that period, all his charges against the government have been found just and allowed; and on the other hand, he has not been found chargeable with any sum whatever, which he had omitted to charge against himself.

There being, moreover, no dispute or omission of items in his subsequent and last quarter's accounts, up to March 28, 1838, it follows that no part of the large defalcation already stated is derived by either travelling out of his own books of official accounts, set against him, or by the actual balance returned by him, since adjudged by the treasury department up to December, 1837.

To these points, the testimony of Mr. Fleming, auditor of the customs and of both the late and present collector at New York, is explicit, as follows:

Examined by Mr. Smith.

Question 113. What is the aggregate difference of the fourth quarter of 1837, as returned by him to the treasury department, and the amount which has subsequently been allowed to him on those accounts by the treasury department?

Answer. I think the treasury department have allowed all the charges made by Mr. Swartwout to such account with the treasury department.

Question 114. Has the treasury department, in the year 1837, charged said Swartwout with any sum which he had omitted in his own accounts, rendered up to said period?

Answer. They have not.

Question 115. Is or is not the balance now claimed to be due by the treasury department from Swartwout, according to house document 13, and amounting to $1,225,705 69, derived wholly from the balance found due on his accounts, ending December 31, 1837, as settled by the treasury department, and from the balance of his succeeding quarter of official operations combined?

Answer. It is. (See journal of the committee).

John Underwood, esq., examining clerk in the office of the first auditor of the treasury, and the confidential clerk delegated by the secretary of the treasury to visit New York and inspect the custom house books, in conjunction with the first comptroller and solicitor of the treasury, in November last, thus bears testimony to the same facts:

Examined by Mr. Curtis.

Question 2. Has Mr. Swartwout, in any instance, omitted to debit himself, and credit the United States in his quarterly accounts, with any amount which ought to have been thus entered by him, in order to show the true balance due from Mr. Swartwout?

Answer. I do not know that he has.

Question 4. Upon the quarterly accounts rendered by Mr. Swartwout, would not an examination of them, and a striking of the balance, have shown the true amount due from Mr. Swartwout at any time?

Answer. It would; for, although the particular items of the balance might, from circumstances, differ from the true amount of each, yet the aggregate balance would be a true one. And this will always be so, good, unless a part of the duties secured by and charged to the collector had been suppressed by him. That this has been done by the late collector at New York I know not.

Question 5. Have you, in your investigation of Mr. Swartwout's accounts, or has the treasury department, to your knowledge, ascertained any, and what, sum which ought to have been, but which was not, credited to the United States by Mr. Swartwout, and charged to himself, either under its specific and appropriate head, or under the head of cash and bonds?

Answer. I do not know of any such omission in his quarterly accounts, which are the accounts received at the office of the first auditor.

Question 7. Did or did not the charges against Mr. Swartwout at the treasury, and the debit side of his own account, as rendered by himself to the treasury, include the whole amount of the various items which make up his defalcations, as set forth in the letter of Mr. Gilpin and Mr. Barker, addressed to the secretary of the treasury, dated 15th November, 1838, being paper 15, document 13, H. R. 3d session 25th congress?

Answer. They did.

Question 9. Could you not, from Mr. Swartwout's accounts rendered at the treasury department, ascertain the balance due from Mr. Swartwout, without a resort to the New York custom house books?

Answer. If the accounts for the first quarter of 1838, that is, the closing period of his term, had been forwarded to the treasury, the true balance due from him could have been ascertained there. These accounts, however, were retained at the custom house until they were sent on, at my instance, to the treasury, at the same time I returned to Washington, in November, 1838.

Question 13. Did you, in your examination into the origin and progress of Mr. Swartwout's defalcation, find any new items which ought to have been debited to Swartwout and credited to the United States, in his quarterly accounts, and which had not been so entered?

Answer. I did not.

From the preceding testimony, the committee report, as established facts:

1st. That Mr. Swartwout is a defaulter to government, as appears by his own returns, as adjusted from time to time at the treasury department, in the sum of one million two hundred and twenty-five thousand seven hundred and five dollars and sixty-nine cents.

2dly. That this amount of indebtedness has accumulated upon the face of the quarterly accounts truly returned by him for adjustment at the treasury department, without the omission of any items of either debit or credit thereon, until it became an absolute defalcation.

2. THE DURATION OF MR. SWARTWOUT'S DEFALCATIONS.

The treasury officers unite in representing Mr. Swartwout's defalcations as commencing as far back as in 1830. The secretary of the treasury sums up his own examination on this point, and also the statements of the first comptroller, first auditor, and solicitor of the treasury, thus: "The first misuse of the public money by Mr. Swartwout, as collector, appears to have commenced in 1830. A series of defalcations, in various items of his accounts, seem to have followed, and continued through each successive year, increasing constantly in amount, till near the close of his official term. See a recent house document 13, p. 4. This would indicate that they have been a character to elude the vigilance of the accounting officers of the treasury for a series of years, and extending back of the period when the present secretary of the treasury, the present first comptroller, the present first auditor, and the present solicitor of the treasury, respectively came into office. But the committee do not concur in this view of the matter, nor do they find the facts to warrant the imprecations of any such early date upon Mr. Swartwout's defalcations.

So far as Mr. Swartwout's interests or reputation are to be affected, it matters not whether any portion of his defalcations be traced back to 1830, or only to 1837; because such a question, respecting dates, is not pretended in any way to alter the aggregate amount. He is equally a defaulter in the sum of $1,225,705 69, whether he is to be adjudged a defaulter from the earlier or only from the later period mentioned.

Nevertheless, the instruction of the house to the committee, in the resolution of appointment, has required, for obviously sound reasons, that the true dates or precise duration of Mr. Swartwout's defalcations be investigated; and hence the obligation rests upon the committee to present the facts truly as they have been found on investigation.

To comprehend the process by which the treasury officers assume to carry the date of any portion of Mr. Swartwout's defalcation anterior to 1837, it is necessary to pay attention to the system of book-keeping that has existed in the custom house at New York since the year 1799. (See committee's journal, answer 6 of Mr. Shultz.)

There are numerous subordinate accounts kept in the custom house at New York, by way of keeping distinct exhibits of the expenditures made upon distinct objects. The effect is to simplify and systematize the divisions of labor and of responsibility into which the great aggregate of business at the custom house naturally and necessarily resolves itself. On these separate accounts, expenditures made by the collector are charged to the government, and are balanced only when the same charges are transferred to the quarterly account of the collector, upon which he settles all his financial operations for the government at the treasury, unless he enters under some special appropriation made by congress, and then he renders a separate account. But no charge in the quarterly account is allowed until accompanied by a voucher, no items are carried specifically or by name, from the subordinate accounts of the collector thus kept at the custom house, to his quarterly account returned to the treasury, until the requisite vouchers have been obtained, and he is prepared to settle such items finally. When any items are thus settled, they pass out of both the subordinate and the quarterly accounts, in order to indemnify himself in his quarter-yearly settlements at the treasury (required by law) for the amounts, or unsatisfied balances of charges against the government exhibited by these numerous subordinate accounts; and until he obtains vouchers to settle them finally, his course was, and must of need be, to add them together, and carry them, in the aggregate, into his quarterly account, under the general designation of "amount of unsettled accounts," or "amount of unsettled and suspense accounts." This, however, is not done in the nature of a charge, but as a part of a recapitulatory explanation that is contained in every quarterly return of accounts, by way of indicating what amount of actual offsets he has to the balance stated against him, and also what has become of the money he has received to constitute such balance. If, with such an explanation, the accounting officer seeks to admit the account to settlement, the balance passed to his account for the next quarter, and so on.

It should be remembered here, that, of the subordinate accounts thus kept for the convenience of better management of the internal affairs of the custom house, nothing is officially known to, or recognized by, the accounting officers of the treasury department. They are not the offspring of any treasury regulation, but are the arbitrary institutions of the collector. It is from these that he makes up his quarterly account current; but such quarterly account is the one returned to the first auditor of the treasury, and is the only one of final adjustment that is required, or recognized, by the accounting officers of the treasury.

With this explanation, it is manifest that the item of unsettled or suspense accounts of the collector, in his quarterly return, only represents sundry assets of items which pertain to his quarterly account; they are not dependent upon, or the growth of, distinct and separate funds from those which enter generally into his quarterly account. Hence, to separate one of these subordinate accounts, or classes of items, in regard to which a balance may be standing against the collector, from the remainder of such subordinate accounts, or classes of items, in regard to which a much larger balance is standing in his favor, and to pronounce him a defaulter to the government on the former balance, because the other balance in his favor is susceptible of being absorbed by bringing it into an offset to the whole remainder of items of which the collector's quarterly account is composed, cannot be regarded by the committee as a fair and just representation of the collector's accounts, or of his defalcation. But such is the process by which the treasury officers, secretary, comptroller, auditor and solicitor, have made Mr. Swartwout guilty of "a series of defalcations," continued through successive years, since 1830, and prior to 1837.

The committee conceive that there is a propriety in either taking the whole of the items or subdivisions of Mr. Swartwout's suspense account together, and striking a balance thereon at the end of each successive quarter of his term, or in taking each of its subdivisions apart from all the rest, and striking the balance on each at the end of each successive quarter of his term; offsetting thereafter the one by the other, to resolve them into one final balance. By either process, it will appear that at the end of no quarter since 1835, has the true balance of these suspense accounts ever been otherwise than has been returned by Mr. Swartwout in his quarterly accounts to the treasury; and that at the end of no quarter has it been otherwise than a balance largely in favor of Mr. Swartwout. It is obviously most easy, by selecting portions of these subordinate accounts, and separating them from the remainder, to exhibit a balance against him at any time that may be desirable, since the commencement of his accounts. But such a procedure is not to be justified upon any principle of honorable dealing.

Nor is the character or dates of Mr. Swartwout's defalcations at all altered by the fact, that to one subdivision of his subordinate and suspense accounts, he credited the government, or charged himself with moneys from his cash account, or from the treasury, which should have been thus credited or charged to a different subdivision; for thereby the true balance of these accounts resolved quarterly into one aggregate, and, as carried into each quarterly account to the treasury, under the general designation heretofore described, and into the only account known to the treasury, was in no degree lessened, enlarged, or affected. If it were true that the collector has been required to make separate settlements at the treasury on these subordinate accounts, or subdivisions of his quarterly account, then, an erroneous credit of moneys to one subdivision would proportionately affect the other, in such a way which it had been thus directed. Such, however, not being the mode of settlement known to the treasury, or required by Mr. Swartwout, no confusion of debits or credits, however great it might be, in the subordinate accounts of the collector at the custom house, could furnish ground for reproach upon the collector's quarterly account current at the treasury department, where nothing is required, cared, or known about his subordinate accounts.

All the items charged upon Mr. Swartwout as defalcations, dating anterior to 1837, are found by the committee to have been entered in the proper quarters of Mr. Swartwout's subordinate accounts at the custom house, to which they appertained, and carried from them, at the proper time, to his quarterly account rendered at the treasury department; forming, at all times, a component part of the aggregate balance exhibited against himself.

They consist of—1st. "Tonnage duties," $2,271 39, minus $188 15; 2d. "Forfeitures and penalties," $39,823 12; 3d. "Treasury warrants," $39,240 05; 4th. "Office expenses," $60,291 42; 5th. "Cash retained for refunding merchants," $80,769 32; total $121,907 36. Their history will be considered in the next part of this enumeration.

1. "TONNAGE DUTIES."

It is quite apparent that the solicitor and comptroller of the treasury, in their examination of Mr. Swartwout's books at New York, in November last, well might persuade themselves that this item did not amount to a defalcation, or even just charge upon Mr. Swartwout, although charged to himself in his accounts. In their joint report to the secretary of the treasury, (house doc. 13, p. 25), they say: "It may be that this deficit has arisen from errors which have crept into the account during the five years through which it extends. The amount is so small as to give color to this supposition."

The examination of Mr. Fleming, auditor of the customs under both the late and present collector, was as follows, upon this item:

Examined by Mr. Smith.

Question 84. Mr. Swartwout has been represented as a defaulter on his accounts to the amount of $2,271 39, for "tonnage duty," accruing in the years of 1830, '31, '32 and '33, and which sum has not been debited in his cash accounts. Do you or do you not believe, from the examination you have made of said accounts, that said amount is not properly chargeable to Mr. Swartwout as a defalcation, but should have been set down as error, from which no money was realized by him?

Answer. I believe that said amount was purely an error. A vessel may have been subject to tonnage duty, and yet, from inadvertence, it may not have been collected at the custom house; and when the tonnage account was made up for the treasury, the omission may have been discovered; consequently, the collector would credit the United States for the money, and rely upon collecting it afterwards, and yet never realize it.

Mr. Nathaniel Shultz, the predecessor of Mr. Fleming in the auditor's office of the custom house under Mr. Swartwout, was subsequently called, and the following examination was had of him on the same point:

Examined by Mr. Curtis.

Question 83. Will you examine the statement presented by Mr. Gilpin and Mr. Barker in their letter of the 15th November, 1838, (paper 15 in doc. 13), and say whether their statement of Mr. Swartwout's defalcation prior to (July, 1836), the time you left the custom house, be correct or not; and if incorrect, point out wherein?

Answer. In respect to all that is said about tonnage duties, their statement is erroneous. Mr. Swartwout regularly entered all the tonnage duties and money received thereon, upon his cash book, and other books, and accounted regularly for the same in his quarterly and other returns. I am certain of this, and I show you now, in the book before the committee, the cash book, and other books, that they were so entered and accounted for at the proper times. It is not right to say Mr. Swartwout is a defaulter for any of these items of tonnage duties; and I maintain and show, by the books and returns, that they have been regularly accounted for to the United States.

2. "FORFEITURES AND PENALTIES"

The item of "forfeitures and penalties," now charged as a defalcation, is thus stated by the solicitor and comptroller in their joint report, before named, p. 25:

"The 'forfeitures and penalties' belonging to the United States constitute the second fund," in which there is a deficit. It amounts, in the aggregate, to $39,823 12. Of this, there occurred

In the year 1832, the sum of	$29,632 46;
In the year 1833, the sum of	3,674 04;
In the year 1834, the sum of	1,173 09;
In the year 1835, the sum of	5,343 53;

$39,823 12."

Of this item, the examination of Mr. Fleming was as follows:

Examined by Mr. Smith.

Question 85. In house doc. 13, before named, the solicitor of the treasury reports Mr. Swartwout as a defaulter, in the sum of $39,823 12, for "forfeitures and penalties" received by him during the year 1832, '33, '34 and '35, and not debited in his cash account. Please to examine the original of Mr. Swartwout's quarterly returns in the custom house books, now before you, and state if the several receipts of money by Swartwout, amounting to said aggregate, are not specifically entered in his quarterly returns to the treasury department, and in the order of their receipt, under the plain designation of "amount of forfeitures received, per abstract" —? If yes, please to copy such entries, verbatim, as you find them on the original of Swartwout's returns, designating the quarter of each year in which they are found.

Answer. There are several receipts of money specifically entered in Mr. Swartwout's quarterly accounts current, and are as follows:

2d quarter 1832, "By amount of forfeitures received, per abstract G"	$2,200 33
3d quarter 1832, "By amount of forfeitures received, per abstract G"	1,946 61
4th quarter 1832, "By amount of forfeitures received this quarter, per abstract G"	25,107 92

* The reader should bear in mind that the different sources of public moneys received by a collector do not create distinct funds in his hands, and are not known as such by any treasury regulation. They all resolve themselves, as fast as collected, into one fund; and are accounted for by the collector in one return; and are drawn upon, or passed to the credit of the treasury, as one mass.

1st quarter 1833. "By amount of forfeitures received this quarter, per abstract J"	374 35
2d quarter 1833. "By amount of forfeitures received this quarter, per abstract H"	1,612 64
4th quarter 1833. "By amount of forfeitures received this quarter, per abstract J"	1,687 05
3d quarter 1834. "By amount of forfeitures received this quarter, per abstract H"	299 55
4th quarter 1834. "By amount of forfeitures and penalties, per abstract J"	1,080 37
4th quarter 1835. "By amount of forfeitures received, per abstract J"	5,342 53
	$39,651 35

The aggregate of the above varies somewhat from the aggregate contained in the interrogatory; but in its details it is essentially the same.

Question 86. Have the alphabetically-marked abstracts, referred to in the above entries of Swartwout's quarterly accounts current, as specified in your last answer, been invariably sent to the treasury department with explanatory vouchers, and in company with said quarterly accounts; and are similar vouchers and abstracts sent in explanation of every other item of credit contained in the collector's quarterly returns?

Answer. To the whole of the interrogatory I answer yes.

Examined by Mr. Wise.

Question 90. Were not the "forfeitures" which Mr. Swartwout received all credited to government in his quarterly accounts current; and were they not carried forward regularly in the balances due government on said accounts?

Answer. They were.

The examination of Mr. Shultz on this point was as follows:

Examined by Mr. Curtis.

Question 1. Were you formerly auditor of the custom house at New York? If yes, how long did you perform the duties of that station, and when did you retire from it?

Answer. I was formerly auditor. I think I was about thirty-seven years auditor at the custom house in New York. I retired on the 1st of July, 1836, having been thirty-eight years and four months in the custom house.

Question 4. Did the accounts rendered by you, as auditor of the custom house, to the treasury department, truly set forth the state of the accounts between Swartwout and the United States?

Answer. The accounts of Mr. Swartwout were correct up to the 31st of March, 1836, with the exception of the forfeitures as already stated, as far as my knowledge extended.

Question 5. What reason have you to say they were correct? What means of knowledge had you?

Answer. The accounts underwent a critical examination by me; so that if there was an error of one cent, I had the means of discovering it by proving the accounts.

Question 6. Can you inform the committee when these forfeitures, to the amount of $40,000, were paid over by the marshal to Mr. Swartwout?

Answer. They were paid by the marshal to him as follows:

2d quarter, 1832	$2,200 33
3d quarter, 1832	1,946 61
4th quarter, 1832	25,107 92
1st quarter, 1833	374 35
2d quarter, 1833	1,612 64
4th quarter, 1833	1,687 05
3d quarter, 1834	299 55
4th quarter, 1834	1,080 37
3d quarter, 1835	725 02
4th quarter, 1835	5,342 53
	$40,376 37

Mr. Swartwout gave to me regularly the accounts relating to those forfeitures; they were by me examined and regularly passed to the credit of the United States in the account current for the quarters as they are above stated, and as they were returned to the treasury. A few of the above items were paid to the cashier of the custom house, and about $40,000 were outstanding or unpaid on the 31st of March, 1836.

In answer 13. Mr. Shultz says:

"The next item is 'forfeitures and penalties,' amounting to $39,823 12; the amount of this item. I have already shown the committee, by the books, the 'cash book,' the 'book of general accounts,' 'account current book,' (from which last book the quarterly accounts are copied and sent to the treasury department), was regularly credited to the United States. But Mr. Swartwout retained a large portion of this amount in his hands; and the weekly returns showed that he retained this money at the time, because they did not acknowledge the receipt of it. His accounts forwarded to Washington showed that he owed this money to the United States."

Examined by Mr. Foster.

Question 20. You have stated in your answer to the seventh question by Mr. Curtis that the amount received in the fourth quarter of 1832 by Mr. Swartwout, for forfeitures belonging to the United States, was $23,107 92. Now, will you state how that sum was credited to the government?

Answer. It was credited in his quarterly return for that quarter, as follows: "By amount of forfeitures received this quarter, per abstract G," $25,107 92.

3. "TREASURY WARRANTS."

In relation to this item, the examination of Mr. Fleming was as follows:

Examined by Mr. Smith.

Question 22. In the joint report of the comptroller and solicitor of the treasury to the secretary of the treasury, contained in the house document 13, 3d session 25th congress, page 26, in relation to three treasury warrants received by Mr. Swartwout, amounting to $39,240 05, it is said: "Their receipt appears by his books, but the proceeds have never been debited in his cash account; and their whole amount still remains entirely unaccounted for." Is it, or is it not, true that said treasury warrants are accounted for on Mr. Swartwout's books at the custom house, and form a portion of the aggregate balance due from him to the government?

Answer. It is true that these warrants are accounted for on Mr. Swartwout's books, and that they form a part of the balance due the United States, and have been carried forward in the aggregate balance of each quarter down to the close of his term of office.

Examined by Mr. Owens.

Question 56. Refer to your answer to the 22d question, propounded by Mr. Smith, and say whether the warrants alluded to were accounted for by Swartwout, except so far as they form part of the balance due to the United States, and whether he stands debited with the amount in his cash account?

Answer. For the warrants alluded to, Mr. Swartwout never entered the amounts to his debit in his own cash account; and they were therefore held in suspense, although they continually formed part of the outstanding balance due to the United States.

In answer, (examined by Mr. Curtis), Mr. Shultz says, alluding to the solicitor and comptroller's report, house document 13: "The statement of Messrs. Gilpin and Barker in regard to these items is wholly incorrect. These warrants were, to my knowledge, applied to the purposes for which they were received, and regularly accounted for. I have shown you that they were regularly entered in the 'cash book,' and in the book called 'collector's book of official accounts,' which contains the 'accounts of expenses of his office, and emoluments and fees.' I lay before the committee the last mentioned book, and show the application of each of the said warrants, a quarterly and annual account, returned to the treasury department at the proper time, contain a full explanation of these items."

The same witness was subsequently examined (by Mr. Curtis) as follows:

Question 15. Can you give a statement copied from the "book of fees and emoluments," to show the application of the three treasury warrants?

Answer. In answer to the 13th interrogatory, I yesterday showed the book to the committee, and proved that the proceeds of the three treasury warrants issued in 1834 and 1835 were applied actually to the payment of the clerks for the year 1834.

The markers, gaugers, weighers, measurers, inspectors, &c., and all the officers except clerks, are appointed by the secretary of the treasury, are regarded as public officers, and are paid out of the public money, which is charged in the account of collector with the United States quarterly. The fees and commissions of the collector are appropriated to pay the clerks, and an account of the fees and commissions is kept; and if they fall short of a sufficient sum to pay the clerks, the treasury department sends on warrant upon the treasurer to make up the sum sufficient to pay the clerks. There was a deficiency of fees and emoluments to pay the clerks in 1834.

The three warrants, amounting to $39,240 05, before mentioned, were received for that purpose. I have made a copy of the account referred to in the answer to the 13th interrogatory, and it shows that the proceeds of those three warrants were applied to pay the clerks. The account is a true copy, and is marked B.

Copies of these accounts, quarterly and annual, with the vouchers, were forwarded to the treasury department.

4. "OFFICE EXPENSES."

In relation to this item, Mr. Fleming's examination was as follows:

Examined by Mr. Smith.

Question 98. On page 26 of house document 13, in the report of the solicitor and comptroller of the treasury, Mr. Swartwout is charged with $60,291 42, alleged to have been drawn by him for expenses of his office, beyond the actual amount of those expenses, during the years 1835, 1836 and 1837, and that it said sum he is a defaulter to the government. Please state whether each of the sums received by Mr. Swartwout, making up said aggregate of expenses overdrawn, was not carried into and made a component part of the balance of the quarterly accounts returned to the treasury department.

Answer. They were.

Mr. Phillips, cashier of the custom house under Mr. Swartwout, testified as follows:

Examined by Mr. Smith.

Question 42. Please to examine pages 26, 43 and 44, in before named house document 13, and say whether, on the first of March, 1836, the balance of Mr. Underwood, clerk in the office of the auditor of the treasury, with any information relative to any of the defalcations amounting to $60,291 42, there charged upon Mr. Swartwout under the head of "cash drawn to pay expenses of office, more than amount of same, not debited in cash account," or do you know, or have you ever known, of any such defalcation.

Answer. I have no knowledge of the statement in page 26, document 13, of "cash withdrawn for the alleged purpose of paying expenses of the office, &c., amounting to $60,291 42, nor of similar statement on pages 43 and 44, and I do not know, or ever have known, any such defalcation.

5. "CASH RETAINED FOR REFUNDING MERCHANTS."

This item of $80,769 53, since first set apart by Mr. Swartwout, to be examined to be reported to the treasury department in his quarterly accounts, and put on his aggregate balance of cash and unsettled accounts. When originally retained, it was expressly reported in his weekly return to the secretary, "March 26, 1836," as follows: "Retained, for refunding to merchants, $80,769 53." (See extracts from custom house books in Mr. Fleming's testimony, committee's journal.) And in his succeeding weekly return, dated March 31, 1836, he reported, for that week, as cash received, $64,905 49. (See same testimony); and in his quarterly return, ending on the same date, March 31, 1836, he reported, as follows: "Cash retained the 31st March, 1836, $145,675 02." (See continuation of same testimony, committee's journal.) Thus expressly combining the cash of those two weeks into his cash and suspense account. Moreover, Mr. Fleming says, in his 75th answer to Mr. Smith, (committee's journal), that this sum was retained by Mr. Swartwout "with the knowledge of the treasury." It always constituted, thereafter, a component part of Mr. Swartwout's quarterly balance reported by himself to the treasury; and on this Mr. Fleming is interrogated by Mr. Smith, and answered as follows:

Question 75. Could "the large sum of $80,769 53," described in your last answer, retained by Swartwout in 1836, have become a defalcation if the treasury department had not lost sight of it in the examination of his accounts, inasmuch as you say in your last answer that it was retained "with the knowledge of the treasury?"

Answer. It could not.

With such evidence before them, the committee do not feel justified in sustaining or acceding to the correctness of the view presented to the house and country by the executive and the treasury officers, in house document 13, that Mr. Swartwout became a defaulter at any time prior to 1837 on either of the items of account above enumerated—amounting in all to $221,907 36. On the contrary, he accounted for them properly to the treasury, but was permitted to retain them until his last quarter of service; and then and not until then, was he required to pay them; and then did he become a defaulter for them, and not before. There has not been discovered any evidence whatever that, in regard to this portion of his present indebtedness, Mr. Swartwout's accounts, either at the custom house or as returned to the treasury, bear any impress of fraud or deception; for what was charged on one of these accounts, was fully charged on another of them. Yet, in fact, if there was any such fraud or deception, it was confined to, and consisted in, the manner of keeping his accounts at the custom house, (with which the treasury, as remarked in a former part of this report, had nothing to do), and it ceased with the making out of his quarterly accounts to the treasury, inasmuch as in the latter these sums were always included in the item of "cash and unsettled accounts;" and the only variation between the quarterly returns to the treasury and the accounts at the custom house is found to have been in the fact, that in the former he specified as "cash and unsettled accounts" the very items which are now in question, while at the custom house these items were retained in the unsettled accounts, and not in the cash account. In other words, it was only on the books of the custom house, that he concealed and suppressed the true cash balance in his hands." How then can he be said to have been in default on his accounts with the treasury, at any period for these items?

The examination of Mr. Underwood, the treasury's own agent to investigate the accounts, fully illustrates and substantiates the views here presented and adopted by the committee.

Examined by Mr. Owens.

Question 29. Refer to your answer to the 5th question, propounded by Mr. Curtis, and say whether the accounts of which you there speak corresponded with the accounts as contained in the books of Mr. Swartwout at the custom house at New York, and examined by you, both cash and other books; and if they were at variance, state distinctly in what consisted the difference.

Answer. The quarterly accounts rendered to the treasury corresponded with the accounts at the custom house, so far as to make up the aggregate balance; but on examination at the custom house, of the "suspense account," which in connexion with the "cash on hand," formed one item in the balance of his quarterly account, it appeared that several sums, such as treasury warrants, moneys arising from forfeitures, &c. to a large amount, were retained in his suspense account, which should have been recognized and accounted for in his cash account; in this consisted the difference between the collector's accounts on his books and those returned to the treasury—a difference which, as has been previously stated, did not affect the aggregate balance due from Mr. Swartwout, but only the particulars of said balance.

Question 30. Refer to your answer to the 3d question propounded by Mr. Curtis; say, though he, (Swartwout), omitted no debit or credit to the United States in his quarterly account, as stated in that question, whether he did or did not omit to debit himself with cash received; and state the amount of cash not so debited, from your knowledge of the accounts of Swartwout as rendered to the auditor's department at Washington, and the examination of his cash or other books at the custom house at New York. Be as clear and distinct on the subject as your knowledge will enable you to be.

Answer. In the last answer, I have stated that in the "suspense account," kept by the collector at the custom house, he had entered certain sums to the debit of said account, which should have been charged to the "cash account." The amount of said sums as will be seen by reference to document No. 13, was $221,907 36. It was, therefore, in the cash account kept by him at the custom house that he omitted to charge himself with the above amount, and not in his quarterly accounts rendered to the treasury, in which it is believed he credited and held himself accountable for all duties received by him.

Question 31. Refer to your answer to the 6th question propounded by Mr. Curtis, and say whether, upon examination of Swartwout's accounts as rendered at the auditor's office, the defalcation could have been readily detected or not; and whether, upon the examination of all or part of the books at the custom house, and in reference to the accounts rendered by Swartwout, the defalcation was not apparent to you; and whether, though the true and aggregate balance of his accounts were concealed by means of fraud or falsehood, he did not in those accounts conceal and suppress the true cash balance in his hands.

Answer. No part of the defalcation could have been ascertained from an examination of Mr. Swartwout's quarterly accounts rendered to the first auditor prior to that arising on the bonds, which would have been made to appear on a thorough examination of them at the time they were received at the treasury. In the collector's quarterly account he always included the "cash and unsettled accounts" in one item of the balance, and there was no means in the first auditor's office of distinguishing the actual cash from the amount of unsettled and suspense accounts. It is therefore only on the books of the custom house, so far as I know, that it appears he concealed and suppressed the true cash balance in his hands.

Corroborative of the view thus taken by the committee, they will quote also another portion of Mr.

Fleming's testimony, which clearly indicates that he would not be led into an answer that would imply it as his opinion that Mr. Swartwout was or can justly be regarded as a defaulter prior to 1837. He leaves such a construction wholly to the responsibility of the executive officers.

Examined by Mr. Smith.

Question 73. What was the amount of Mr. Swartwout's defalcations arising prior to 1837, and subsequent to the year 1839?

Answer. The amount of such defalcations, as exhibited in the report of the secretary of the treasury, in document No. 13, to the house of representatives, was $336,718 69.

Question 74. Did you or did you not, in your examination of Swartwout's accounts, deduce and furnish to the treasury department the data upon which the treasury's report, referred to in your last answer, is founded?

Answer. I did not deduce and furnish to the treasury department such data. Mr. Underwood, of that department, came on to this city in November last, to investigate the accounts of Mr. Swartwout. The records of the custom house were laid before him, and he proceeded to draw up a statement, gleaned from those records, and from memorandums furnished him by the assistant cashier of the custom house, which enabled him to report to the treasury the indebtedness of Mr. Swartwout. From time to time, in the progress of his work, Mr. Underwood found it necessary to ask explanations from me, in relation to the records of the custom house, to enable him to pursue his labors understandingly.

Examined by Mr. Curtis.

Question 121. Were any of the quarterly returns false? If ye, which of them?

Answer. The accounts of bonds paid for the first and second quarters of 1837, rendered to the treasury department, were false, inasmuch as they did not contain all the bonds that were actually paid, by a very large amount, and which is seen in document No. 13, of the house of representatives.

Again, Mr. Fleming was asked by Mr. Smith: Question 2. When was the first deficiency in Mr. Swartwout's accounts detected by you; and to whom and when did you communicate the first information of your discovery?

Answer. The first deficiency in Mr. Swartwout's accounts was detected by me in the month of June, 1837. I noticed the circumstance to Mr. Phillips, the assistant cashier, at the same time.

Question 3. What was the amount of said deficiency discovered by you in June, 1837; and to whom, and when, if to any other person than Mr. Phillips, did you give information thereof?

Answer. The amount of deficiency was about $500,000; and the reply of Mr. Phillips, on my communicating to him the intelligence, prevented my mentioning it to others.

Question 4. What was Mr. Phillips's reply, adverted to in your last answer?

Answer. His reply was, that the cash book contained all the bonds that had been paid at the office; the residue were in suspense.

Examined by Mr. Foster.

Question 46. You mention in your answer to the 15th interrogatory, that you have never known, or detected, at any time, any false return or erroneous statement in any quarterly account made by Mr. Swartwout to the treasury department. Now, will you state whether there were not false or fraudulent omissions by Mr. Swartwout in his accounts, which were calculated to mislead and deceive yourself, as auditor, and the treasury department; and if so, what were those omissions, and when, as far as you know, did those omissions take place?

Answer. There were such omissions, (as is now ascertained), and they consisted in Mr. Swartwout's keeping out of his accounts a large sum of money paid to him on revenue bonds; and they took place principally in the 1st and 2d quarters of 1837.

When the same witness was carried back to the alleged defalcations of Mr. Swartwout prior to 1837, and so questioned as to lead him, if disposed, to describe them as defalcations, and as "fraudulent" omissions, he studiously and properly, as is believed, avoided every such assumption. The following interrogatories and answers will fully illustrate this fact:

Mr. Fleming examined by Mr. Foster.

Question 49. In your answer to the 19th interrogatory, in stating the balances of the four quarters of 1834 and the two first quarters of 1835, the whole balance of each quarter is stated as "due the United States." Now, is that intended to mean any thing more than that such balance is the amount for which he was responsible to the government, and not as a balance which he was then liable to pay?

Answer. The balance due the United States, which is charged at the end of every quarter, is the amount for which the collector is responsible to the government, and includes all duties which had accrued up to that time, whether collected or not.

Question 50. From what other sources did Mr. Swartwout receive money belonging to the government, (besides that received on revenue bonds), which he fraudulently omitted to charge against himself in his cash accounts on the custom house books? And what was the amount, as far as you are now able to state the same.

Answer. Mr. Swartwout received moneys from duties payable in cash, as well as bonds, also from goods imported to the United States, and also from certain treasury warrants, remitted to him from government. Another source of receipts was that arising from deposits for duties not ascertained, and payable in cash. Mr. Swartwout also advanced to himself moneys for the expenses of his office, more than were needed.

The total amount of moneys appropriated by Mr. Swartwout, and not placed to the debit of his own cash account, as is now ascertained, exclusive of the bond account, is about five hundred and eighty thousand dollars. In this sum, however, is embraced the amount which Mr. Swartwout retained on his going out of office, and which was about $201,000.

Question 51. Were the omissions of Mr. Swartwout, as stated in your last answer, such as to deceive you in regard to his real indebtedness to the government?

Answer. No examination was made to ascertain Mr. Swartwout's indebtedness to the government until after the expiration of his term of office, and therefore such omissions did not affect the adjustment of his current quarterly accounts; and their condition, or existence, was not a matter of inquiry by me—the outstanding balance of a previous quarter being always brought into a succeeding quarter.

Question 52. In auditing the weekly, monthly and quarterly accounts of Mr. Swartwout, did you have access to all accounts, abstracts and vouchers, which were afterwards sent by him to the treasury department?

Answer. All accounts for the treasury department are kept in the auditor's office, and pass under my supervision. In general, I made a cursory examination of all, before they were sent from the custom house.

Mr. Underwood, the confidential agent of the treasury department, with equal care and propriety, throughout his testimony, discriminates between the accounts of Mr. Swartwout as rendered prior, and those rendered subsequent, to the commencement of the year 1837. The fraudulent concealment is not by him made to attach to any returns prior to 1837, but to the abstract of bonds taken and paid in 1837.

Examined by Mr. Foster.

Question 26. You say, in answer to the 6th interrogatory, that you have no reason to believe that in Mr. Swartwout's quarterly accounts, adjusted at the treasury, he concealed, by means of fraud and falsehood, the true and aggregate balance of his account? Will you please to state whether you have no reason to believe that he fraudulently concealed in those accounts the true amount of money he had received; and were not his accounts so made out as to induce a belief that he had accounted fairly for all the money which had come to his hands?

Answer. When I said, in my answer to the 6th interrogatory, "I have no reason to believe that in Mr. Swartwout's quarterly accounts, adjusted at the treasury, he concealed, by means of fraud and falsehood, the true and aggregate balance of his account;" I meant that he had not in those accounts omitted to credit the United States, and make himself accountable for all the duties secured by him.—I did not mean to convey the idea that the items comprising the balance of his account were not erroneous in amount, and fraudulently so; the item of "bonds uncollected" in 1837 being too large, and that of "cash and unsettled and suspense accounts" correspondingly too small. I have reason to believe, that by the abstract of bonds taken and paid, rendered in 1837, "he fraudulently concealed the true amount of money he had received," although, at the same time, the aggregate balance of his account of the customs, for each quarter, was a correct one.

With equal precision the first auditor repudiates the idea of any fraud or defalcation in Swartwout's accounts prior to 1837. He was examined by Mr. Curtis, and answered as follows:

Question 6. Was there any omission, in Swartwout's quarterly returns to your office, of any sum or item, which he ought to have charged to himself, or credited to the United States therein? In other words, were not Swartwout's quarterly returns, in point of form, made according to the standing instructions and orders of the treasury department; and, in point of fact, did they not show the true balance due from Swartwout?

Answer. As far as my knowledge extends, the quarterly accounts of Swartwout were rendered in the usual form, and the proper credits for duties secured, and other moneys received by him, belonging to the United States, given; at least nothing to the contrary has yet been discovered. But they were erroneous and fraudulent in this: that he failed (as appears from the late investigation by the comptroller and solicitor made at the custom house in New York) to credit his bond account in the Book of notes of 1837, and in some subsequent quarters with the full amount of bonds paid within those quarters; the effect of which was, to exhibit a larger balance of bonds than was in point of fact on hand, and to lessen the cash balance; or, in other words, he failed to account truly for the cash he had received on bonds; and his account current of bonds was made to exhibit a false balance.

The defalcations of Mr. Swartwout in 1837, and the first quarter of 1838, (principally, however, in the two first quarters of 1837), consisted of the proceeds of bonds falling due within that period, and collected by him. Of all these bonds, however, he had regularly charged himself in his accounts returned to the treasury department, and they constituted a portion of the aggregate balance due from him to the government. When he collected them, instead of paying the amount into the treasury, and thus offsetting the charge for bonds in his accounts rendered to the department by a charge against the government of the cash so paid into the treasury, he retained and used the cash, leaving his indebtedness for bonds in his original amount.

Of all the sum withdrawn from his bank-deposit account as collector, and used for private purposes, prior and subsequent to 1837, as contained in a private memorandum kept by Mr. Phillips, his cashier, in the custom house, and forming a part of the reported defalcation in house document 13, the evidence is, that it was, from time to time, replaced by Mr. Swartwout's own funds, and by funds derived from the bonds of 1837, as well as by anticipating the cash on other duties of a succeeding week to make good his own cash on hand, and not replaced in the week preceding. This operation cast the whole of defalcations arising from the use of the moneys reported by Mr. Phillips upon the final weekly return of Mr. Swartwout.

Joshua Phillips examined by Mr. Smith.

Question 63. In house document 13, pages 52 and 53, is a schedule of your own, of numerous sums, amounting to $193,602 20, which were drawn from the public deposits, by Mr. Swartwout, for his own use. Do you mean said sums were drawn from his cash deposits, as collector, in the banks? If so, in what banks, according to the "check-book" spoken of by you at the foot of said schedule? Do you not know that Mr. Swartwout also replaced money thus taken; and, if so, to what amount?

Answer. The sums referred to in document 13, pages 52 and 53, amounting to $193,602 20, were drawn by him, as collector, from his cash deposits. They were drawn from the bank of America, Mechanics' bank and Manhattan company. I do not know that Mr. Swartwout ever replaced any of the particular sums contained in said list. He was, as I have stated, in the habit of drawing money, and would sometimes replace it; but I cannot particularize the amounts. I was not always in the habit of noting the checks that Mr. Swartwout used, and I cannot undertake to say what portion of the above amount was returned.

Question 64. How did Mr. Swartwout conceal, in his weekly cash returns to the secretary of the treasury, the weekly deficits in his bank accounts, occasioned by the sums which he had not replaced, to which you refer in your last answer?

Answer. The collections made by the banks up to 3 o'clock do not appear on the books of the custom house until the following day; consequently, in making up the weekly account for the treasury department, to 3 o'clock on Saturday, the amount collected at the bank on Saturday would not appear on the custom house books until Monday morning; by this means, he would have in bank the collections of bonds of Saturday, which do not appear in the weekly account of that Saturday; and that amount, so collected, would be carried to the next weekly account, and so continue on.

Question 71. Please now to state, distinctly, whether, taking your 63d, 64th and 70th answers, as they necessarily follow, as a truth, that the aggregate deficit in Mr. Swartwout's cash accounts at the banks, occasioned by the sums withdrawn, as you have stated, would fall into, and be betrayed by, his last and final weekly cash returns, if it were not true that such deficit had been, at some time, and from some source, replaced by him?

Answer. The aggregate deficit in Mr. Swartwout's cash account at the bank, occasioned by the sums withdrawn, would be betrayed by his last and final weekly cash returns, if it were not true that such deficit had been, at some time, replaced by him.

Question 72. Do you mean to be understood by your statement (No. 10) in the before named house document 13, commencing at page 54, of bonds which were paid to Mr. Swartwout, and recapitulated by Mr. Fleming, as amounting to $597,381 63, that the proceeds of said bonds were never deposited by said Swartwout in the said banks; and that, within your knowledge, they did not form a component part of the funds re-drawn by him on the checks alluded to in your last answer?

Answer. I mean to be understood, in my statement (No. 10) in document 13, commencing at page 54, that the proceeds of said bonds were deposited in bank; and the amount so received was applied by him to conceal his previous defalcations, which would have been discovered if the bonds in said list had been charged on the cash book.

Question 73. Did, or did not, the process resorted to by Mr. Swartwout, as alluded to in your last answer, to conceal his previous defalcations, consist in his applying said amount to his bank deposits, and to offset his before named withdrawals from such deposits?

Answer. The process resorted to by Mr. Swartwout to conceal his previous defalcations, did consist in his applying said amount to his bank deposits, and to offset his before named withdrawals from such deposits.

Henry Ogden, cashier of the customs:

Examined by Mr. Smith.

Question 19. On page 47, of house document 13, heretofore named, is your letter to H. D. Gilpin, esq. solicitor of the treasury, in which you say that Mr. Swartwout's use of the public moneys "began not long after his appointment as collector"—that is, I suppose in 1829. Now, will you state whether, in that letter, you mean to refer to any of the specific items reported in said document as defalcations; or do you refer specially to his use of moneys deposited to his own credit, in banks, and prior to its being credited to the treasurer of the United States in such banks?

Answer. Mr. Swartwout commenced drawing out of the bank, against moneys deposited to his private account, about nine months after he came into office. Those drafts, I think, were small. I have no allusion to any specific items reported in said document as defalcations. I had no knowledge of them.

Question 20. Please state whether, during the whole period that Mr. Swartwout was thus drawing from his deposits, he was not also continually replacing sums on deposit from his individual resources or speculations; and if the whole extent of such deficits was or was not concealed by carrying into his weekly bank deposits cash returns to the treasury department of one week, such sums as were received by him on the Saturday of the preceding week, and which were not returned in the cash account of such preceding week?

Answer. I have recollection of Mr. Swartwout having replaced moneys drawn out by him on several occasions. The amounts which he had in bank from deposits for duties, together with the receipts for bonds due on Saturday and Monday, gave him ample funds to meet his drafts, over and above the balance due to government.

Question 21. Without the aid of such reserved Saturday collections, and in the way explained in your last answer, would or would not the deficit from the bank funds of his office have appeared most manifest on his weekly returns? And was the ultimate effect of such a system of operating, any more than to cast upon his last and final weekly return the aggregate of all previous withdrawals from his deposits, so far as the same had not been offset by his replacing them from his own or other funds?

Answer. It would have been impossible for Mr. Swartwout to have made his weekly transfer without the aid of the collection of bonds of Saturday and Monday, and moneys for duties on goods not ascertained. The ultimate effect of such a system was to cast the whole balance due upon his final weekly return.

From the preceding testimony, the committee report the established facts:

1. That all moneys received by Mr. Swartwout, as collector, prior to 1837, are regularly accounted for by him in his quarterly returns to the treasury department.

2. That so much of all moneys received by Mr. Swartwout prior to 1837, and accounted for to the treasury department in his quarterly returns, as were not paid by him into the treasury, were retained by him under the tacit acquiescence of the accounting officers of the treasury; and were regularly carried forward, debited to himself, in the balance of each subsequent quarterly account rendered by him to the treasury department, to the close of his term of office.

3. That his omission to carry a debit to himself, of any of the moneys received by him from the treasury, or from other sources, prior to 1837, to the class of accounts kept only at the custom house, called his cash accounts, and his carrying a debit to himself of any such items to any other class of accounts kept only at the custom house, called suspense and unsettled accounts, or by any other name, could not operate as a concealment, innocent or fraudulent, from the treasury department, of the true cash balance in his hands—

1. Because, neither his cash account, nor his suspense and unsettled account, nor any other subordinate account kept at the custom house, was ever exhibited to, or formed the basis of any quarterly settlement made by him with, the accounting officers of the treasury.

2. Because, on his quarterly accounts settled at the treasury department, the aggregate and true balance of all his subordinate accounts kept at the custom house, including both his cash account and suspense accounts, was uniformly, prior to 1837, carried into his quarterly account, under the item of "cash, and unsettled accounts."

4th. That the defalcations of Mr. Swartwout, by means of fraud and false returns, commenced in 1837, and not sooner, and have existed since that period; and the defalcations thus occurring, added to the moneys previously retained by him, according to his returns to the treasury department, and by the silent acquiescence of the officers of that department, until the close of his term of office, constitute the aggregate of his defalcations at the present period.

3. The causes of Mr. Swartwout's defalcations.
This branch of the subject will be considered in the following order:

1st. The responsibility of Mr. Swartwout in pecuniary character at the time of his appointment to office.

2d. Culpable disregard of law, and neglect of official duty, by the late naval officer at New York.

3d. Culpable disregard of law, and neglect of official duty, by the first auditor of the treasury.

4th. Culpable disregard of law, and neglect of official duty, by the late and present first comptrollers of the treasury.

5th. The discontinuance of the use of banks as depositories of the public moneys, and permitting the same to accumulate in the hands of Mr. Swartwout.

6th. The negligence and failure of the secretary of the treasury to discharge his duty as the head of the treasury, and exerted with slothless vigilance the superintendence of the collection of the revenue.

CAUSE I. The irresponsibility of Mr. Swartwout, in pecuniary character, at the time of his appointment to office.

There is obvious jeopardy of the public interests whenever appointments to offices of high pecuniary obligation are conferred by the executive upon individuals who are notoriously wanting in reputation for responsibility in financial matters.

There probably cannot, in human relations, be brought to bear upon human frailty and cupidity stronger temptations to err from duty and rectitude, than spring from the possession and control (which must, from their nature, be somewhat exclusive) by individual officeholders, of large and extraordinary masses of government money. Unless the checks instituted to counteract such temptations are numerous and exerted with sleepless vigilance at every point, the moral restraint against the conduct of officers thus intrusted with large pecuniary means, which, at times, may seem not to even be exerted by government, is very apt to relax into a mere lurking apprehension of early detection. The consequence is, as soon as this apprehension is overcome by any known remissness on the part of those to whom they are immediately accountable, or discovers a device by which to elude the vigilance of their superiors in office, they are prepared to regard and treat the public revenue in their hands rather as a means of promoting individual interests, than as an instrument created solely for the service of the people.

It was well remarked by the "illustrious predecessor" of the present national executive, in the earlier, and less happy, pure days of his administration of the federal government, that the possession of official station, alone, exerts a corrupting influence upon the generality of men. "There are, perhaps," says his first message to congress, "few men who can, for any great length of time, enjoy office and power, without being more or less under the influence of feelings unfavorable to the faithful discharge of their public duties. Their integrity may be proof against all proper considerations immediately addressed to themselves; but they are apt to acquire a habit of looking with indifference upon the public interests, and of tolerating conduct from which an imprudent man would revolt."

If naked official station be thus pregnant with temptations unfavorable to the faithful discharge of public duties, how alarmingly accumulative these temptations become when are superadded to official station the temptations which flow from the collector, keeping and disbursement of the vast sums of money, drawn directly from, yet, for the most part, always kept and used beyond the sight of the people.

If there be any thing that can add to the evils of the known temptations inseparable from the power of official station and public revenue combined to demoralize the government of a people, to impoverish their public treasury, and to infuse into them a lust for "the spoils" of political servility and cunning in preference to the rewards attendant upon the pursuits of honest and honorable industry, it is to be found in the appointment to official stations of high pecuniary obligations, of men notoriously irresponsible, and whose lives have proved them incompetent to save for themselves; as sure as effect must follow cause, so sure will the temptations already spoken of prove but too successful in the pillage of the public treasury, when brought to bear, by executive patronage, upon any man, or class of men, already excited by the habitual indulgence of ventur-some speculations, and by the alternate hopes and disappointments, successes and embarrassments, incident to such speculations. Of this class of men, and such a man, was Mr. Swartwout, in reputation and in fact, both at the time of his original appointment to the collectorship, in 1829, and of his reappointment, in 1834. He was wholly irresponsible in pecuniary reputation, notoriously prone to hazardous speculations, deeply embarrassed from them, and always in want of funds. The committee, therefore, regard this as one of the primary causes of Mr. Swartwout's defalcations, and of the consequent loss of the public money which was intrusted to his collection and keeping. In confirmation of this view, the subjoined examination and testimony of witnesses are adduced:

Joseph L. Joseph was sworn as a witness.

Examined by Mr. Owens.

Question 1. Say, if you were acquainted with Mr. Swartwout when collector of the port of New York, whether he was, during his official life, a purchaser and speculator in the stocks? If yes, state the different kinds in which he speculated, and the amount of those speculations.

Answer. I am well acquainted with Mr. Swartwout, and knew him as collector of the port of New York. I knew he was frequently engaged in very large speculations in stock, from personal knowledge, and from rumor. He speculated in Long Island rail road shares, Stonington rail road shares, Harlem rail road shares, Morris canal stock, and others, probably, of which I am not aware or do not now recollect. What the general amount of his speculation, I do not know; but I considered him always a large operator.

Question 2. Were you or your house his agent or brokers in these transactions, or a portion of them? If yes, state the amounts of those speculations in which you had personal agency; and whether they were speculations of Swartwout alone, or were other persons interested in them; and who were those persons?

Answer. We were his brokers in some particular stock transactions, in the purchase of Delaware and Hudson shares, Stonington rail road shares, Long Island rail road, and probably some others, which at this moment I do not remember. At the period of our stoppage, we held for him over a hundred thousand dollars worth of stocks, which had greatly depreciated from the cost price, and which he previously had begged us to hold until there should be a change of times. They were for Swartwout alone, and probably reached at one period with us to two hundred thousand dollars.

Question 3. Were these speculations of which you speak, or a portion of them, fortunate or adverse? If fortunate, state the amount of profits made on them; if adverse, state the amount of loss sustained.

Answer. We once paid Mr. Swartwout some seventy or eighty thousand dollars profit, made on Morris canal stock. I do not remember of his ever paying our house over two or three thousand dollars of loss. His last speculations resulted in a loss, and he was unable to pay, and borrowed some money for us with the view of aiding us to bear up against these differences, actually lost, and the stocks we held, which we did not sell. The loss was six or seven thousand dollars.

Question 4. Do you know of your own knowledge, or from the information of Mr. Swartwout, the amount of loss or gain upon other speculations in stocks, in which you had no personal agency? State the same as accurately as you can.

Answer. I do not know of his other stock operations, except that rumor had frequently declared his having made and lost alternately.

Stephen Whitney was sworn as a witness.

Examined by Mr. Owens.

Question 1. Were you acquainted with Mr. Swartwout during the time he was collector? If yes, state if he was engaged in speculations of stocks during that period, and state the kinds of stocks.

Answer. I was acquainted with Mr. Swartwout during the time he was collector of the port of New York; have understood he was engaged in dealing in stocks, but of what kind and to what extent I am not acquainted.

Question 2. Are you a director in the Morris canal company? Was Mr. Swartwout a director in the same? Had he stock in the company, and what amount? Was he not in the habit of selling and reselling that stock; and were his speculations fortunate or adverse, and to what amount?

Answer. I am a director of the Morris canal and banking company, but have no knowledge of his (Mr. Swartwout's) transactions with that company.

John Ward was sworn as a witness. Mr. Ward, who had been summoned at the instance of Mr. Owens, was Examined by Mr. Curtis.

Question 1. Were you acquainted with Samuel Swartwout before and during the time he was collector of the port of New York?

Answer. Yes.

Question 2. Do you know any thing of the causes and extent of Mr. Swartwout's defalcation as collector, the length of time it existed, or of any material fact connected therewith?

Answer. I do not.

Question 3. What is your occupation?

Answer. Stock and exchange broker.

Question 4. Have you been concerned as such broker in any operations or speculations in stocks on account of Mr. Swartwout?

Answer. I have bought and sold stock on his account.

Question 5. Have you ever bought and sold stock on joint account of yourself and said Swartwout?

Answer. No.

Question 6. To what amount have you bought and sold stocks for said Swartwout? Can you furnish a copy of your accounts with him.

Answer. I should think not more than $100,000; we can furnish a statement in an account of purchase and sale of Morris canal stock; there appears a loss to him of between five and six hundred dollars.

Question 7. In any other and all other stocks in which you have acted as his broker, was there any considerable loss to said Swartwout?

Answer. To the best of my recollection, he did not lose money in his stock operations made through our agency.

Alexander Hamilton was sworn as a witness.

Examined by Mr. Owens.

Question 1. Were you acquainted with Mr. Swartwout during the time he was the collector of New York. How do you any knowledge of the mode and nature of conducting his business in the custom house?

Answer. I was well acquainted with Mr. Swartwout before and during the time he was collector, but am entirely ignorant of the manner in which his official duties were performed.

Question 2. Was Mr. Swartwout, during the time he was collector, in the habit of speculating in stocks, in New York or elsewhere? If yes, state the nature of the stocks, who were his brokers, and whether his speculations were confined to himself alone, or were other persons engaged with him, and who were those persons.

Answer. Mr. Swartwout was in the constant habit of speculating in stocks, and with several brokers. The Wards and Josephs are alone positively known to me as such; but I do not know whether his speculations were jointly with others.

Question 3. Were you in familiar and daily intercourse with Swartwout? Do you know of your own knowledge, or have you heard from him, the results of his speculations either in stocks or real estate, whether the same were fortunate or adverse, and the amount of money gained or lost in them?

Answer. I was in the constant habit of free converse with Mr. Swartwout, and, although I was under the impression that his operations in stocks and real estate were fortunate, I have no positive knowledge on the subject, with the exception of having been informed by the Josephs that they at one time paid Swartwout a balance arising out of profits from the purchase and sale of Morris canal stock, of $80,000; but, at the time of the departure of Mr. Swartwout, they related to me that he was indebted to them $40,000.

Examined by Mr. Dawson.

Question 5. What was the reputation of Samuel Swartwout, at the time of his appointment, in the year 1829, for pecuniary responsibility?

Answer. Without any; on the contrary, he was generally understood to be much involved in debt. Russell H. Nevins sworn as a witness. Mr. Nevins, who had been summoned at the instance of Mr. Owens, was

Examined by Mr. Curtis.

Question 1. Did you know Samuel Swartwout while he held the office of collector of New York?

Answer. Yes.

Question 2. What is your occupation?

Answer. Stock and exchange broker.

Question 3. Have you at any time, and to what extent, acted as broker or agent of said Swartwout, in the purchase and sale of stocks?

Answer. The transactions of our house with Mr. Swartwout have been but few, and I believe only in a single instance was there a purchase of stock for his account. This to the amount of about $25,000.

There was a transaction of a larger amount with another person, with whom it was understood Mr. Swartwout was a party concerned.

It has not yet been entirely closed, and at the present prices of the stock, a very considerable loss would be the result. Mr. Swartwout never paid any money on account of the above transaction; I never knew him to have money, but he always wanted to borrow.

Examined by Mr. Owens.

Question 4. You say Mr. Swartwout was engaged with others in a certain speculation of stocks; will you name the person so interested with him and the amount of the speculation?

Answer. The name of the person interested with Mr. Swartwout I do not feel at liberty to mention; he was the one on whom I placed my sole reliance, and was of undoubted responsibility. Mr. Swartwout I did not originally suppose to be concerned in the transaction. The other person was not in the custom house and held no office under the government.

The amount of stock purchased was to the best of my recollection, about fifty thousand dollars. Swartwout never paid any thing on account of the stock.

Examined by Mr. Wise.

Question 8. What was Mr. Swartwout's general character as a man of pecuniary responsibility, when he was appointed in 1829; and afterwards when he was reappointed, in 1834?

Answer. It was generally considered not to be good. At the time of his first appointment, it was decidedly bad.

Question 9. Was it not notorious in New York, during the whole time Mr. Swartwout was in office that he was speculating in various modes, upon an extensive and hazardous scale?

Answer. I think it was generally believed in the neighborhood of Wall street, that Mr. Swartwout was engaged in many and extensive speculations.

James B. Murray was examined as a witness.

Examined by Mr. Owens.

Question 1. Are you a resident of New York, and what is your business or occupation? Were you a director or president of the Morris canal company, and how long have you been so?

Answer. I am a resident of New York; by profession a merchant; was elected a director of the Morris canal company in February, 1834, and, with the exception of a short interval have continued so until the present time. I was president of the Morris canal company, and resigned that situation when Louis McLane, esq., was elected.

Question 2. Do you, as director of the Morris canal company, know, or from conversations with Swartwout, the amount of stock in that company in which he (Swartwout) speculated; and the amount of loss or gain?

Answer. I remember Mr. Swartwout having stated to me, at or about the period of my retiring from the presidency of the Morris canal company, that he had cleared a large sum of money in that stock; and I think he mentioned the amount as being $70,000. But that were his subsequent transactions in that stock I do not know; nor have I any particular knowledge at any time, except as above stated.

Question 3. Were you acquainted with Mr. Swartwout during the time he was collector of New York? Was he engaged in stock speculations, and to what amount? State the stocks he so speculated in, and whether they were fortunate or adverse; and the amount of loss or gain.

Answer. I was acquainted with Mr. Swartwout during the whole period of his being collector of this port, and generally understood that he was largely engaged in stock speculations; but to what extent, or what were the results, I am unable to say.

From the preceding testimony, the committee report as established facts:

1st. That, at the time of Mr. Swartwout's appointment and of his reappointment to office, he was wholly irresponsible in pecuniary reputation, and was involved in debt.

2d. That at the time of his appointment and of his reappointment, and for the whole period he was in office, he was notoriously engaged in large and hazardous speculations, and deeply embarrassed by them.

3d. That his pecuniary irresponsibility, and consequent involvements by hazardous speculations, constitute one of the primary causes of his defalcations to the government.

CASE 2. Culpable disregard of law, and neglect of official duty, by the late naval officer at N. York.

The naval officer is designed to be a complete check upon all the accounts of the collector; and existing laws are, and have been since 1799, amply competent to render it so, if efficiently administered.

The duty imposed upon naval officers by the 21st section of the act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, passed March 2, 1799, is as follows:

"The naval officer shall receive copies of all manifests and entries, and shall, together with the collector, estimate the duties on all goods, wares and merchandise subject to duty, (and no duties shall be received without such estimates), and shall keep a separate record thereof; and shall counter-sign all permits, clearances, certificates, debentures and other documents to be granted by the collector; he shall also examine the collector's abstracts of duties, and other accounts of RECEIPTS, BONDS and EXPENDITURES, and, if found right, he shall certify the same."

By the report of the secretary of the treasury to the president, and by the latter communicated to congress, (house doc. 13, p. 6), it is represented that a circular, issued by the comptroller of the treasury in 1821, had tended to remove the check on the collector, provided in the above enactment of law, "in some particulars very essential." The apologetic language of the secretary is:

"It appears that the naval officer at New York, if able to perform the task, has not for a long period, or at least during the seventeen years that have elapsed since a circular issued by the comptroller in 1821, considered it his duty to certify to the expenditures and accounts generally, but only to certain portions of them, and to the correct assessment of the duties.

"That circular, unfortunately, tended to remove a check on the collector, in some particulars very essential, and has been repealed by the present comptroller." (House doc. 13, p. 6, 7).

The committee, finding the accounts and returns of Mr. Swartwout, made quarterly to the treasury, to have been correct in every particular prior to 1837, whether checked properly by the records and vigilance of the naval officer or not, and that the only accounts containing frauds or deceptive omissions were those rendered for 1837, and that such omissions were confined to the bond account, on which bonds had become payable and had been paid to Mr. Swartwout, the committee were led to examine how far the circular of 1821, alluded to as above by the secretary of the treasury, did in fact remove from this class of the collector's accounts the check upon them provided by law in the duties of the naval officer, and how far, in truth, said circular furnished any apology for the naval officer for any neglect of those accounts on his part.

On recurring to the said circular of 1821, disclosed by the secretary in whose document of the present session numbered 54, in answer to a special call of the house, the committee find that, instead of being designed or tending to remove any check from the collector which had been previously exercised by the naval officer under the law of 1799, it avowedly enjoins upon them the exercise of all the checks contemplated by that law, with a single exception; and the previous neglect of them by naval officers, and not a discontinuance of any of them, is set forth as the occasion of alluding to them in the circular. The following is its language:

"It is deemed proper, at this time, to notice another subject, on which instructions appear to be necessary.

"Until lately, it has been the practice of the naval officers, generally, to certify no other accounts of the collectors than the abstracts of duties of merchandise imported, and the tonnage abstracts.

"These are the only documents which were required to be so certified under the laws anterior to that of the 2d March, 1799, in the 21st section of which a different regulation is made on the subject; but as no instructions can be found relative to this regulation, which, it appears, has hitherto not been observed, it is presumed that the alteration alluded to was overlooked.

"By the section referred to, the naval officers are required to examine, not only the collectors' abstracts of duties, but other accounts of receipts, bonds and expenditures; and, if found right, to certify the same."

"As all the accounts of disbursements made by the collectors are to be supported by vouchers, it is not considered necessary that such accounts, except the abstract of duties refunded, should be examined and certified by the naval officers.

"The documents which are considered to require that formality are as follows, viz:

"1. The abstracts of duties on merchandise and tonnage.

"2. The abstracts of duties on passports and clearances.

"3. The abstracts of interest received on bonds which are not paid as they become due.

"4. The abstracts of marine hospital money collected.

"5. The bond accounts.

"6. Abstracts of duties refunded.

"To enable the naval officers to examine and certify these returns, it will be necessary that they should, so far, keep corresponding accounts with the collectors of the customs, from whom the terms of those accounts can be obtained, and who, I feel persuaded, will cheerfully give their co-operation in carrying the provisions of the law into effect."

It will thus be seen that, while it was not designed, and could not have tended, to remove any check whatever on the collector, in any particular very essential, (as accounts of disbursements require vouchers in all cases, the naval officer's check in regard to them is expressly declared by the circular as "not considered necessary"), that circular did enjoin upon naval officers, in most specific terms, the exercise of every requisite check upon collectors that the law of 1799 contemplated and provided; and it is only because the naval officer at New York did wholly neglect to comply with and fulfil the instructions contained in this same circular of 1821, viz: to "keep corresponding accounts with the collector of the customs" in relation to bonds taken by and bonds paid to him, and by this means to make the thorough examination, independently of the collector's accounts, of the "bond accounts" returned to the treasury department by Mr. Swartwout, and not because of any check removed by the circular of 1821, that Mr. Swartwout was enabled to return his accounts for all the four quarters of the year 1837, falsely and fraudulently omitting therein the many hundred thousands of dollars in which he has become a defaulter for that year. It is in this palpable disregard of the positive requirements of the law of 1799, prescribing the duties of naval officers, and in this equally palpable disregard of the positive requirements of the more recent circular of the comptroller of the treasury, dated November 10, 1821, and in the negligence of records and want of proper vigilance on the part of the naval officer at New York, from the commencement to the close of Mr. Swartwout's two terms of service, that is found by the committee a primary cause of Mr. Swartwout's immense defalcations. And the committee feel constrained to add, from a sense of duty to the house and to the country, that the attempted apology quoted above, made by the secretary of the treasury to congress before the circular of 1821 was disclosed, for the disregard of law, of treasury instructions, and of plain official duties by the late naval officer, who only left that office to take another public office of no less respectability under the present executive, is wholly without weight and without foundation.

If it were true that the class of accounts returned by Mr. Swartwout to the treasury prior to 1837 involved defalcations, contrary to the opinion of the committee, as deduced in a former branch of this report, then it is true that a cause of those defalcations, excepting those in office "expenses" and "fortitures," is in like manner to be found in the same culpable negligence of the naval officer, already described, in not keeping original records and accounts as required by law, as also by the circular of 1821, corresponding with those kept by the collector of "tonnage duties" and "duties refunded" to merchants.

By the evidence before the committee, it was found that the only account or record, of the whole number required by law to be kept by him, that was kept by the late naval officer at New York, was an abstract of duties accruing, furnishing no check whatever upon any account of the collector, except upon his computation of the dutiable sums on imports. Beyond this, which is comparatively of but the least consequence of all checks, if standing alone, the naval officer at New York has served but as a useless expense to the government, adhering to empty forms, of no efficacy but to give currency to any frauds which the collector might embody in his accounts. All of which is elucidated and substantiated by the following examination and testimony:

Mr. Fleming, auditor of the custom house.

Examined by Mr. Smith.

Question 69. By a comparison at the naval office, at the port of New York, of the collector's quarterly returns, transmitted to that office for examination, of bonds paid within such quarter, with the records in said office of said collector's preceding quarterly returns of bonds payable in that quarter, is not the naval officer enabled at once to detect any omission, in the quarterly returns of the collector, of bonds that should be accounted for as paid or as having come to maturity and extended or put in suit?

Answer. The naval officer was not enabled to detect any such omission, from the fact that no record of bonds was kept in that office. The collector's proofs were submitted to the naval officer, and upon their evidence he certified the bond accounts to be correct.

Question 70. What character of proofs do you allude to in your last answer, as having been in usage submitted by the collector to the naval officer, to enable the latter to test the correctness of the collector's accounts and returns?

Answer. Those proofs are the accounts as made up, and retained in the collector's office, exhibiting the same aggregate amounts as the returns transmitted to the treasury.

Question 71. In the manner in which the duties of the naval officer were discharged in regard to Mr. Swartwout's accounts, as described in your two last answers, did or did not that cease to be a check upon the deficiencies and intentional omissions of those accounts?

Answer. The naval officer, in regard to the bond accounts, did not form a check upon the collector.

The following testimony of the late deputy naval officer, and now a deputy collector at New York, though in the outset evasive, grew at length to a full concession of the truth.

John T. Ferguson was sworn as a witness.

Examined by Mr. Owens.

Question 1. Are you an officer in the custom house, New York? How long have you been there, and what are the duties you have discharged?

Answer. I am. My connexion with the custom house commenced in May, 1829. I served as deputy naval officer till 29th of March, 1838. Since then, with the omission of about three weeks, have been principal deputy under Mr. Collector Hoyt.

Question 2. From your knowledge of the manner of conducting the business of the naval office in the custom house at New York, and from your connexion with it, will you be pleased to state if the naval officer acts as a check upon the collector; whether the accounts are critically examined, or if the examination and certifying the same is not rather a formal than an actual [examination]; and whether such has not been the uniform practice, as far as you are acquainted with the performance of the duty, by the naval officer?

Answer. In answer to the first question, I have to answer, most assuredly, and for many years been generally considered and proved to be a check. 2d. The accounts were critically examined, and I do sincerely think it by no means a formal examination, but an absolute check. 3d. The practice pursued during the term of my being deputy has been uniform, and the only practice since the revenue system.

The examination of John T. Ferguson was resumed.

Examined by Mr. Smith.

Question 4. Was any record or register kept in said naval office, while you were in it, of the collector's abstracts of duties and other accounts of receipts, bonds and expenditures? If yes, state what was the nature and extent of such record or register in form and substance?

Answer. The only book or record kept in the naval office is the quarterly abstract, which I have before referred to, and which comprises the whole amount collected for each quarter, including bonds taken and duties paid; the nature of this record being supposed to be heretofore so satisfactorily, that duplicates of other accounts were not thought necessary.

Question 5. When you say that the quarterly record abstract kept in the naval office includes "bonds taken," do you mean to convey the idea that such abstract specifies the amount of each bond so taken by the collector, its date, the names of the parties to it, and when it became payable? Or do you mean that it only contains the aggregate amounts of dutiable goods, that have been entered during the respective quarters of the year, and the duties on which were entitled to be secured by bond?

Answer. In answer, I mean it only accounts for the aggregate amount of duties accruing during each quarter, without specifying what portions of such amounts were payable or were paid in cash, or what portions were either bonded or entitled to the privilege of being secured by bond.

Question 6. Has any change taken place in said naval office, down to the present day, departing from the mode you have described as the mode of discharging the duties of said naval office while you were in it?

Answer. No change had taken place up to the time of my leaving the office; and what change may have taken place since I left, I am unable to say.

Question 7. By the abstract you have described, as kept in the naval office, or by any other papers or records in said office, is the naval office enabled to ascertain what the actual receipts of the collector have been in cash, in any quarter, for duties, or other means as collector?

Answer. To my knowledge, the abstract does not show the amount received quarterly in cash, nor does any other account kept in the naval office.

Question 8. Were any of the "accounts of receipts" by the collector of cash, or of bonds, subjected to the naval officer for his examination and certificate, while you were in said office? If yea, what class of accounts?

Answer. The books which contain all the bonds paid, and bonds outstanding, have been always examined, within my knowledge, at the naval office, and certified by the naval officer; but in duplicates thereof kept in the naval office at the time of examining the quarterly account of the collector.

Question 9. What class of the collector's accounts of cash receipts were examined and certified by the naval officer while you were in said office? Please mention each class.

Answer. No accounts of cash receipts of the collector have, to my knowledge, been examined in the naval office, separate from the quarterly abstract of his accounts.

Question 10. How many abstracts of different accounts of the collector were examined quarterly in the naval office, while you were there? Please name each.

Answer. The American and foreign abstracts of accounts of duty are the only ones which are thoroughly examined by the separate accounts in the naval office.

Question 11. Did the abstracts, specified in your last answer, in any way enable the naval officer to ascertain what amount of cash had been received on bonds or otherwise, by the collector, during any quarter?

Answer. No.

Question 12. Had the naval officer any check in use, while you were in said office, by which any defect in the collector's quarterly accounts of moneys paid or payable, in any quarter, to the collector, could be discovered or found out?

Answer. Not by any means.

Question 13. Could or could not the naval officer, by the books of "bonds paid" and "bonds outstanding," mentioned in your 5th answer, discover whether the bonds payable had come to maturity or not?

Answer. He could; but such examination was not in the power of the naval officer, as there was no means furnished by which such examination could take place.

Question 14. When you say, in your 5th answer, that "the books which contain all the bonds paid and bonds outstanding have been always examined, within your knowledge, in the naval office," and certified by the naval officer, why was it not in the power of the naval officer to discover whether the bonds payable had come to maturity or not?

Answer. At the time of my being deputy in the naval office, no account was taken of the bonds given, as that belonged entirely to the collector, as he possessed the power of collecting the amount of duty accruing upon each importation, either by compelling the merchant to pay cash, or give his bond for the security of the revenue.

Question 15. For what purpose or purposes were "the books which contain all the bonds paid and bonds outstanding," examined in the naval office, as stated in your 5th answer?

Answer. To conform, as far as in our power, to the requisition of the law, in certifying all bonds received by the collector, the examination of the bond abstracts, furnished the treasury department, was made with the account kept by the collector; there being no means in the possession of the naval officer by which such examination could otherwise be made.

Question 16. Do you mean to convey, by your foregoing answers, the idea that the only examination made in the naval office, while you were there, of the accuracy of the collector's return to the treasury department of "bonds taken, and of bonds outstanding," for duties, consisted in comparing said return, as furnished by him, with his own books of "bonds taken and bonds outstanding," also furnished by him for the purpose of such examination.

Answer. I answer, yes; such is my meaning.

Question 17. Did the naval officer examine and certify any of the collector's accounts of expenditure while you were in the naval office?

Answer. He did not, to my knowledge.

Question 18. From the manner adopted in the naval office, while you were there, of checking and testing the collector's account of bonds taken and bonds outstanding, did the naval officer know, or could he discover, whether bonds that had come to maturity were unpaid, or, if paid, were accounted for; and did the examination of such account of bonds paid to the collector to explain why such bonds as had come to maturity, without appearing to be paid, were still unpaid? Was such explanation ordinarily required by the naval officer as the condition or prerequisite of his certifying the collector's bond account?

Answer. To the first branch of the above interrogatory, I answer, that the naval officer could not, however, discover whether bonds that had come to maturity were unpaid, or not; or, if paid, whether they were accounted for, or not. To the second branch of the interrogatory, I answer in the negative; and to the third branch, no such explanation was required.

Question 19. From your knowledge of the manner in which the duties of the naval office were discharged, while you were in it, and, also, from the answers you have already given, is it true, or not, that the whole check of said office upon the collector's accuracy and faithfulness consisted entirely and solely in an examination of the correctness of the collector's estimate and assessment of the duties required by law upon the goods and merchandise entered at the office of the collector?

Answer. The principal and sole check on the collector, to the best of my knowledge, consisted in the examination of the correctness of the duty on each entry, and the collector's account of the aggregate amount accruing quarterly from import.

George W. Coe was examined as a witness.

Examined by Mr. Smith.

Question 1. Are you the son of the present naval officer of the port of New York; and are you deputy naval officer of said port? When did your father, and when did you, likewise, enter upon the duties of your respective offices?

Answer. I am the son of William S. Coe, the present naval officer of New York, and his deputy. I think my father went into his present office on the 29th March, 1838; and myself, as deputy naval officer, at the same time.

Question 2. Who immediately preceded your father in the naval office, and who preceded yourself in the deputy naval office?

Answer. Enos T. Throop preceded my father as naval officer, and John T. Ferguson myself, as deputy to Mr. Throop.

Question 3. Has any change in the system of executing the duties of said office, from that pursued by Mr. Throop, been adopted since Mr. Coe's term commenced? And, any other records kept in said office, at this time, than were kept formerly in said office, and in the examination of the collector's quarterly abstracts and accounts any other, so far as your knowledge extends, than the examination thereof previously made in said naval office. If yea, please to state in what such change and differences consist.

Answer. There have been several changes in executing the duties of the naval office, since the appointment of my father as naval officer; and there are, at present, other records kept in the naval office than those in the time of his predecessor. The method of examining the quarterly abstract is the same, as far as the aggregate amount is concerned; but changes have been made as regards the examinations of the other accounts in the collector's office. The accounts of the collector are not certified until an examination has been made from the books in his office.

A record of the fees of tonnage and hospital money; also, the fees arising from exports; and a record of the amount of duties paid under bonds; and, also, an account of the daily transactions of the collector's office, so far as the receipts and expenditures are concerned, taken from the collector's own books.

Question 4. What is the nature of each quarterly abstract, and of each quarterly account, made by the collector, that has passed under examination in said naval office, pursuant to the existing system of discharging the duties of said office? Please designate each by name, and specify the nature of its contents.

Answer. The quarterly abstract is an account of all duties received, and that of the collector is examined in the naval office from corresponding books and papers kept in the naval office, and by which the different amounts are examined, so far as relates to the total amount; but the different amounts of cash and bond duties are not specified in said quarterly abstract; and, to the best of my knowledge, the quarterly account of United States hospital money for the last quarter was examined by corresponding accounts kept in the naval office. It may have been done previously; I do not recollect of it, or other accounts which are examined by similar data.

Question 5. Previous to the adoption of the changes which you have enumerated, in the system of conducting the duties of naval officer, was said officer any check whatever upon any class of errors, or defalcations or delinquencies which might take place in the collector's abstracts and accounts, beyond that of detecting errors in the computation of the duties payable on goods that had been entered? If yea, state in regard to what other abstract or account of the collector, said naval officer had a check upon the collector's proceedings or delinquencies.

Answer. Previous to the present method of conducting business in the naval office, I do not consider that it was any check whatever upon the office of collector, further than in the commutation of the amounts of duties received. The quarterly abstract states the total amount of duties received by the collector; but whether received by bonds or cash, the naval officer possesses no corresponding means to determine; but he must be guided by the books of the collector, so far as the receipts of cash and bonds are concerned, and no books are kept in the naval office by which the naval officer can tell when bonds fall due, or whether or not said bonds are paid at maturity.

Question 6. Under the existing system of the naval office, is the naval officer enabled to determine, either what amount of bonds have been taken by the collector for duties, in any quarter, or who are parties to said bonds, or the dates of such bonds, or when they are payable, or when any such bonds are paid, or whether the collector does or not account truly for bonds that have been paid?

Answer. In answer to the sixth interrogatory, I have to state, that the naval office, under its existing system, is not enabled either to determine what amount of bonds have been taken by the collector for duties, in any quarter, or who are the parties to said bonds, or the dates of said bonds, or when they are payable, or when such bonds are paid, or whether the collector does or does not account truly for such bonds.

From the preceding testimony, the committee report as established facts:

1. That the late naval officer at the port of New York, throughout the term of his service from 1829 to 1838, wholly disregarded the requirements of the law prescribing the duties of his office.

2. That said naval officer, for the same period, wholly disregarded the instructions of the comptroller of the treasury, of November 10, 1821.

3. That said naval officer, by so disregarding the requirements of law and the instructions of the treasury department, culpably neglected to keep the accounts and records appertaining to his office and thereby rendered his office nugatory as a check upon the accounts of the collector.

4. That if the duties of said naval officer, as authorized and directed by existing laws, had been executed with proper care and vigilance, they would have rendered it impracticable for any fraud or error in any of the accounts of the collector of said port to escape immediate detection.

5. That the culpable disregard of the plain requirements of law and of treasury instructions prescribing the duties of naval officers, by said naval officer, and his continued neglect of official duty, are a primary cause of the immense defalcations of the late collector at New York.

It appears by the above, that New England, consisting of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island and Connecticut, furnished more troops for the defence of the country than the other nine states, by 3,872. The number of troops furnished by South Carolina was 6,417—by Massachusetts 67,207—Georgia 2,698—Connecticut 31,939!

An improved method of making coffee. Put your coffee (after grinding) into a flannel bag, tie it closely, and immerse it in sufficient water to boil freely, put in a little butter, adding as much water as may be required. After boiling, it will be found to be perfectly clear, without the addition of egg, &c. Having likewise the advantage of retaining its original flavor and strength in greater perfection than when clarified.

We understand that about thirty sail of fishing vessels (most of them new) have been added to the Grand Bank fleet at Marblehead, the present season, making in all about 109 sail. This is a larger number, we believe, than has been employed in the fisheries in that town since 1759, in which year 124 vessels were engaged in the Grand Bank fishery alone. May abundant success reward the enterprise of our Maritime neighbors. [Salem Ad.]

Baltimore city post office. It is now stated, says the Baltimore Patriot, that Mr. Skinner is to abdicate on the first of June next, and that Mr. Vanzant is then to take possession of the post office.

We notice that in a public meeting recently held in London, the private debts in Great Britain are down at $20,000,000,000!!!

General Jackson. We learn from the Nashville Whig of the 18th inst. that general Jackson was confined to his bed by illness. He has recovered.

The legislature of Wisconsin has passed a law allowing twenty per cent interest for money, the parties mutually consenting. This is a virtual repeal of the usury laws; or nearly so.

What other city can say it? It appears by the official reports that all the boys in the city of Boston are members of the public and private schools—save 33 alone. The whole number is 16,850. There is no parallel to this in any quarter of the world. [Evening Star.]

Ex president Adams has accepted the invitation of the New York historical society, to pronounce before it an address on the approaching fiftieth anniversary of the inauguration of Washington as the first president of the United States.

Dinner to general Scott. We learn from the Courier and Enquirer that the committee of arrangements appointed in April, 1837, to make the necessary dispositions for giving a public dinner to general Scott, which compliment was then postponed, at the request of the general, to a more fitting season, the country being then involved in the financial embarrassments of that trying year, is to hold a meeting this evening, for carrying into effect now the object of their appointment. Value of our improvements. From the Pittsburgh Advocate, April 2. We were surprised and gratified yesterday on visiting the steamer Maine, capt. Dorman, to learn that her large cargo, consisting wholly of bacon, pork, and lard, from below, there were one hundred and seventy casks bacon which she had brought from Beardstown, Illinois river, for shipment via the Pennsylvania canal to Philadelphia. This parcel of bacon is but a part of a thousand hogsheads laid up at the same place, designated for the Philadelphia market by the same route.

This is the first instance known to us of a large shipment of the produce of that part of Illinois being directed market. We advert to it with pleasure, as another testimonial of the value to Pittsburgh, to Philadelphia, and to Pennsylvania at large, of our great system of internal improvements. It such fruits are produced by our improvements in their infancy, what may we not expect from them when they have grown old and established their character throughout the west?

The cost of transportation from Beardstown to Pittsburgh is no more than it would have cost to New Orleans, say 50 cents per 100 lbs. The cost hence to Philadelphia will be 87 cents per 100 lbs.

On Wednesday evening a desolating fire swept off nearly the whole of the block of buildings bounded by St. Joseph, St. Louis, Conception, and St. Michael streets, and the brick dwelling of Mr. Judd, corner of St. Joseph and St. Michael streets, and the brick store belonging to William Jones, jr. corner of St. Joseph and St. Louis streets, were barriers which arrested the flames eastwardly, and saved the whole front on St. Joseph street. The three sides on the other streets, and the whole of the interior of the block, including out-houses and stables belonging to the dwelling on St. Joseph street, are totally destroyed. Nothing was saved, except the furniture, but some twenty stacks of chimneys, marking the extent of the desolation. The number of dwelling houses burnt is about ten or eleven, besides some small shops and the extensive livery stable on Conception street. [Mobile Jour. March 29.]

The governor of Missouri has negotiated a state loan with the bank of Missouri of three hundred and forty-five thousand dollars. Of this sum, two hundred thousand dollars are to go towards paying the extension of the debt, and to drive the Mormons from the state, one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars for building a capitol, and twenty thousand dollars for works of internal improvement.

Dinner to Wm. C. Rives. The political friends of this gentleman in Albemarle have tendered him a public dinner, to be given in Charlottesville on the 20th inst.

Mr. Stanly, the independent representative from the Newbern district in North Carolina, was received with open arms by his constituents on his late return to them from his attendance in congress. At a public sitting in his native town (Newbern) resolutions were passed approving his course in congress, and inviting him, in token of respect, to a public dinner. The compliment was acknowledged by Mr. S. in becoming terms, but the acceptance of the dinner declined on the ground of the necessity for his immediate return to his residence, at Washington, N. C.

The Wheeling Gazette of the 29 ultimo, gives a list of fifty-four steamboat arrivals and as many departures during the previous week—and all of these were either from or on their way to Pittsburgh. Besides this number there are three running daily to Beaver and to Wellsville; six plying on the Mooningahela and three on the Allegheny, most also be kept in view to form an adequate notion of the steamboat business of Pittsburgh.

Captain Pell, of the Havre packet Urica, arrived at New York, reports that on the 21st ultimo, in lat. 44 45, long. 48, he fell in with fields of ice in great extent, and banks of mountains dimensions, some being two hundred feet in height. He got outward 90 miles and westward 100 miles through the fields and islands of ice.

Rehoboth statue of Jeremy Bentham. Dr. Southern, of South Carolina (England) to whom Jeremy Bentham bequeathed his body, has, it appears, embalm'd the same, and taken from it a perfect cast of the original, seated in his chair, with his flowing locks, antique costume, &c.

Expensive honors. Lord Durham, in his brief governments of the Canadas, expended over $45,000 from his own purse.

The war over. The Portland Argus of March 29th, announces the arrival, on the preceding day, of the detachments from that city which have been serving their country in the tented field—that is, among the swamps and bogs of the dispersed territory. Two deaths had occurred in the progress of the campaign. David Houston, a volunteer from Belfast, died at the camp, and Stephen Wood, of Hiram, was carried off suddenly, by apoplexy, at the barrack near Houlton.

Commercial enterprise. During the domination of Bonaparte, sugar, coffee, tobacco, cotton-twist, &c. were sent by sea from London to Silesia, in Europe, and thence the goods were carried on horses and mules across Servia and Hungary into the interior of Germany, and even into France; so that goods were consumed at Calais, coming from England, only seven leagues distant, which goods had made a circuit equivalent, far as its expense went, to a voyage twice round the world.

A gang of counterfeiters was arrested in New Bedford, Tuesday by the police officers, who surprised two of them while busily engaged in counterfeiting half dollars. Six persons were committed for examination, and about two bushels of spurious coin, together with machinery, dies, &c. taken into custody. Counterfeit bank notes were also found on the prisoners.

An article is going the rounds of the papers abroad that John Harvey saved the life of general Scott at Chippewa, some time during the last year. This is a misapprehension; Scott saved Harvey's life at that time and place.

Old England against the world. The New York Express says:

A cask of clover seed from London was sold yesterday by auction, which proved to be colored purple to give it a market value. The fraud was detected. The holders here knew nothing of the transaction.

NILES' NATIONAL REGISTER.

FIFTH SERIES. No. 7.—VOL. VI.]

WASHINGTON CITY, APRIL 13, 1839.

[VOL. LVI.—WHOLE No. 1,437

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED, EVERY SATURDAY, BY WILLIAM OGDEN NILES, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR, AT $3 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE

The readers of the "REGISTER" have been informed of the death of HEZEKIAH NILES, the founder and, for twenty-five years, the editor of this work. This event, though long anticipated, has afflicted his beloved family with the most poignant grief, and caused deep regret in that numerous circle of friends who loved and admired him for his many virtues. For no man that ever lived fulfilled more faithfully the duties of a citizen, husband, father and friend, or has left behind him more honorable testimonials of his desire to promote the honor and interests of his country and the happiness of individuals. His efforts as a patriot and a good citizen are acknowledged by all, and have left an impression upon the age in which he lived which Time cannot efface; but only those who came within the influence of the circle in which he moved can fully appreciate those gentle virtues which caused his family and friends to cling to him with such earnest devotion, and to regard his course of life as an illustration of all that is honorable and estimable in human nature.

His life was one of painful vicissitudes and unmitigated toil; but it is a proud consolation to his family and friends to know, that he has closed his busy and eventful career, without leaving an enemy behind him, or the slightest blemish upon his good name—and that many, very many, to whom melancholy tidings have come, will bless his memory as that of a benefactor and friend. His heart and his hand were ever open to the poor and the distressed, and there are many in the city in which he spent so many years of his life, and elsewhere, who will cheerfully testify, that to his advice and his assistance, they owe all of their good they enjoy. No man in that populous city was more resorted to for counsel and assistance; and among the laboring masses, but especially among the members of that profession of which he was proud to be ranked a member, his practical good sense and sound judgment had a degree of weight and influence only equalled by the conviction that he was deeply interested in their happiness.

His public career as the editor of the "Register" and the advocate of the American System, properly belongs to a history of the times; and as soon as the materials can be collected, we intend to present a history of his life and writings to the public, through the pages of this work; in which we will endeavor to do justice to his memory, by exhibiting his devotion to his beloved country and his desire to promote the happiness of his fellow men.

GENERAL SCOTT. It will be seen, by the correspondence inserted in the present sheet, that general Scott has declined the dinner tendered to him in New York. He left this city, where he has been for some days past, on Wednesday for New York.

ISAAC L. VARIAN, esq. the candidate of the friends of the administration, has been elected mayor of New York over Aaron Clark, esq. the present mayor and the candidate of the whigs. The Journal of Commerce publishes the annexed list of votes, which, though estimated in part, will, it is supposed, vary much from the original: April, 1839.

Varian's majority, 1,182
Vol. VI. Sta. 7.

The election of aldermen and assistants has resulted in the choice of the administration candidates in twelve wards, and of whigs in five wards—making an administration majority of seven in each ward.

The election was conducted with great riot—and some disgraceful outrages took place during the three days it was held.

THE BOUNDARY QUESTION. The editors of the Boston Post have received Halifax papers to the effect. In publishing the account of the agreement entered into between general Scott, governor Fairfield, and lieutenant governor Harvey, the Times says:

"We have no room for comment. Our readers will form their own on this queer-like, but to New Brunswick, dangerous diplomatic arrangement." The Times contains a "district general order," recalling the militia from the disputed territory.

TEXAS. Intelligence from Texas has been received to the 30th ult. The political news is not of much interest. The Redlander of Nacogdoches publishes the incipient proceedings of the trial, which took place in that town, of eight Mexicans, accused of having in the month of August last raised their arms against the republic, and of having excited the savages to hostilities.

It appears that the trade between New Orleans and Texas, by way of the Sabine, is rapidly increasing. Most of the people in the eastern part of Texas obtain their goods by that route. The merchants of Nacogdoches, who formerly were supplied by the Red river, now have recourse to the Sabine.

The country between the Guadalupe and the Colorado is rapidly filling up with farms. Many immigrants arrive daily. The settlements extend beyond Gonzales, and the people of that territory are choosing new sites for towns and villages.

A beautiful specimen of native gold was found in the mountains about 150 miles northwest of Bexar. Sulfate and sulphure of iron was found on the banks of Rio Frio. The last mentioned ore was found in large quantities, and was at first supposed to be silver ore.

On the 21st ult. a public dinner was given to general Hamilton, of South Carolina, at which he made a long and interesting speech, and concluded with the following toast:

The republic of Texas—She has the same title to the vast and magnificent territory situated between the Rio Grande and the Sabine that the United States has to her domain north of that line—a violated charter—a victorious sword—free institutions, and an unconquerable people to defend them.

The Houston Telegraph states that general Hamilton and colonel Butler, of South Carolina, and colonel White, of Florida, have filed their declarations, recording their intention of becoming citizens of Texas, for the purpose of holding land simply.

The New Orleans Courier gives the following explanation of the procedure:

It is proper to state that the constitution of the new republic does not require a renunciation of all allegiance to the United States to become a citizen; and that general Hamilton, in a speech at Galveston, declared he had not, and would not, abandon allegiance to his native country; but that, having lands in the new state, he wished to put himself in a position to defend them. The other gentlemen also made large purchases of lands, to hold which requires a citizenship, or quasi citizenship. General Lafayette was a citizen of the United States, and a subject of France, at the same time; and general Bernard, at present a minister of war in France, was a citizen, and brigadier general in our service.

The Galveston Gazette of the 22d states that a larger number of emigrants had arrived at that port in the ten preceding days than ever before in the same time. Three steam packets and several sailing vessels from the United States were there busily engaged in loading and unloading. Large quantities of cotton were arriving for transportation to England, and it was said that two other vessels were nearly due from Liverpool.

The Gazette says: "it is no longer a misnomer, to call this the city of Galveston. Such it now begins to seem. A hundred buildings are now going up, embracing fine hotels, academies and private dwellings, one or two cotton presses are in contemplation and an estimate of the probable improvement of the approaching summer, might excite ridicule from persons abroad. Such an animated sight as our harbor has presented during the last week, would reflect no discredit upon some of the most important ports of the United States."

LATEST FROM BUENOS AYRES AND BRAZIL. By the brig Pilgrim, captain Godfrey, we have Rio Janeiro papers to February 7th.

A letter from Montevideo, which must have been written near the close of January, states that various French officers had the noble daring to come with their boats near to the shore of Buenos Ayres, and leap into the water, in order to rescue sundry persons who had been proscribed by Rosas. Amidst the ravages of war and of tyranny, adds the Journal do Commercio, these acts of heroism are honorable to humanity.

We find no mention of Buenos Ayres having been bombarded by the French; but as our file is incomplete, it may have possibly taken place notwithstanding. [Jour. of Com.

MONEY MARKET, STOCKS, &c. From the United States Gazette of Wednesday last. In the ordinary language of business, money is scarce. The market is tight, and of course sums required to meet engagements command a large rate of interest. And yet we believe that the deposits in the banks were never greater than at the present moment. This of course is owing to the unsettled state of our affairs; men of capital are awaiting the entire disposal of the boundary question before they will let abroad the large supplies which await some profitable and permanent disposal.

We refer our readers to the report of sales of stocks at the boards held yesterday. It will be seen that the transactions were large, and generally at an advanced price. After the adjournment of the second board the following sales were made:

12 share U. S. bank,	113 1/4
10 do. Vicksburg, do.	57 1/2
20 do. Schuykill navigation	117
41 do. Wilmington rail road,	51 1/2
30 do. Vicksburg,	57 1/2

Business, however, did not close with the above stated transactions, as on inquiry we learn that considerable business was subsequently done. There was bidden 57 1-2 for 30 shares of Vicksburg, cash or ten days—100 shares of Vicksburg were offered at 57 3-4—$50 was bid for Mechanics' bank, and 50 1-2 asked—$113 was bid for 50 share U. S. bank, one share offered at 113 1-2, and 50 at 114—Girard bank was firm at 50, and 51 1-2 was readily bid for Wilmington rail road, 51 3-4 was asked.

From these facts an idea may be obtained of our money market. Those who read such articles as this with interest understand, of course, that the prices of stocks are not always governed by the dividend declared, nor does a small depreciation denote any diminution of confidence in the institutions. The amount of the stock in market, or liable to be brought forward, has an important bearing upon the price.

The New York Express says: "Business this spring has disappointed the expectations of the sanguine, and even of many who are quite considerate. The consequence has been, especially in our city, that a gloomy feeling has spread over the minds of many business men, and this has tended to increase the mischief. Money is scarce, when every body expected it would be plenty; credits are dubious, when all expected a brisk demand at a profit. Well, what of it? The cause of the depression is temporary, and by no means radical; and the check to business, such as it is, will doubtless be salutary in the end, though not for the present agreeable."

The Express, speaking of the exchange between that city and the south, states that the southern stocks for sale in New York are falling in price, owing to a want of confidence. It then adds:

The banks in New Orleans are determined to pay specie. Exchange is consequently about par; but on Alabama and Mississippi confidence is destroyed, and it is difficult to regulate bank checks, if at all, better than ten per cent. discount. This state of things will be exceedingly injurious to the trading interest of that section of country as well as to this city. Merchants here sold their goods last fall under a full belief that there would be little or no difference in the rate of exchange. The profits on goods were placed accordingly. The charge of paying ten or more per cent. on getting funds home, will fall heavily on the merchant.

Sales at the New York stock exchange, April 10.
 50 shares United States bank 113 3-4

Sales of stock at Philadelphia, April 10.
 55 shares United States bank 113 1-2
 The transactions at the board were very limited yesterday, but showed a decided improvement in prices—not only in speculative stocks, but our own local banks.

Money is still very tight, and we cannot look for any great change until after the arrival of the Great Western.

TREASURY CIRCULAR. We find the following in a New York paper:

Treasury department, Comptroller's office, April 2d, 1839.

Sir: It being understood, with respect to salt imported in sacks, that a diversity of practice exists at some of the custom houses, in consequence of the sacks not being considered in the light of dutiable charges on the salt while they are so regarded at others, the subject has recently been taken into consideration with a view to make the practice in the assessment of duty uniform.

It is proper to observe that the 15th section of the act of July 14, 1832, declares "that the ad valorem rates of duty on all goods, wares and merchandise shall be estimated in the manner following: to the actual cost, if the same shall have been procured otherwise than by purchase, at the time and place when and where purchased or otherwise procured, or to the appraised value, if appraised, shall be added all charges, except insurances."

By the 8th section of the act of 1820, the values of all imported articles subject to specific duty are to be ascertained in the same manner as the value of imports subject to duty ad valorem.

Whoever may have been the practice founded on the construction given to the pre-existing laws, it appears to me, that in conformity to the provisions cited above, sacks are nevertheless to be considered as constituting dutiable charges on imported salt, and that their cost should be taken into view in the computation of the duty; and this construction would seem necessary to result from the single exception of the charge for insurance. I deem it proper to add that when salt is imported in other than sacks, the same principle will apply.

As the erroneous practice, however, which it is the intention of this communication to arrest, is believed to have been of long standing at some of the ports, it is deemed proper at such ports to postpone the operation of the rule now laid down until the first of May next, after which period, it is expected that you will be governed by it.

You will give notice to the importers accordingly. I am respectfully, your obedient servant.

J. N. BARKER, comptroller.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE PRESIDENT.

Henry W. McCorry to be attorney, and Robert J. Chester to be marshal of the United States for the district of West Tennessee; and James P. Grunby to be attorney, and S. B. Marshall to be marshal for the middle district of Tennessee; under the act of congress of the 18th of January, 1839, entitled "an act to amend an act entitled an act to require the judge of the district of East and West Tennessee to hold a court at Jackson, in said state," approved June 18th, 1838.

THE SUB-MARINE EXPLOSIONS. From the Charleston (S. C.) Courier. This exhibition, on the day before yesterday, was very interesting. There were three several explosions, the first of kegs of powder placed on the bottom of the river at about seven feet depth of water. They each threw up a column of water to an immense height, (at least three hundred feet), during the falling of which, which lasted several seconds—very distinct rainbows appeared to the east. The first explosion, though about 250 yards from the battery, caused a heavy shower to fall thereon, and we regret to say caused no trifling damage to the elegant dresses of some of the ladies. The hulk of a vessel anchored about half a mile from the shore was then blown up, by a keg of powder placed in the water about one foot below her keel. She was broken in two about the middle, by the explosion, and fragments of various sizes, some very large, were flung up with the column of water to a very great height, among them iron bolts, &c. which gave out a very perceptible hissing as they fell again into the water—a circumstance worthy of remark, as it shows the heat communicated, notwithstanding the water interposed between the keel and the powder. A large concourse of spectators left the scene much gratified. There is no doubt of the efficiency of the contrivance if used against a blockading fleet.

The fire was communicated to the powder by a rope prepared with a composition which burns under water.

THE WESLEYAN CENTENARY. Our advices of the progress of the centenary fund are up to the first of March, when the collections reached the immense sum of £160,000 ($710,400), an amount far exceeding the expectations of the most sanguine at the time of the first meeting. At the close of February the general committee decided that it was expedient at once to form a committee of appropriation. This committee consisted of the president and secretary, and many of the treasurers and secretaries of the several funds of the connexion, together with a number of the senior ministers and gentlemen from various parts of the kingdom. After a long deliberation, the following was the result of the appropriation:

1. For two institution houses,	£55,000
2. Missionary premises in London,	23,000
3. Missionary supernumeraries, widows, and orphans,	21,000
4. Purchase of a missionary ship,	3,000
5. Outfit, stores, insurance, &c.	3,000
6. Chapel loan fund in England,	35,000
7. do do Ireland,	2,000
8. Kingswood and Woolhouse Grove schools,	5,700
9. Auxiliary fund debt,	1,500
10. New auxiliary fund,	9,000
11. Expenses, &c.	1,500
	£160,000

The committee farther agreed that out of the sum which may yet be received £5,000 be appropriated for a centenary monumental chapel in Dublin, and the like sum for the Wesleyan day schools.

RAFT OF THE RED RIVER. The following letter has been presented to the editors of the "Globe" for publication:

Head quarters, 3d infantry, Fort Towson, March 18, 1839.

Sir: I have thought you would be pleased to learn that the river raft is again opened, that several boats have recently passed through, and that we have just arrived at our landing, six miles from the fort, laden in part, with public stores. With great respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your very obedient servant,

ENLARGEMENT OF THE ERIE CANAL. From the Albany Argus. The canal commissioners submitted to the assembly, on Saturday, in compliance with a resolution of that body of the 20th February, a report in relation to the enlargement and improvement of the Erie canal. DANGERS OF RAIL ROAD TRAVELLING. It is ascertained by experiment, that the danger of loss of life on an average rail road trip, is as about 1 to 4,000,000. The following data on which this conclusion is founded, are copied from a late British publication:

TRAVELLING AS IT WAS AND AS IT IS. From the Natchez Courier. Mr. Black—Dear sir: The following brief summary of a recent journey from New York to New Orleans, contrasted with one made in 1800, will perhaps be interesting to some of you and serve to illustrate the modern improvement in travelling. Yours, J.

 1800, April 3d, left New York in a ferry boat to New York city. Took two-horse coach and got to Philadelphia the fourth day at 4 p. m. Left Philadelphia next morning in a one-horse stage, with the bag behind, for Lancaster, where we arrived the first day. At Lancaster bought a horse, and after nine days' journey through the forests of Pittsburg. Here with some others, I bought, fifteen dollars, a flat-boat, in which we took our departure for New Orleans, floating with the wind. After divers adventures and escapes from peril by land and water, we reached Natchez thirty-seventh day after leaving Pittsburg, and Orleans city in thirteen days thereafter, having from New York on the journey eighty-four which our friends in New Orleans did say was a perilous voyage. My own personal cost on way was, in sum total, $27 11s. 4 1-4d.

1839. Left New York, Monday, January 21st, a. m. in rail road cars at Jersey city. Arrived Philadelphia at ten minutes past 12. Cost $4.
 2. left Philadelphia in cars for Baltimore. Arrived at 8 p. m. Cost $4.
 3. Baltimore next afternoon at 4, in mail chariot Wheeling. Arrived at Wheeling 5 minutes before 12, Saturday noon.
 4. Wheeling next morning in accommodation for Cincinnati. Arrived at Cincinnati in 5 1/2 hours, 59 h. 30 m. Cost $24 50.
 5. Cincinnati at 10 next morning, in the mail stage, and at 10 at night reached Louisville. Cost, 12 h. Cost $4.
 6. Louisville next morning at 11, in steamer boat, and reached Natchez the sixth day. Cost, 149 h. Cost $35.
 7. Natchez same day, and reached New Orleans the next evening.
 8. New Orleans at Philadelphia, Baltimore, Cincinnati and Louisville, $10.
 9. Total 306 hours 30 minutes. Cost $114 50.
 10. Making 12 days, 18 hours, and 30 minutes, time of travel between New York and New Orleans.
 11. Difference between 1839 and 1800, in time, about 140 days.
 12. In expense, about $25 in favor of 1839.

F. B. This last journey was made in the winter months. In the summer months it can be performed in 30 and in less time. The above includes every thing, both of expense, of "feed and fare." Yours, VIATOR.

THE OHIO. Extract from a letter of an officer bound the Ohio, to his friend in Washington, dated 1839.

U. S. ship Ohio, off Gibraltar, Dec. 28, 1838. I am happy to say that we have reached this port after a very pleasant passage of twenty-one days. The ship works, steers and sails remarkably well. Her steering and sailing are beyond any thing I have known before. She did not perform well on her passage from Boston, owing to her being out of trim, but since we left New York she has made like the wind; and what is most surprising she has gone 12 1/2 knots within 6 1/2 points of the wind, under double reefed topsails and topgallant sails over them."

A letter from an officer to the Boston Transcript gives a vivid description of the great qualities of this noble vessel, the last monument of the lamented Eckford's genius.

The writer says: "It would be presumption in me as on any other man to say that she will do, but I do not hesitate to say she surpasses in every respect—sailing, working, &c.—every ship in which I have been since I was first sprinkled with salt water. I have had, you will certainly admit, some experience, and some opportunity of judging correctly, but I never supposed such a ship could be built—a ship possessing so great a degree all the qualifications of a perfect vessel of war. She is as animated as a pilot boat, and, remembering her immense bulk and weight, almost as easily managed. Her performance is truly astonishing. We are now passing the Cape (twenty one days out) and the passage has been somewhat blustering. To give you some idea of opportunity to try her. To give you some idea of sailing: With two sails double reefed and topgallant over them, close hauled to the wind, she has repeatedly sailed twelve and a half knots. This is truth and no exaggeration. When we left New York our draft was 24 ft. 6 in. forward, 26 ft. aft, 1/2 of midship port from water, 5 ft. 2 in. Her battery brought her down 14 inches."

RETIREMENT OF MR. BROBSON. W. P. Brobson, esq., for many years editor of the Delaware State Journal, has been elected cashier of the Union Bank of Delaware, and a few days previous to receiving this honorable testimonial in favor of his capacity and integrity, retired from the editorial chair which he filled with such distinguished ability. Most truly does he merit the following tribute, from one capable of appreciating his talents and services, and which happily expresses the opinion we have always entertained of them.

From the United States Gazette. William P. Brobson, esq. has retired from the editorial chair of the Wilmington (Del.) Journal, which he has occupied for more than ten years.

We cannot allow the withdrawal of so worthy a member of our craft, to pass unnoted. Mr. Brobson is a ripe scholar, a good reader, and a close observer of men, manners and things; and has used his server of men, encourages good morals, cultivates social position to encourage good morals, cultivate social position to promote education, and most eminently and successfully to promote the prosperity of the city of Wilmington, by the encouragement of enterprises that call into action the slumbering energies of his fellow citizens, and give activity to their capital. Wilmington owes much to such an editor. She owes much to Mr. Brobson; and as from year to year, she finds her borders enlarged, and her wealth augmented, we doubt not that she will recollect, with tokens of gratitude, the man whose services were so ministrant to her good.

Mr. Brobson is a sound whig, and he gave his editorial articles a patriotic and a gentlemanly tone, that won the respect of even his opponents, and entitled him to the gratitude of his political friends.

We make these remarks as due to a retiring brother of our gentle craft, for whom, without a personal acquaintance, we have long entertained a deep respect; and whatever may be the future employment of Mr. Brobson, we hope that it will be distinguished by as much advantage to himself, as his previous labors have been to others.

Mr. Nail, one of the proprietors of the Journal, is to be the editor, in the place of Mr. Brobson. We heartily wish him success in his arduous profession. We are sure that he will be courteous, as well as dignified, (the example of his predecessor is too instructive to be mistaken), and we venture to promise him, that thus discharging his duties, he will add consequence to the profession, and ensure a pecuniary reward.

A GOOD ANECDOTE WELL TOLD. Among the many good whigs of the legislature of the last house of commons of North Carolina was Mr. H. C. Jones, editor of the Salisbury Watchman. During the debates on Mr. Raynor's resolutions, which our readers will recollect, expressed the opinions of the legislature against "the expunge," sub-treasury, &c. Mr. Jones delivered two speeches in their favor, well seasoned, as the Raleigh Register says, with genuine attic. It was contended by the loco focos that the whigs could not, without an abandonment of their principle, support the resolutions as they favored the doctrine of "instructions" to which, as a party they were opposed. The answer to this argument spoke as follows:—

"Mr. Speaker, I must illustrate our position on this subject by relating an incident that occurred in the tory war of the revolution. You have heard of the celebrated John Cleveland. North Carolina has never done justice to that man's fame. He was one of those gallant spirits that first turned back the tide of British domination by the battle of King's Mountain. He had an impediment in his speech, and, like all stammerers that ever I have known, he was hasty in temper and violent—

"Impiger, iracundus, inexorabilis, acer."

If I may be permitted to quote a fine translation sir, I think you will best speak our hero as the original—(Leave, leave having roundouted through the hall)—I will give you, then, the rendition of that Scottish worthy, Cosmo, Conyne, Bradwardine:—

"A fiery etter-cap, a fractious chiel; As hot as ginger, and as steeve as steel."

Cleveland lived in a tory neighborhood, and while he was campaigning, these desperadoes used to depredate upon him greatly. They would steal his horses, drive off his cattle and burn his fences and out houses. A party of them, headed by a leader, one Bill Harrison, went so far as to put his overseer to death for endeavoring to protect his employer's property. The manner of this crime was somewhat peculiar. They took their victim to a steep hill side, and placing him on a log, fastened one end of a grape vine around his neck, and the other over the prong of a stooping dogwood. When they had thus arranged it, one of the party went up the hill, and rubbing head foremost against their captive, hurried him off into eternity. John Doss was the name of the sufferer. Now, John Cleveland was not the man to put up with all these injuries, and the day of retribution was near at hand. Harrison, the ringleader in all these outrages, shortly afterwards fell into Cleveland's hands. He was an ingenious mechanic, who Cleveland had often employed in more peaceful avocations. He was a man of many favors; and remembrance of these things were by no means calculated to mitigate the offender's doom. Accompanied by his favorite servant Bill, and one other individual, without speaking a word Cleveland carried his prisoner to the same dogwood on which he had hanged poor Doss. Here was dangling the very grape vine, which had been used on the former occasion. Without more to do, he placed the noose over the other's neck and placed him on the log, "you will not hang me colone!" at length faintly observed the trembling wretch. "Can you give me any reason why I should not do it?" said the other, "you know I am a useful man in this neighborhood," said Harrison "and cannot well be spared; I have moreover discovered the secret of perpetual motion, and if I am put to death, the world will lose the benefit of my discovery. Besides this, I have heard you curse Bryant and Fanning for putting their prisoners to death. Where are your principles? Where is your conscience, that you are about to execute vengeance on me, your former friend and neighbor?" "Where are my horses and cattle—where are my fences and barns—and where is poor Jack Doss? Ere God, I will do this deed and justify myself to God and my country! Run up the hill and butt him off the log Bill, I'll show him per-pe-tual motion!"

SWORD TO MAJOR NELSON AND TO COLONEL HENDERSON. The senate concurred unanimately in the resolution, voting a sword to major NELSON. The major is a son of old major John Nelson, of Mecklenburg, who served with Washington at York and Lafayette, at York. Major Nelson was in several engagements on the Canada line during the late war. General George W. Brouke, in a recent letter speaks in the highest terms of his gallantry and good conduct on several occasions—of his volunteering to attack the enemy, and actually doing so, and compelling them in sight of our army, which repeatedly cheered him. The major was formerly a representative in congress from the Mecklenburg district, and is a gentleman of much intellectual power and great moral worth. He is not aware of this move. The tribute has been too long delayed.

The house, also, voted yesterday unanimously a sword to colonel HENDERSON, the gallant commander of the marine corps of the United States, who distinguished himself during the late war with Great Britain at sea, and volunteered his services on the land—in a service stroke to him—when the alarming situation of Florida invoked the aid of every chivalrous soldier in the service of the U States, to her rescue. [Richmond Enquirer.

MARINE INSURANCE CASE. The N. York Journal of Commerce says, that the supreme court of the United States, at their last session in Washington, decided that in case of a vessel being voluntarily stranded by the captain when all was in imminent peril—from a gale of wind—from fire—or from the chase of an enemy or of pirates—the cargo being saved, and the vessel being got off with partial injury, the cargo should contribute towards paying the damage or cost of repairs encountered by the ship owners. The decisions of the local courts had been various on the question; it is now settled by the highest judicial tribunal in the country. The principle on which the cargo is made liable to a share in the damage of the vessel is sound, and the damage incurred as much for the safety of the cargo according to its value as for that of the ship; and therefore it would be unjust for the whole consequence of the hazard to be borne by the latter.

THERE'S NO PLACE LIKE HOME. We think the annals of prisoners will hardly furnish a parallel to the following facts, for which we are indebted to a correspondent:

About the year 1820, James Osborne, of Sherman, in this county, was convicted upon a charge of assault and battery, and sentenced to pay a small fine and costs. The precise amount of the whole we do not recollect, but it was quite inconsiderable. The amount not being paid, he was committed to the jail in Danbury, where he remained eighteen years. As the law has stood during that period, he could be discharged from his imprisonment, only upon either paying the fine and costs, or giving his note for the amount. This he ever steadily refused to do. The judges of the county court, the sheriffs and state attorneys have all endeavored to get rid of him, and to persuade him to execute the note, for without the note, neither one nor all of them had any authority to release him. But all has been in vain and he has remained a tenant of the prison.

During the session of the legislature in May last a representation of these facts was made to that body, and a resolution passed ordering him to be forthwith released, unconditionally. Even then he refused to leave the jail, and was forcibly turned out. He returned to his native place, but friends and acquaintances, with only a few exceptions, had disappeared. Some had removed, and others were no longer among the living, and he found their places occupied by another generation of men. He was a stranger in the land of his fathers, and sighed for his former habitation within the walls of the prison. He wandered about for a few months, and in October last returned to the jail in Danbury and sought admission. The jailer received him and there he now is, occupying one of the cells of the jail, and paying the keeper two dollars per week for his entertainment. [Norwalk Gazette.

CITIES OF THE ATLANTIC BORDER. From the New Haven Record. Mr. Editor: When I visited the states, in 1785 and 1786, I numbered the houses in several of the principal cities and towns, assisted in some instances by a friend or two. I had supposed the account of the numbers lost, but looking into the American Magazine, which I published in New York fifty years ago, I found it, and send you a copy. For assisting the memory, each account is stated in the nearest round number, differing from the real number not more, in any instance, than five. N. WEBSTER.

FRANCE AND MEXICO.

The British frigate Medea, on the 17th, brought to Havana the important intelligence that a treaty had been agreed upon at Vera Cruz, and signed by admiral Baudin, and the Mexican minister. It was to be forthwith despatched to the government, in order to be ratified—fifteen days being allowed for that purpose.

The following official account of the event and the provisions of the treaty, is published in the Diario de la Habana, of the 15th instant:

"On the 6th instant, there was a conference in this place, between the agents of the Mexican government and the French admiral Charles Baudin. It lasted until yesterday the 9th, and from it resulted an agreement of peace between Mexico and France; which agreement was sent to-day to Mexico for the ratification of the supreme chambers. And if it is approved, we shall have peace of which we shall be informed on the 25th inst. and which I will have the honor to communicate to your excellency. I enclose you now a copy of the armistice celebrated yesterday between the said Baudin and the general commander of this department, Don Guadalupe Victoria; and if it pleases your excellency may have it published, for the notice of our countrymen.

The said document runs as follows—

"Consulate of his Catholic majesty at Vera Cruz. The admiral commander-in-chief of the French naval forces in the Gulf of Mexico, and the general of division, commander-in-chief of the Mexican army; considering first that a treaty of peace has been signed to-day by the respective plenipotentiaries, which, if it be ratified, as it ought to be expected, will re-establish very soon the good understanding between the two nations; and secondly, that it is the duty of both belligerents to relieve as soon as possible, the sufferings of the neutral commerce, they have agreed in the following armistice:

Art. 1st. The hostilities will be suspended on both sides for fifteen days from next Monday the 11th inst.; the port of Vera Cruz is open to all flags without exception.

2d. Every merchandise of lawful commerce will be admitted whatever might be its precedence, after paying its respective duties, according to the laws, and during which period, after the said duties are paid, they may be introduced into the country.

3d. The general-in-chief of the 1st division binds himself to give the necessary orders that the consignees or French proprietors of the goods imported in Vera Cruz, in virtue of what is stipulated in the former article, as well as the person that they want for the management of their interests, may enter and remain in the city, and attend to their business, in the period of time mentioned above.

CHARLES BAUDIN,
G. VICTORIA.

Vera Cruz, March 9, 1839.

The New Orleans Bee of the 22d ult. says that the Mexicans at Vera Cruz were much pleased with the treaty, and public rejoicings in consequence thereof took place on the evenings of the 9th and 10th.

Mr. Palckenham, the English minister, guarantees, in the name of his government, the payment of the indemnity due to the exiled French, the conditions of which are to be hereafter fixed.

We are assured that the whole Mexican population approved of the treaty, which was made in November, which formed the basis of the one now adopted.

France receives nothing to indemnify the expenses of the war, and claimed merely the $600,000 mentioned in her ultimatum, to be paid in six months.

The English minister signed the treaty as one of the parties, and it was expected that the English fleet before Vera Cruz would immediately sail for Europe, its object being accomplished.

The Mexican journals are of opinion that their government will not ratify the treaty.

Mr. David, consul of France at New Orleans, with a laudable zeal for the interests of commerce, has communicated the following extract of a despatch from admiral Baudin:

"In the evening of the 9th March, admiral Baudin signed at Vera Cruz, together with the Mexican plenipotentiary Manuel Gorostiza and sen. Guadalupe Victoria, a convention and treaty of peace.

"Mr. Gorostiza set off on the morning of the 10th for Mexico, to obtain the ratification of congress.

"The plenipotentiaries asked an armistice of 15 days, which was granted by the admiral, and he immediately opened the ports of Vera Cruz to all flags, without distinction.

"French vessels, and those of other nations, which were lying at Vera Cruz, immediately commenced discharging their cargoes.

"The peaceable tidings from Vera Cruz have already given new life to one branch of commerce at New Orleans. It is stated that thirty cargoes of merchandise will have entered the Mexican ports by the end of March, and that other shipments will follow, should the Mexican government ratify and observe the treaty with France, of which there is now little doubt.

The government of Mexico encouraged by the prospect of peace with France, has directed its whole force against Urrea and the federalists. The following letter, from the American consul at Tampico, which has been communicated to the editors of the Louisianian, contains some important intelligence.

Consulate of the U. S. of America,
Tampico, March 14, 1839.

SIR: In consequence of the present critical state of political affairs, and the fears entertained by the foreign residents in this place, that our lives and property will be endangered in case the government troops succeed in entering the town, I have requested the commander of the U. S. cutter Woodbury, to bring his vessel inside of the river, and to remain here until there may be no further apprehension.

General Cos is in Tamapuche, a town some short distance on this side of Tuspan, where general Mexia has his head quarters. General Urrea is still at Valle del Maiz, and we may expect that Arista who is now in San Luis with government troops will soon have a meeting with him.

The Woodbury brings intelligence from Matamoras that troops, to the number of 600 or 800 men, have marched against the federal party about Matamoras. No news relating to the French question has been received. We are far from feeling easy and secure, more particularly as unfounded reports are daily spread in the capital implicating foreigners in the present revolution; for example, it is believed by the government that 300 men have arrived from New Orleans for the purpose of acting under general Mexia. Your obedient servant,
JNO. C. McCALL.

James W. Breedlove, esq.

Collector of the customs, New Orleans.

Private letters furnish the following particulars: The army under Mexia, at Tuspan, consisted 1,400 men, who were working at the fortification night and day.

Generals Falencia and Cos were posted at the distance of four leagues from Tuspan with the government troops, and were constantly annoyed by sallies from the town.

Great ferment prevailed in the interior. The town of Toluca had declared in favor of Urrea.

Santa Ana entered the city of Mexico on the 13th February. It was believed in that capital that Bu lamante would soon place himself at the head of the army acting against the federalists.

Pedraza has left Tampico to join the army Urrea.

LATER FROM MEXICO.

From the New Orleans Bulletin, April 2.

To the courtesy of our American consul at Vera Cruz we are indebted for files of "El Censor" from the 14th to the 17th inclusive. On the 15th an express arrived from Mexico, communicating intelligence which show a disposition in the government to ratify the convention with France. The news of the amicable arrangement caused great rejoicing in the capital. Immediately on the receipt of the intelligence, a president ad interim was appointed and invested with the government, and on the next day Bustamante put himself at the head of a large force and marched towards Tampico, for the purpose of putting down the rebels there, who were making head against the government. The ministerial papers describe his forces as fully adequate to overwhelm the feeble resistance likely to be offered.

The broken and dispirited federalists. He was accompanied on this expedition by general Cortaz as second in command. From these movements the seat of government, it is conclusive that a treaty with France was about to be ratified, or, perhaps, already ratified, at the sanction of the executive authority. Bustamante, the president, who did not precipitately have left the capital and direct his whole force against the insurgent federalists unless all apprehensions of a French invasion be quieted. Neither is it probable that public rejoicings would have announced an event in Mexico which was not viewed by the government with approbation.

Another fact which confirms this view was, the expected departure of a conducta from Mexico Vera Cruz, laden with three millions of dollars. cargo of precious metals would not certainly be sent to a port that was liable every moment to be captured by a powerful and exasperated foe. There are many reasons which must conspire to make a treaty acceptable to the present administration Mexico; among the strongest of which may be the one of the insurrection breaking out in different quarters of the republic. The rebels had made great progress; their forces augmented; they became formidable, and the party seated power became alarmed for their safety; revolutionary sentiments had spread extensively and popular; and the name of Urrea became associated in the minds of the people with the idea of deliverance and emancipation from tyranny. In this dilemma, the government might well rejoice at opportunity of making peace with a foreign enemy in order that all its force might be concentrated upon the rebels at home, who were daily encroaching upon its authority, and impairing its stability. There is no doubt that general Urrea had as much influence in bringing about the pacification as British minister. And this, however, as it may affect the same. The treaty is, no doubt ratified and France and Mexico are at peace.

The Diario del Gobierno (Mexico) of the 13th March contains a circular to the following import: In case the plenipotentiary of his majesty the king of the French shall enact indemnification for the of the war, or for any other motive, his excellency the president has advised that all Mexican agents, who think themselves entitled to indemnification for losses sustained in consequence of the war with France, shall present their reclamations to the government, duly authenticated, that they may be in opposition to the said demands.

STILL LATER FROM MEXICO.

The Mexican schooner Ann Maria arrived at New Orleans on the 31st instant from Tampico, which she left on the 23d of March. She brings accounts of little between the federal troops, under general Cos, and the government troops under general Arista, at Tuspan, on the 15th of March. The accounts are contradictory as to the result, though the information is to the effect that general Cos was defeated. A letter to the collector of the port of New Orleans states that general Cos's army was completely routed, after a bloody and well contested battle, and he forced to escape in disguise. The letters also state that the success of the federalists in battle had infused fresh hope in their troops, and that the victory was celebrated at Tampico with great rejoicings. The following is the despatch of general Mexico on the occasion:

Head quarters, liberating army,

Tuspan, March 15, 1839.

I have the satisfaction to announce to you that now at 1 o'clock, the federal army has obtained complete triumph over the division of the guard of the central troops, commanded by general Arista. I have only time to state that after three hours and a half of the hottest firing, the action terminated by a capitulation, in which it has been reported that the whole army of assailants shall fall into the hands of Mexico by regular marches. During the day we made 200 prisoners, and was joined after the battle by 130 of the centralists; all their artillery, arms and baggage, 350 muskets and many other articles have fallen into our hands. I lost 4 officers and 12 soldiers killed. The enemy's lost amounted to 10 officers and 76 privates.

JOSE ANTONIO MEXIA.

On the other hand, the captain of the schooner Ann Maria states, as we learn from the New Orleans Bee, that on the eve of his departure, general Arista entered Tampico, escorted by only three officers and a few privates. The rumor likewise circulated at Tampico, that Urrea had been twice defeated by the centralists, who numbered 7,000 men, and the latter were marching on Tampico, and were then only distant 12 leagues. About 1,000 federal troops were stationed at Tampico. Other reports affirm that the central army was 90 miles from Tampico. These conflicting reports require great caution. General Cos escaped in a wonderful manner by means of a disguise, in which he clothed himself, and his victory gave rise to great rejoicings at Tampico. Arista was about to depart from San Luis Potosi with 1,000 men, but it was supposed that the defeat of Cos would make him retrace his steps. They were well prepared to receive him at Tampico.

It was also stated, but on no sufficient authority, that letters had been received from Mexico announcing the ratification of the treaty signed on the 15th of March, between France and Mexico.

The U. S. cutter was still at Tampico. Among reports was one that the French brig of war Arcturion, of 22 guns, has been ordered by admiral Boscawen to survey the coast of Mexico, for the purpose of making accurate charts of that coast.

LATE FROM ENGLAND.

The Boston Atlas quotes London papers of the 11th, by the Age, from Liverpool. There are no reports of markets.

The entrance into the cabinet of the lord Norbury and lord Morpeth, is looked upon by the London liberal journals as a gain to the cause of reform.

Mr. Labouchere, who was some years ago in this country, is appointed under secretary to lord Norbury.

The following respecting American stocks is from the London Morning Chronicle:

A small loan for the state of Florida, United States, has been contracted for in London within the last few days, and the new bonds have been considerably demanded to-day at 95. It is a 6 per cent. sterling loan, with the interest payable half yearly, at 4 per cent. The loan is to be issued by Messrs. Palmer, Mackillop, Dent and Co's. of the U. S. 4s. 6d. per dollar, the bonds being payable to the order of the Union bank of Florida, and endorsed by the bank. The object of raising the money is to add to the active capital of that institution, for the purpose of developing the resources of the territory and encouraging useful enterprise. The utmost exertion has been made by some parties to depreciate the value of all kinds of American stocks and securities; but the amount of British capital which is invested in them is greatly increasing.

SIX DAYS LATER FROM LIVERPOOL.

The packet ship Monongahela, at Philadelphia, brings London papers to the 7th and Liverpool to the 5th March. We copy the following items from the Inquirer and Herald.

The British navy.

A long and interesting debate in relation to the navy estimates for the present year took place in the house of commons on the 5th inst. Several speakers advocated an increase—among them Mr. Cadogan. No question was taken.

From the Liverpool Standard of March 8.

We cannot refrain from expressing our sincere regret that there is every probability of immediate hostilities with the United States. We repeat we regret it, for many reasons, particularly for the sake of thousands and thousands of high minded, intelligent, virtuous and benevolent persons in that country, many of whom we know personally, who must suffer severely if war should take place.

Her majesty's frigate Inconstant, which has arrived at Plymouth in 15 days from Halifax, has brought intelligence from America seven days later than the packet George Washington. By her we learn that not only has the government of the state of Maine taken possession of the long disputed boundary line in that state, but that the United States government had actually issued orders for the taking possession of the disputed territory.

If this be the case, that is, if the United States government (we desire to express ourselves distinctly upon this important subject), has issued such an order, no power on earth will ever convince us but that certain personages in this country have not only given it to understand it might do so with impunity, but have instigated it so to do!

We know enough of the mind of Van Buren and of the most talented members of the United States government, to convince us, that they never would have sanctioned such a procedure, unless they have lost their senses since the month of July last, or unless they had intimation to do so, and assurances from influential persons here, that they should meet with no opposition from this country.

We now give our reasons for such conclusions. The government of the United States would no more venture to risk a war with England as the states are now circumstanced, than it would venture to proclaim Victoria queen of North America.

The United States were never, since the declaration of independence, in such a precarious position as they now are. In the south they are threatened by two and a half millions of discontented slaves, who are only watching an opportunity to cast off their fetters, and take vengeance on those who hold them in bondage. In the free states there are upwards of three hundred thousand free people of color, who are burning to set their brethren in the south free, and are revenged on the inhabitants of the free states, who treat them (the free slaves) worse than their brethren are treated in the south. Again, on the western frontier there are some hundred thousand Indian warriors, many of whom have been even within the last year, unjustly banished from their own lands, and who are only waiting an opportunity for revenge.

And lastly, the American citizens themselves are now divided into two great classes—the minority, consisting of the most wealthy, intelligent and honorable part of the community, who are heartily sick of republican schemes; and the majority, who constitute nine-tenths of the population. Between these two classes there exists the most inveterate jealousy and animosity. The former class is almost entirely removed from the direction of public affairs; it entertains a hearty distaste to the democratic institutions of the country; and the populace is at once the object of its scorn and of its fears.

The other class, the majority, which consists of the ignorant rabble, whose chief object is agrarianism, is fastidious, abhors every thing that has the slightest resemblance to intellectual refinement or English manners. The difference and hatred between these two parties are daily increasing, are incurable, and will go on increasing, till some awful explosion occurs.

Under such circumstances the government of the United States, whatever the government of the state of Maine may think proper to do, or the desire of the rabble, who entertain the most rancorous feelings towards this country may be—that government, we say, would never voluntarily do any act which might provoke a war with England, except under positive assurances that for such an act it would not be called to an account! Besides, we know that the most influential and talented men of that government, and the minority of the people, above alluded to; entertain the most friendly feelings towards this country, and would never be the provokers of a war with Great Britain.

The question now is, what object could persons in power here have, for inducing the Americans to take possession of the disputed territory? The answer is, they want to abandon Canada to a republican system of government. Lord Durham's report and sir Francis Head's narrative fully prove this.

The disputed territory, which consists of 5,000 square miles, lies exactly between New Brunswick and Lower Canada; so as, if in the possession of a strong power, to act effectually on almost all communications, for six or seven months in the year, between these two parts of her majesty's dominions, and consequently, between Canada and this country. The abandonment of this territory will also present an additional republican frontier of more than two hundred miles to Lower Canada.

Under these circumstances, the most effectual way of increasing the power of the enemies of Canada, and then of persuading us to abandon Canada altogether, would be the yielding up of this vast tract of country to the United States.

Where is the individual of common intellect, who has attentively watched the proceedings of ministers in reference to the Canadian disturbances and has attentively perused Lord Durham's report, and sir Francis Head's narrative (copious extracts of which we published in our last two numbers) who can doubt for a moment the disposition of the policy, and the secret intention of the government in reference to Canada.

The secret correspondence carried on between ministers and the ringleaders of the Canadian rebellion, as published in our last; the encouragement given them; and lord Durham's proposals for Canada, being based on the advice and statements of republican rebels, must remove all doubt on the subject.

However much we detest and abhor war, yet if our government allow the Americans to take forcible possession of this land, and thus abandon our loyal fellow subjects in Canada to the control of republican rebels, all we can say is, the present ministry can do what no other ministry ever dared; and that the English people allow them to do so, we shall attribute all hope of rescuing our country from the dominion of infidels and of papists.

Now recollect our statement: it the United States' government has issued orders for the taking possession of the disputed territory in the state of Maine, and if our government do not forthwith resist that act, the whole is a whig and a radical plot having its origin in England.

The Canada bill. Lord John Russell stated that the Canada bill would not be brought forward until after Easter. The Scotch judges are to have £3,000 per annum.

Lord Glenelg. "It has been currently reported, confidently asserted, and actually published in the United Service Journal, and in the Naval and Military Gazette, that Lord Glenelg's having refused assent to a scheme of ministers for transposing the control of the arms from the sovereign and military authorities to a civil department was the cause of his lordship's expulsion! What next?"

A letter from Naples, under date of February 16th, says—"Last night a part of our founding hospital was destroyed by fire. The flames spread so rapidly that twenty-three children perished. One of the nurses in her despair threw herself out of the window with two children in her arms; all three were found dashed to pieces and quite dead in the street. The firemen distinguished themselves by their efforts; three of them were killed, having fallen from the upper story to the lower, where they were buried in the ruins."

A new insurrection in Syria. The natives of Honam, joined by the mountaineers, had taken arms to shake off the Egyptian yoke. A British Pacha marched a large body of troops against them.

The elections in France. The Paris National claims a majority of twenty-one deputies for the opposition out of two hundred and seventy-five already heard from. The ministerial papers on the other hand speak with confidence of success.

A dinner was given by the members of Precursors' society in London to Daniel O'Connell, esq. M. P. at the Highbury Barn tavern, Islington. About eight hundred persons sat down to dinner, and at least from one hundred to one hundred and fifty ladies were present in the gallery. Mr. O'Connell addressed the meeting several times in the course of the evening.

PASSAGE OF IMPORTANT INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT ACTS.

From the Baltimore Journal.

The legislature of Maryland adjourned on Saturday night, and during the last two days of its session enacted several highly important laws in reference to the works of internal improvement in which this community as well as the state at large has a deep interest. The annexed brief notice of them will furnish a general idea of their character.

BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAIL ROAD.

The highly gratifying intelligence reached us by Saturday's mail from Annapolis, of the passage by the senate of the bill from the house, authorising the conversion of the six per cent. bonds issued by the state to the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company and Chesapeake and Ohio canal company, into five per cent. bonds. This bill, which is now a law, unlocks the state's $3,000,000 subscription to the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company, and renders it at once available for the purposes of that company in the prosecution of its great work to the western waters.

This is a most important measure for the interests of the road, and it is much to be regretted, that it was not followed up by another act which it was equally incumbent on the legislature to pass—the grant of the state's guarantee to the bonds issued by the city of Baltimore to pay her $9,000,000 subscription to the road. This last measure, which the house sanctioned by a large majority a fortnight ago, and which the senate rejected, our readers will be surprised to learn was rejected by the house on Friday night by a vote of 23 to 49!

SUSQUEHANNA AND TIDE WATER CANAL COMPANY.

On Saturday the house of delegates by a vote of 25 to 22, and the senate by a vote of 10 to 6, passed the bill granting the guarantee of the state to the bonds of this company, to the amount of $1,000,000. This act is of the highest importance to the stockholders, to the state of Pennsylvania, and to the city of Baltimore, inasmuch as it will place in the hands of the company the means of completing, forthwith, the canal for the passage of boats along the entire line from Columbia to tide water at Havre de Grace. This highly desirable event, we are happy to assure our readers, will take place in the course of the ensuing fall, when our people will begin to reap the pleasant fruits arising from the completion of one of the works which they are largely interested in. The act authorises the issue of 5 per cent. sterling, or 6 per cent. currency bonds, at the company's option, so that they may be disposed of either in this country or Europe, as may be deemed most advantageous for its interests. One of the sections requires the construction of an outlet lock opposite to Port Deposit, provided it shall not cost the company more than $15,000.

SUSQUEHANNA RAIL ROAD.

The Susquehanna rail road bill—appropriating $750,000 for the completion of that work—has passed both branches and become a law. We learn that this act provides for an increased number of directors in the company on the part of the state and city, and for a diminution of those representing the individual stockholders. We are informed that the directors appointed on the part of the state are Messrs. Samuel Lucas, Samuel Brady, Solomon Hullen, jr., and J. W. Watkins.

ANNAPOLIS RAIL ROAD.

The bill in favor of the Annapolis and Elkridge rail road company has also become a law.

CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO CANAL.

An act has passed the legislature making a further appropriation of $1,375,000 to the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company. The bill as originally reported was intended to appropriate this sum for the purchase by the state of the stock of individuals, but this feature was afterwards stricken out, and the sum was appropriated directly to the canal company.

We regret to be compelled to add that both houses have sanctioned the bill which goes to repeal the act of last session, authorising the tide water canal company to remove from Hartford county court, cases in which excessive damages have been awarded against the company, for injuries alleged to have been sustained in the location of the canal.

GENERAL SCOTT.

From the New York American.

This distinguished man has declined the compliment doubly offered to him of a public dinner in this city. However we may regret that the opportunity was thus lost to so many of our fellow citizens of publicly testifying their cordial regard for, and high estimation of, gen. Scott, the manner and the motive of his declining will only add to that estimate.

We annex the letters that passed on the occasion: New York, April 2, 1837.

DEAR SIR: It is now two years since that, inspired by the meritorious services you had rendered to our common country in Florida and Alabama, and rejoicing in the then recent approbation pronounced by the president of the United States upon the finding of a court of inquiry, in which those services had been brought into question, your fellow citizens of New York had the honor of inviting you to meet them at a public dinner, and of receiving your acceptance of the invitation. Untoward circumstances, now no longer existing, but which then weighed heavily upon this community, induced you to ask an indefinite postponement of the dinner, and influenced us, as the organs of others, to acquiesce in that request. But now, that the commercial difficulties, then subsisting, have passed away, and that you from that period to the present, have had your triumph from one civic triumph to another, when, in addition to the preservation of our neutral obligations on the Canada frontier, and the bloodless removal of the Cherokee from their ancient homes, you have, under circumstances of peculiar difficulty and excitement, succeeded in preventing any violation of the peace of the country, and in preserving the due subordination of the state to federal authority, in the territory in dispute between the United States and Great Britain on the frontiers of the state of Maine—we claim the fulfillment of your pledge to meet your fellow citizens of New York at a public dinner; and our present purpose is, to invite you to name a day when the debt we rejoice in owing to you, may in part be paid.

Philip Hone, C. W. Lawrence,
Edward Curtis, Charles King,
Thaddeus Phelps, Jacob P. Giraud,
J. W. Webb, Charles A. Davis,
Augustus Fleming,

New York, April 1, 1839.

SIR: Your friends and fellow citizens of New York have learned, with unfeigned gratification, the result of your truly glorious efforts to avert in a manner equally honorable to both parties, occurrences, which menaced a collision, that would have been depreciated by the whole civilized world, between two great nations connected by every tie that can bind together kindred people.

What you have accomplished in the recent pacification on our eastern frontier is, however, sir, only what a knowledge of your previous career could not have failed to induce us to anticipate. As the hero of Chippewa, your name has been, for more than a quarter of a century, familiar to the whole American people, and is, in the minds of the rising generation, associated with the most memorable events of their country's history; while in the various contests, which it has been your duty to carry on against savage foes, we have ever found the same talent and energy to applaud, which were so conspicuous when employed against the veterans of Europe.

But, it a general, who wins laurels on the field of battle, in the vindication of a nation's honor, be entitled to our grateful recollections, how much more deserving of them must he be, by whose wisdom and wisdom the necessity of a recourse to arms is averted! Without again advertising to transactions now present to the minds of all, in you we recognize the republican commander who though an ardent supporter of the institutions of his own country, when entrusted with the neutrality of the Canadian frontier, not only knew how to preserve and maintain the majesty of our own laws, but too well understood the duties which one nation owes to another, to foment, for the propagation of political principles, a civil war among the subjects of a neighboring and friendly power.

As a testimony of our respect and esteem, and with a view of exchanging congratulations on the most important event, to which you have recently so happily contributed, we would invite you to partake of a public dinner, in this city on such day as it may comport with your convenience.

*Head quarters, eastern division,
Washington, April 6, 1839.*

GENTLEMEN: I have had the honor to receive your two notes, which I beg permission to consider as one

—the sentiments, and many of the signers be common to both—inviting me in terms as felicitous as they are partial and flattering, to a public dinner in the city of New York, in testimony of the estimation in which you are pleased to hold my long labors in the service of a country that is equally dear to us all.

Among you, I have the happiness to recognise my an old and kind friend, and not an individual I should not be proud to make one. If, I find myself compelled to decline the high honor tendered by such persons, on the part of the city of the new world, I trust you will do me the justice to believe it is from no want of reciprocal consideration and esteem.

Those sentiments are deeply impressed on my heart. But my position as a soldier, bound by peculiar ties and duties to country and government—necessity of continuing itinerant, I know not long, and the danger of seeming to seek, in violation of military property, such honors—all have recommended me to accept no public entertainment whatever.

In the sentiments expressed, I have the honor gentlemen, to subscribe myself, your grateful devoted servant,
WINFIELD SCOTT

THE COAL MINE EXPLOSION.

The following additional particulars respecting this fearful disaster are furnished in the Richmond Compiler of the 21st ultimo.

The Black Horse mine, worked by the "B. H. coal company," is one of the richest and extensive in this country. It is twelve miles from Richmond in nearly a western direction, and is situated in the midst of bituminous coal fields of known extent. The shaft from which the explosion of Monday took place has not long been sunk, and we believe is the deepest in the union, but more than seven hundred feet to its bottom. It contains ten million bushels of coal had been explored in the pit reached by it; and none can be procured how much more a further exploration would discover.

The steam engines and apparatus for hoisting from this shaft were excellent, and the system facility with which the hoisting process was conducted, produced an average of about two thousand five hundred bushels of coal per day. It is regretted that these operations have been interrupted—throwing so much weight in the scale of productions, and adding continually to increase capital and commercial strength as they diminish. The regret is added to by the afflictive event which has caused the interruption. However, the intelligent and active men who are superintending the mine say that it will be reclaimed in a short time.

The explosion was one of a most violent nature. How it happened there is no telling. But it occurred from neglect or disregard of positive orders and regulations of the pit is beyond all doubt. The drifts and "air coasts" (passages for the steam chamber to chamber) were so arranged, that they kept up constant ventilation. It is the opinion that one of the doors of the "air coast" must have been closed, and that thus the "inflammable gas" accumulated on Sunday to such a extent as to produce the explosion soon after laborers entered the pit on Monday morning.

Hamphrey Dyer's safety lamp was regularly blown up that morning. It was commonly estimated to test the presence of the gas. It has been out of order; if a slight rent should be in its wire gauze covering it would readily ignite the gas. Other lamps were used; and these may have been taken into a chamber or where the safety lamp had not been presented. Other of these causes would involve careless-ness. The density and inflammability of the gas have caused the wire to have become oxidated, fall to pieces; but that could not have occurred after indication by flame inside the gauze, of a gas in the face of which it would have been made in the laborers to remain. Whatever may have been the immediate cause, the arrangement of rules of the pit drawn from the lights of such an experience in mining, were such as to have secured safety if properly attended. But would be well, in order to diminish the chances of danger from even carelessness itself, to use Davy's exclusively, in all pits where there has been an exhibition of carburetted hydrogen or "inflammable gas."

One of the superintendents of the operation in the pit, who was below when the explosion took place, was a man of great skill in his profession, having been many years engaged in it in some of the most famous of the English mines. He was a Scotchman, named John B. Ward. It is hard to account for how he would have permitted the cause of the explosion, but even in the midst of an effort to correct the omission or neglect of Saturday night, the explosion may have taken place.

Mr. John Hancock, a native of Chesterfield, of respectable family, was the other unfortunate superintendent.

The laborers were all colored men. The superintendents above the shafts say that about forty were below. They cannot speak with certainty. Many had gone to see their wives at distant plantations, and it was not known how many had returned. Those who had not to do appear from terror at the news of the explosion; but forty is the maximum.

The explosion was so powerful as to blow pieces of timber out of the shaft to a distance of a hundred yards from it. Three men were blown up in a coal hamper from it. Two of them fell out of the hamper in different directions and were immediately killed; the third remained in it, and fell with it, escaping most miraculously with his life, having both legs broken. He is now doing very well. Much loose coal was blown from the drifts to the bottom of the shaft, and four of the bodies, as we have already stated, were taken from beneath a large bulk there in a mutilated state. Four were taken out shortly after the explosion on Monday, one of whom died. The others are in a fair way to recover.

Every exertion has been made, which could be made consistently with safety, to rescue the unfortunate beings. It appeared, upon going down the shaft, much carbonic acid gas (the product of combustion) was present in the air. This is called at the mines "chick damp," and though not inflammable, is destructive to human life. This, then, had first to be dispersed. The partitions, too, in the shaft, necessary for the ingress and egress of air in the pit, were much torn to pieces by the explosion, and had to be repaired as the shaft was descended, or death would have resulted to those who went down.

These explosions were formerly common in the north of England. One occurred at the Felling colliery in Northumberland, England, on the 25th May, 1842, in which ninety-two lives were lost. This is the greatest destruction ever known from the same cause. In 1815 an explosion occurred in a mine at Durham, in which fifty-seven persons were destroyed, and in another year two were killed in the same manner. The discoveries of sir Humphrey Davy and other contributors to science and benefactors of mankind have since rendered the avoidance of these destructive explosions certain.

In our mines no explosion of any extent has ever occurred from the ignition of inflammable gas. Such are as certainly to be guarded against as the bursting of steam boilers. The safeguards in each are as simple as effective.

Let the unfortunate event which has just occurred be a lesson and warning, as we are sure it will be, and, if possible, cause a more constant and rigid observance of the rules which science and experience have pointed out as the sure and unerring guarantees of safety.

the collector and naval officer. And here all Mr. Swartwout's accounts, except his bond accounts, appear to have been examined, with their proper vouchers, and certified by the auditor. But the auditor's certificate covered the bond accounts as well as the other charges, although not in fact examined. His certificate, with the vouchers, except those relating to bond accounts, was transmitted to the first comptroller; but there was a constant neglect to transmit the vouchers of the bond account therewith, as positively required by law. It is in these bond accounts, thus neglected, and in regard to which the law and treasury instructions have at all times been most specific, requiring examination, with vouchers, that the frauds upon the revenue by Swartwout were committed. No account appears to have been returned to the first auditor by the comptroller, because the vouchers of the bond accounts of Swartwout were not transmitted with the auditor's certificate thereon.

It is to this culpable disregard of law and neglect of duty in the office of the auditor that is attributable to the escape of Swartwout's fraud and defalcation from detection.

The same neglect in this most important branch of Swartwout's account appears to have prevailed in the auditor's office since 1832. It then originated in the dis-use of the records required by positive instructions, as well as from the nature of the examination of accounts that is required by law of the auditor. This feature in the administration of this office is exhibited in the following examination:

Answers of Mr. Underwood, a principal clerk in the office.

Examined by Mr. Foster.

Question 20. Were not the accounts, abstracts and vouchers, or other papers which were before you at the time you made those examinations and statements, such as are usually before you in your examinations and statements when "upon the same class of duties"?

Answer. They were.

Question 21. In that examination and statement did you not bestow the same care and attention as you have at other times bestowed "upon the same class of duties"?

Answer. I did, except that, in relation to the bond account, I made no examination whatever.

Question 22. What were your reasons why you did not examine the bond account, at the same time that you examined the other accounts?

Answer. As "the bonds taken in New York were recorded in the first auditor's office only to the 2d quarter of 1834, while those paid or put in suit are marked off in the 4th quarter of 1832," it was utterly impracticable for me to make such an examination of the bond accounts for the 3d and 4th quarters of 1837 as would test their accuracy. As soon as the account of the customs was received at the office of the first auditor, the bond accounts were handed in to the clerk, whose duty it was to enter and mark off the bonds; and they remain to this day.

Question 23. Did you, on that examination and statement, discover any defalcation on the part of Mr. Swartwout?

Answer. I did not.

Examined by Mr. Smith.

Question 41. Is it true, or is it not true, that the examination by the first auditor of the treasury, prescribed by law, of Mr. Swartwout's quarterly accounts of bonds taken and bonds paid, as returned to the treasury department, has been entirely omitted since 1832; and is it true, or not true, that this omission to examine said accounts is the sole reason why Swartwout's defalcations on paid bonds have escaped detection at the treasury department until after he left his office?

Answer. The bond accounts of New York have not been examined, it is believed, in the office of the first auditor, since the 4th quarter of 1832. Had said accounts been thoroughly examined as soon as received at the office of the first auditor, the defalcation in regard to the bonds must, in my opinion, have been discovered before the expiration of Mr. Swartwout's term. Whether the omission to make such examination be the sole reason why his defalcation on said bonds was not so discovered, I do not know.

Question 42. Do you know, from your acquaintance with the nature of said accounts, and your experience in the auditor's office, any other reason for Swartwout's successful concealment of his defalcations, than the omission to examine his accounts thoroughly "at the auditor's office"? Please state also for what period you have been connected with said office as an accountant upon custom house returns?

Answer. I do not know, as regards the returns of Mr. Swartwout to the first auditor, any reason why his defalcations were not discovered sooner, other than the omission to examine his bond account promptly and thoroughly at the first auditor's office.

It is apparent to the committee, from the examination and testimony, that the first auditor himself has never, until very recently, made himself acquainted with the internal organization and duties of his office, or the system of checks instituted under treasury regulations for it. Of course, if the chief in the office is either negligent or ignorant of the duties devolved by law upon him, or negligent because ignorant of the modes instituted and in force through prior years of executing those duties, the subordinates of the office may find ample opportunity for indulging in any degree of negligence in their vocations; to the imminent hazard of the whole revenue of the nation, and its consequent loss in unmeasured and unknown masses. In answer 9 he says: "When I came into office, on the 1st of November, 1836, the recording of the abstracts of bonds taken in New York was then, as far back as some time in 1833, and the checking off was back somewhere in 1832. I was a considerable time in office before my attention was drawn to these bond registers; and, at first, I only regarded them as records for the purpose of reference when occasion might require, and did not understand that they were intended to check the collector in his quarterly returns. At what time I did become acquainted with the object for which they were instituted, I cannot recollect; and perhaps even then I did not fully estimate the importance of having them brought up. The manner in which they had been kept, and the little importance that seemed to have been attached to them by my predecessor, had certainly lessened their importance in my estimation. I however did direct another clerk, whom I had employed in recording the reports on the collectors' accounts, to devote any time he had to spare from his recording the reports, to recording bonds, which he did until other business required his attention. But, I deem it proper to say, that, if I had been fully aware of the use of these registers at the moment I came into office, and had put a clerk his whole time to recording and checking off the New York bond account, he would not have been able to have brought it up so as to have discovered the error in Swartwout's bond account of 1837, much, if any, before the time it was discovered. Indeed, it is doubtful, in my mind, whether one clerk could have brought them up by that time. If, however, the recording of the bonds had not been required by the former practice, and original abstracts had been used for checking off the bonds paid and put in suit, by which means this examination, if it had been kept up from the commencement, could have been made in time to accompany the report on the quarterly accounts, it would have been discovered in the auditor's office, somewhere about the 1st of September, 1837, that Mr. Swartwout had failed to account for a large amount of bonds that had fallen due in the 1st quarter of that year; and this discovery, it is presumed, would, as a matter of course, have led to inquiry; but, in the condition in which the bonds then were, in regard to the right of extension, the collector might have deceived the department for a time."

It has been made manifest to the committee, in their investigation, that a recurrence to the records of either the comptroller's office or of the first auditor's office, by either of the incumbents of these offices, would readily have instructed them in the importance of the bond register, which has been thus culpably neglected. It would have been found that the very occurrence which has now happened, though in a degree not in like manner so alarming to the public mind as the latter, gave rise to the institution of the necessary means to prevent its repetition in all future time, while the offices should be in the hands of these accounting officers. The following examination of the comptroller places this position beyond cavil, and leaves as well the auditor as the comptroller without apology for any neglect of duty in relation to the bond accounts of collectors.

Examined by Mr. Smith.

Question 21. Please examine the following extract, and say if it be a true copy from a circular of the first comptroller to "collectors, naval officers and surveyors" dated August 5, 1822; and if yes, state when, if ever, its requirements have been modified or repealed:

"Frequent calls being made by congress on the officers of the treasury for information respecting duty bonds outstanding, duty bonds in suit, &c., and anticipating that similar calls will continue to be made at subsequent sessions, it has been concluded, in order to facilitate their discharge, as also to be in possession of more precise information from time to time, of the existing state of all custom

SWARTWOUT DEFALCATIONS.

Report of the committee of investigation, chosen by ballot, by the house of representatives, January 17 and 18, 1839, on the subject of the defalcations of Samuel Swartwout and others, and the correctness of the returns of collectors and receivers of the public money; also, the report of the minority of the committee.

CAUSE 3. Culpable disregard of law and neglect of official duty, by the first auditor of the treasury.

The duties of the first auditor are prescribed in the 5th section of the act of September 2, 1789, "to establish the treasury department," and the act of March 3, 1817, "to provide for the prompt settlement of public accounts," and are as follows:

"It shall be the duty of the first auditor to receive all accounts accruing in the treasury department, and, after examination, to certify the balance, and transmit the accounts, with the vouchers and certificates, to the first comptroller, for his decision thereon."

The present auditor came into his office November 1, 1836.

The accounts of Mr. Swartwout up to December 31, 1837, appear to have been regularly transmitted to his office, pursuant to the treasury circular of March 1, 1830, for examination and settlement. The law contemplates this examination to be a thorough check upon the errors, if any exist, of both house bonds, to keep a register at the treasury of all such bonds, so that any information in relation to them, on those points which may hereafter be required, can be given by this department, without recurring in the first instance, as heretofore, to the collectors of the customs.

"To make this register complete, it will be necessary to obtain from the several collectors lists of the bonds which have been taken in their districts, respectively, and which may remain due and unpaid on the 30th September next.

"These lists you are requested to furnish, accordingly, with as little delay after that day as practicable, observing the accompanying forms.

"The usual quarter-yearly bond accounts, which are to be rendered for the quarter ending the 30th proximo, and thereafter, will contain all the information which may be necessary to keep the register alluded to, provided care be taken by the collectors that a specification be always made at the end of each bond account, showing what part of the balance of bonds outstanding consists in bonds not due, and what part in bonds out in suit.

"Having reason to believe that by this arrangement, the collectors will be saved a great deal of trouble and labor hereafter, it is hoped that every exertion will be made that the lists now required be as perfect as possible."

Answer. I have examined the above "extract," and find it to be a true copy from a circular of the first comptroller to collectors, naval officers and surveyors, dated August 5, 1822—a part of the records of the comptroller's office. Its requirements have never been repealed, nor essentially modified.

The contemplated "register" of bonds was to be kept in the auditor's office, as will appear from the annexed copy (marked A) of a paper on file in the comptroller's office, dated 27th October, 1830, signed by R. Harrison, late auditor.

In the year 1822, it was discovered that some collectors of the customs had been in the practice of making false returns to the treasury, by retaining or containing in their account books as outstanding, which had been actually paid; thereby increasing the balance of their quarterly accounts in bonds, and diminishing in the same proportion that of cash on hand. With a view to the possession of means to check and prevent such practice thereafter, it was, on a conference between the accounting officers and Mr. Secretary Crawford, (and I think at my suggestion), arranged that a register should be kept in the auditor's office, of all bonds then existing, as well as of those to be subsequently taken and discharged in the several collection districts.

In pursuance of this arrangement, the collectors were required by a circular of the comptroller, dated August 5, 1822, to make out and forward a full and complete list of all bonds which should remain unpaid in their respective districts on the 30th of September following. As these lists came in, they were entered in the appropriate registers; and the same course has obtained with respect to those since periodically received with the quarterly returns of the collectors.

This arrangement was deemed the more necessary, in consequence of the loss of accounts by the destruction of the treasury building in the year 1814; and it is believed to have effected, besides, the saving of much money to the United States.

R. HARRISON.

Auditor's office, October 27, 1830.

Answer continued. The comptroller's office had been for many years in the practice of receiving the public accounts which ought properly, and according to law, to have been sent by the officers direct to the auditor. On the 1st March, 1830, this erroneous practice was corrected by circular instructions from the comptroller's office, (a copy of which is annexed, marked B); and since that time the public accounts have been received by the auditor.

B.

[CIRCULAR.]

Treasury department,
Comptroller's office, March 1, 1830.

SIR: It has been the practice, since the commencement of the government, originating, it is presumed, in a treasury regulation, for all officers whose accounts were to be settled in this department to render them to this office.

The reason of this practice cannot be well accounted for, because the fifth section of the act of 21 September, 1789, to establish the treasury department, directs that it shall be the duty of the auditor (there being but one auditor at that time) "to receive all public accounts, and, after examination, to certify the balance, and transmit the accounts, with the vouchers and certificate, to the comptroller, by his decision thereon;" and the 4th section of the act of 3d March, 1817, to provide for the prompt settlement of public accounts, directs "that it shall be the duty of the first auditor to receive all accounts accruing in the treasury department, and, after examination, to pursue the same course with that required in the first mentioned act."

The practice which thus obtained, being in operation at the time I came into office, was acquiesced in, and has been continued ever since; but the great accumulation of the business of this office induced an investigation to ascertain whether it could not be relieved from some part of its weight, the laws referred to being brought into view, it was, upon a consultation with the secretary of the treasury, concluded to be the correct construction, that, according to their requirements, all accounts to be reported upon by the first auditor should be transmitted directly to him. This course you will be pleased to adopt in future, commencing with your returns for the first quarter of the present year; to which an exception is to be made in relation to the annual accounts of emoluments and expenditures of the collectors, naval officers and surveyors, required by the second section of the congressional act of 2d March, 1799, the form of which is enjoined to the collector from this department to those officers, under date of the 25th August, 1823.

These accounts are, as heretofore, to be transmitted to this office, for the object stated in the section referred to.

It is deemed proper, on this occasion, to inform you, in order that you may not misdirect your accounts and returns, that Richard Harrison, esq., is the first auditor of the treasury. Respectfully,

JOS. ANDERSON, comptroller.

Answer continued. The term "this department," as it occurs in the extract from the circular of August 5, 1822, is always used by the comptroller in reference to the treasury department, generally, of which the comptroller's office is frequently the medium of conveying instructions or collecting information. When the comptroller's office proper is meant, the term used by the comptroller in his communications is "this office."

The frauds practiced by Mr. Swartwout, in regard to his cash balances and bonds in his weekly returns to the secretary of the treasury, furnish no apology for the neglect of the examining auditor or comptroller; because it is not upon these weekly returns that these officers settle the collector's quarterly accounts. In fact, these officers never see such returns. This fact is deduced, though in somewhat an attenuated form, from the following examination of the auditor himself:

Examined by Mr. Smith.

Question 25. If the secretary of the treasury is not the accounting officer of the treasury to adjust and settle the collectors' accounts, how did this accountant find him, in Mr. Swartwout's weekly cash returns, as described in your last answer, of any cash items with which he had debited himself in his quarterly accounts, in any degree enable Mr. Swartwout to become a defaulter for such cash items?

Answer. I understand there are weekly returns made to the secretary of the amount of cash received by the collector, and of payments made by him, exhibiting the balance on hand. Hence, it will readily be perceived that, although the collector may debit himself correctly in his quarterly accounts with every thing with which he is chargeable, yet, if he fails to charge himself in his cash account with the whole amount of cash received, and to return the true amount in his weekly returns, he may stand truly charged, on his quarterly accounts, with the whole amount for which he is weekly returns. It will not appear as cash on hand in his weekly returns. It was in this way, as I understand, that a very large amount of Swartwout's defalcation was concealed from the view of the secretary of the treasury; and this kind of deception might be practised to a considerable extent, as long as the collector is continued in office, unless it could be discovered from a comparison of the other returns made to the secretary, or by a comparison with the quarterly returns made to the auditor.

Question 26. In your first answer to my interrogatory, you say Mr. Swartwout's own accounts, up to March 28, 1833, as rendered to the treasury department, required no new debit to include against him all moneys for which he was in fact indebted to the United States, either as "innonee duties," "forfeitures," "treasury warrants," "office expenses," or "cash to be refunded to merchants."

In your second answer you say that, notwithstanding his whole indebtedness, that he stands to appear in his quarterly accounts, I failed to render an account of said items as cash in his weekly returns to the secretary of the treasury, and thus kept their amount out of the view of the secretary as

Will you now state, if the secretary of the treasury be not the accounting officer of the treasury to adjust and settle collectors' quarterly accounts, how did any such deception by Swartwout, as you have described as made in his weekly cash returns to the secretary, enable him to become a defaulter for said items with the accounting officers, inasmuch as the amount of said items appeared in his quarterly accounts that were returned to such accounting officers?

Answer. The failure to return the true amount of money received by the collector to the secretary of the treasury, in the weekly returns, does not affect the amount of the quarterly accounts. The quarterly accounts which exhibit the true state of his accounts up to the end of the quarter, notwithstanding his weekly returns made to the secretary may be false. And if the weekly returns made were true, and did not contain a true account of the moneys he had actually received, he would be in default on his quarterly account at the close of the quarter.

It is, then, in every way established, that to the neglect of the accounting officers of the treasury department, equally as to Swartwout's own infidelity, the loss of the public money, by Swartwout's defalcations, has occurred.

The following examinations will still further elucidate this position.

Mr. Fleming examined by Mr. Wise.

Question 91. Were not vouchers for all debits and credits returned with weekly and quarterly accounts, as Mr. Swartwout's indebtedness at any time be ascertained on each item of "forfeitures," &c., from them?

Answer. Vouchers for all debits, and for all credits where vouchers were proper, were always returned with the quarterly accounts; and Mr. Swartwout's indebtedness at any time upon each item of "forfeitures," &c., could have been ascertained from them.

Mr. Fleming examined by Mr. Smith.

Question 97. If an examination had been made at the treasury department of the collectors' quarterly returns and the accompanying alphabetically marked explanatory abstracts and vouchers, would it not have been easily determined whether any of the cash items credited in such returns constituted a component part of the item of "cash retained," or a part of the item of suspended or unsettled accounts; and do or do not the explanatory abstracts and vouchers that accompanied each of Mr. Swartwout's quarterly returns contain full and explicit information to enable the examining officers at the treasury department to determine into what general item of the recapitulatory explanation at the foot of each quarterly return each particular item of credit had been entered?

Answer. To the entire interrogatory I answer yes.

Question 100. Had the treasury department at any time required information relative to the items of Mr. Swartwout's "unsettled and suspense accounts," as set forth in his quarterly returns, would not the manner in which he had accounted for said sum of $60,291 42 have appeared distinctly?

Answer. I think it would.

Question 101. Could the large sum of $80,769 53, described in your last answer, retained by Swartwout in 1836, have become a defalcation, if the treasury department had not lost sight of it in the examination of his accounts, inasmuch as you say in your last answer that it was retained "with the knowledge of the treasury?"

Answer. It could not.

But no call for explanation was ever made upon Mr. Swartwout by any of the accounting officers. The subjoined testimony establishes this fact.

Mr. Fleming examined by Mr. Smith.

Question 99. Was Mr. Swartwout, at any time within your knowledge, required by the treasury department to explain or furnish a bill of the items owing from, from time to time, he reported his balances due the government under the general head of "amount of unsettled and suspense accounts?"

Answer. Mr. Swartwout was, in my knowledge, since July, 1836, when I became auditor, required to explain or furnish any such items.

Mr. Underwood examined by Mr. Curtis.

Question 14. Do you know that any call was at any time made, prior to your visit to New York in November last, either by or under the direction of the auditor of the treasury, or any other treasury officer, for an explanation from Mr. Swartwout of the nature of the items embraced under the designations of "protests," "deposits for unascertained duties," "unsettled and suspense accounts?" If yes, state when and by whom such call was made.

Answer. I had heard that Mr. Swartwout retained a large sum to meet the payment of duties under "protests;" but I knew nothing of any proceedings instituted by any treasury officer in relation to said "protests," "deposits for unascertained duties," or "unsettled and suspense accounts," prior to my visit to New York in November last.

George Wood, clerk in comptroller's office, examined by Mr. Smith.

Question 5. Was any call, within your knowledge, ever made upon Mr. Swartwout, by the first comptroller of the treasury, to explain what items were contained in his suspense account, which has, from time to time, made a part of the aggregate of his quarterly account? If yes, state when such call was made.

Answer. I have no recollection of any such call.
Jesse Miller, first auditor, examined by Mr. Smith.

Question 31. Was any call, within your knowledge, made upon Mr. Swartwout at any time, from your department, before the expiration of his term of office, to explain what items were contained in his suspense account as debited to himself uniformly in his quarterly account? If yes, when was such call made.

Answer. I know of no such call prior to the time alluded to, but have understood that there was some investigation in relation to these accounts at the time Swartwout's last nomination was before the senate. In the settlement of his quarterly accounts, after giving him credit for such payments, as he produced vouchers for, and the bonds, the balance, I believe, has generally, if not always, in the statement and report, been designated as cash on hand.

Question 32. Was the letter marked "M," and dated August 13, 1839, contained in house document 13, p. 105, the only letter sent from your office calling upon Mr. Swartwout for a rendition of his last quarterly account? If no, please annex a copy of all that preceded or succeeded said letter on the subject.

Answer. I believe it was. It is the only one found on record to him in relation to that account. When I stated, in my answer to some other interrogatory, that he had been repeatedly called on, I had reference to the calls from the comptroller's office as well as my own.

J. N. Barker, first comptroller, examined by Mr. Smith.

Question 10. Was any call, within your knowledge, made upon Mr. Swartwout, at any time before the expiration of his term of office, to explain what items were contained in his suspense account, as debited to himself, uniformly, in his quarterly account? If yes, state when such call was made.

Answer. There was no such call made within my knowledge.

Without ever calling upon the collector for explanation, the entire defalcation of Swartwout upon his bond account might have been detected by due diligence in the office of the auditor, had there been a comparison made of the accounts retained in the auditor's office. This appears from the following testimony:

Mr. Miller, first auditor, examined by Mr. Smith.

Question 25. Does or did not each of Mr. Swartwout's quarterly returns of bonds specify the names of the parties to each bond, its date, its amount, and when it becomes due; also, the names of the parties to each bond that has been paid, its date, and amount.

Answer. I believe they do; but the abstract of bonds returned as paid within the quarters when his bond defalcations occurred, could not have contained a description of those bonds on which he had received the money and omitted to return "paid."

Question 29. By a comparison at the treasury department of the collector's quarterly returns for any quarter of bonds paid within each quarter, with his preceding quarterly return of bonds payable in that quarter, is not the examining officer enabled to detect any omission to account for the bonds becoming due in such last quarter.

Answer. I answer the above interrogatory in the affirmative; and I refer to my letter to the secretary of the treasury, (contained in document No. 13), and to my answer to interrogatory No. 9, put by Mr. Curtis as explanation.

Question 30. Has any such comparison as is referred to in your last answer been made in the office of the first auditor, of the bond account of Samuel Swartwout, collector, to ascertain if he had accounted for bonds previously returned by him as falling due, been made in said auditor's office for some years past? If no, state to what period the omission extends back.

Answer. The recording of the bonds taken was as far back as about the first January, 1832, when I came into office, and are now only brought up to the second quarter of 1834; and the bonds paid and put in suit are not marked off later than the 4th quarter of 1832; consequently, the bond abstracts in the quarters in which the bond defalcations occurred were not checked off or compared.

Mr. Fleming examined by Mr. Smith.

Question 65. Do or do not the weekly returns of Mr. Swartwout's cash account to the treasury department cover and embrace, in the shape of cash, all the elements of his quarterly returns?

Answer. They do, except the accounts of official emoluments, and certain accounts which may be payable under appropriations of congress; these are kept distinct, and distinct returns are made of them.

Question 66. By reference to and comparison at the treasury department, of the collector's weekly report of cash received on bonds in any week, with the collector's previous quarterly returns of bonds becoming due in such week, is not the examining officer enabled at once to detect any deficiency in that item of the collector's weekly cash return?

Answer. If the quarterly accounts of bonds becoming due were subdivided at the treasury, into sums exhibiting each week's payments, the examining officer would be enabled to detect any deficiency, by comparing such sums with the weekly returns.

Mr. Fleming examined by Mr. Wagener.

Question 44. Question 4 states, upon the quarterly accounts rendered by Mr. Swartwout, would not an examination of them and a striking of the balance, have shown the true amount due from Mr. Swartwout at any time; your answer is, it would.

From the confused state of Mr. Swartwout's accounts, the time of payment of bonds extended, and the large amount to be examined, could his accounts of the treasury department have been examined correctly and satisfactorily until the final close of his accounts; and until then, could the true amount due from Mr. Swartwout have been ascertained? I wish you particularly to testify to the present case.

Answer. If the bond accounts had been thoroughly and promptly examined in the first auditor's office, the deficiency in the bonds payable in the first quarter, 1837, must have been discovered before Mr. Swartwout's term of office expired; but whether he could have concealed the real facts of the case from the department, by a reference to the embarrassment and the confusion in his office arising from the non payment and extension of bonds, until the close of his term, I do not know: I rather am of opinion that he could not.

From the preceding testimony, the committee report the following facts as established:

1st. That the first auditor of the treasury has been guilty of culpable disregard of law and neglect of duty in examining and certifying the correctness of the accounts of the late collector at New York, without having compared them thoroughly with the vouchers accompanying the same; and also in transmitting said accounts to the first comptroller certified for revision, while the most important vouchers therefor were retained in his own office.

2d. That no fraud practised by the said collector, in his weekly returns of cash to the secretary of the treasury, could affect the just and true settlement of the quarterly accounts of said collector at the auditor's office, as said weekly returns form no part of the basis of the settlement of said quarterly accounts by the auditor, and therefore furnish no apology for the neglect of the auditor to examine the same thoroughly.

3d. That without the aid of the register of bond accounts of collectors, required by law and treasury circular to be kept by the auditor to enable him to detect frauds and defalcations, if any exist, the said auditor could have thoroughly examined said Swartwout's quarterly account during any quarter since said auditor has been in office, inasmuch as the original quarterly accounts were retained against law in his office, and furnished the same means of a comparison as a register could have furnished.

4th. That in the culpable disregard of law and neglect of duty as aforesaid, by said auditor, is found a primary cause why the immense defalcations of said Swartwout in 1837, and subsequently, escaped early detection, and have resulted in the probable loss of a large amount of the public treasury.

CASE 4. Culpable disregard of law and neglect of official duty by the late and present first comptrollers of the treasury.

The functions of the first comptroller of the treasury are prescribed in the act of March 3d, 1817, "to provide for the prompt settlement of public accounts," as follows:

"That it shall be the duty of the first comptroller to examine all accounts settled by the first and fifth registers, and certify the balances arising thereon to the register; to countersign all warrants drawn by the secretary of the treasury, which shall be warranted by law; to report to the secretary the official forms to be issued in the different offices for collecting the public revenue, and the manner and form of stating the accounts of the several persons employed therein; he shall, also, superintend the preservation of the public accounts subject to his revision, and provide for the regular payment of all moneys which may be collected."

By a treasury circular issued by the comptroller March 1, 1830, (see journal of committee) all returns of accounts of collectors of the customs were required to be made, in the first instance, to the first auditor of the treasury. Previously, they were sent direct to the first comptroller, and from his office forwarded to the first auditor. As has been seen in a previous division of this report, the law imposes upon the first auditor the duty of examining these accounts, certifying the balance, and then transmitting them, "with the vouchers and certificates, to the first comptroller for his decision thereon."

Although the provisions of law and the duty of the first comptroller are thus explicit, requiring him to examine the accounts of collectors and certify the balance thereon, and to do this upon "vouchers" required by law and treasury regulations to be transmitted to him by the first auditor, the evidence taken by the committee shows that, in regard to Mr. Swartwout's accounts of bonds taken and paid, both this law has been wholly disregarded, and this duty wholly neglected, by the late and the present comptrollers from the year 1832 down to the period of the discovery of Mr. Swartwout's immense defalcations, in November, 1838; and that, for this whole period, these accounts have not only passed the auditor's office without an examination of the vouchers required by law, but have also been certified by, and transmitted from the comptroller to the register, without his seeing or having a voucher for them. During the whole period mentioned, the vouchers transmitted by the collector have lain dead, useless and untouched in the auditor's office. It is in the "bond account" that a major part of Mr. Swartwout's immense defalcation has occurred. The following testimony from Mr. Underwood, clerk, in the auditor's office, establishes the main fact:

Mr. Underwood re-examined by Mr. Smith.

Question 40. Referring to the act of congress passed March 3, 1817, entitled "an act to provide for the prompt settlement of public accounts," section 4, which provides as follows:

"That it shall be the duty of the first auditor to receive all accounts accruing in the treasury department, and, after examination, to certify the balance, and transmit the amounts, with the vouchers and certificates, to the comptroller, for his decision thereon."

Please to state whether, in pursuance of said law, Mr. Swartwout's quarterly accounts of bonds taken and paid have been transmitted from the first auditor to the treasury to the comptroller of the treasury, with the first auditor's certificate thereon, at any time or for any period between the fourth quarter of 1832 and the present time? And if yes, when, and to what extent has it been done?

Answer. They have not, but still remain in the first auditor's office.

It was the obvious duty of the comptroller, on receiving accounts from the auditor's office unaccompanied by legal vouchers, to return them to the auditor, and withhold his certificate until the accounts had been properly examined there, and proper vouchers transmitted with them. Had this been done by either the present comptroller, who succeeded to the office March 5, 1838, and had the adjustment of Mr. Swartwout's accounts for the third and fourth quarters of 1837, as well as his last account, been made, or had the same been done by the present comptroller, George Wolf, esq., now collector of the customs at Philadelphia, who held the office from the summer of 1836 until Mr. Barker succeeded to it, Mr. Swartwout's defalcation could not have occurred. The absence of the vouchers could at once have been explained, and its fatal cause remedied.

But it is to be remarked, so inefficiently have the duties of the first comptroller's office been administered of late years, that no means in the shape of independent accounts or record transcripts have been kept in it, by which any test could be applied to the revenue returns of custom house officers, or to detect any fraud or unintentional errors in either the returns themselves or the settlement made of them in the auditor's office, if computation in the figures be excepted. The office, as administered, has been only in contemplation of law, and not in the execution of it, any check whatever upon either the first auditor or collectors. In a word, the certificate of the comptroller has been a fancy affair throughout; for years, though applied to transactions in which annually millions of dollars may be saved or lost to the treasury, according as it is efficiently or inefficiently applied. The examination and testimony of the present comptroller will elucidate and establish the representation here made.

Question 4. Has any register, or book of record, of the bond account of collectors, been kept at any time in the comptroller's office, showing the amount of each revenue bond taken by each collector, as reported in his quarterly returns of bonds, and showing also the date of each bond, the names of the principals in each, and when each was payable and each was paid? If yes, state to what period such register or book of record has been completed, in reference to bonds taken, as aforesaid, by the collector of the port of New York.

Answer. No such register, or book of record, of the bond account of collectors, as is referred to in this interrogatory, is now kept in the comptroller's office; nor do I know that such register, or book of record, has at any time been kept in that office.

Question 5. Without such book or register as is contemplated by the last interrogatory and your last answer, how is it practicable for your office to detect any deficit or defalcation which might occur in collector's accounts for any quarter, or bonds reported in a previous quarterly return as falling due in such subsequent quarter?

Answer. Such book or register is understood to be kept in the office of the first auditor, to whom the quarterly accounts of collectors are rendered; and however useful such additional check might be, if kept in the comptroller's office, it has not, heretofore been deemed necessary. The comptroller's duty is to revise the accounts as reported by the first auditor, and, finding them accurately stated, to certify the balances to the register.

Question 6. If the comptroller has no record or register by which he can check the accuracy of collectors' quarterly returns of bonds taken and paid, what record has said officer by which to check any errors or neglect of duty (other than relate to the mere addition of figures) which the auditor of the treasury may commit in relation to collectors' accounts? Is the revision of collectors' accounts in the comptroller's office confined wholly to such data as are furnished by the first auditor for the guide of the comptroller?

Answer. The comptroller is not enjoined by law or treasury regulation to keep any record such as is mentioned in this interrogatory. The revision of the collectors' accounts in the comptroller's office is limited to the data as furnished by the first auditor, with such reference to the laws or treasury authority, for the allowance of credit given to the collector, or charges against the United States, as may become necessary in the progress of the examination.

Question 7. Do you mean to be understood by the terms of your last answer, that if there are any errors or deficits in the details or items of the collectors' quarterly accounts, or omissions of the collector to charge himself with as much cash receipts as he should, and such a fact escapes detection in the auditor's office, the comptroller's office holds no check upon such accounts, independent of the auditor's office, by which to detect such errors, deficits or omissions?

Answer. Although errors of computation, in details or items of the collectors' quarterly accounts, may be corrected by the comptroller, he possesses no means of detecting any omission of the collector to charge himself with as much cash receipts as he should, or with any other items.

Question 8. In your 6th answer you say, "the comptroller is not enjoined by law or treasury regulation to keep any record such as is mentioned in" the 6th interrogatory to you, or a record by which the first comptroller can "check any errors or neglect of duty (other than relate to the mere addition of figures) which the auditor of the treasury may commit in relation to collectors' accounts."

By the 8th section of the act of March 3, 1817, of the laws of the United States, it is provided as follows:

"That it shall be the duty of the first comptroller to examine all accounts settled by the first and fifth auditors and certify the balances arising thereon to the register; to countersign all warrants drawn by the secretary of the treasury which shall be warranted by law; to report to the secretary the official forms to be issued in the different offices for collecting the public revenue, and the manner and form of stating the accounts of several persons employed therein; he shall also superintend the preservation of the public accounts subject to his revision, and provide for the regular payment of all moneys which may be collected."

Will you refer to the above quoted provision of law, and say whether it does not enjoin upon the comptroller the duty and power as fully to keep in his own office all useful and necessary forms of stating and keeping accounts, and records, and checks upon other accounting officers whose dolings are subjected to the revision of his office, as it does to require all useful and necessary forms, records and checks "in different offices for collecting the public revenue?" And if yes, was it or not competent and within his authority to have instituted, and to keep in his office, such a record and check as is mentioned in the 6th interrogatory above?

Answer. The law quoted in the last interrogatory does not, in my opinion, enjoin upon the comptroller the duty of keeping a record to check other accounting officers, of the description given in the interrogatory. But as the duty of the comptroller, under the law, is clearly to make a due and thorough examination of all accounts settled by the first and fifth auditors, before he certifies the balances arising thereon to the register, he would be bound by a sense of duty to keep such record if he thought it essential. No treasury regulation of the secretary or comptroller has heretofore directed the keeping of such records or checks in the comptroller's office, although, in my opinion, such record might be there kept, under existing laws, and by the authority of the comptroller.

But it has not been only in regard to Mr. Swartwout's accounts passing through the office of the first comptroller, that a signal disregard of law and neglect of duty have characterized the administration of that office; but, with seeming fatality, like disregard of law and neglect of every duty imposed by law upon that office with which Mr. Swartwout was required to come in contact, appears to have pervaded the first comptroller's department.

By the act of May 15, 1820, section 1, it is provided that the commissions of all officers employed in levying or collecting the public revenue shall be made out, and recorded in the treasury department, &c.

By the act of March 2, 1799, section 1, it is provided that each collector shall, within three months after he enters upon the execution of his office, give bond, with one or more sureties, to be approved by the comptroller of the treasury of the United States, and payable to the United States, with condition for the true and faithful discharge of the duties of his office according to law.

By the act of May 15, 1820, section 3, the president may, from time to time, as in his opinion the interests of the United States may require, regulate and increase the sums for which the bonds required or which may be required by the laws of the United States, to be given by the collector, naval officer, or collector of custom, &c.

It appears, in proof, that a record thus required by law has constituted a part of the internal organization of the first comptroller's office. Its importance would be obvious, independent of the positive requisition of law. It appears, also, in proof, that a blank bond for Mr. Swartwout's execution, with sureties, as required by law, to indemnify the government against his unfaithful discharge of duties, was transmitted to him, with a notice of his reappointment to office, on the 3d of May, 1834, by the first comptroller. But it is in proof that with that act all further attention in relation to Mr. Swartwout's bond, and to the record of it required by law, ceased, on the part of the comptroller, until an accident, in 1837, which owed its existence to a like neglect of law and duty by the comptroller in relation to another collector, betrayed the fact that Mr. Swartwout was, and had been from his reappointment, in office without having furnished any bond.

In house document, No. 69, being a report of the first comptroller to the secretary of the treasury, and transmitted to the house, in reply to a special call upon the secretary, the comptroller says: "I learn, from the gentlemen now having charge of this branch of the duties of this office, (to which he was assigned on the resignation of the clerk having had this desk in the year 1835), that the neglect of Mr. Swartwout to render this bond was accidentally discovered by him in January, 1837, in complying with your instructions of the 16th October, 1835, in which it is made the duty of the comptroller to advise the sureties on the bonds of collectors who neglect to render their quarterly accounts in due time."

George Wood, a clerk in the treasury department, was sworn as a witness.

Examined by Mr. Smith.

Question 1. What office do you hold in the treasury department; and how long have you been in said office?

Answer. I am a clerk of the comptroller's office; and my duties consist of correspondence with the officers of the customs relating to their accounts and bonds, &c. I was appointed in the office in 1832, and took charge of the duties now assigned me in the year 1835.

Question 3. Do you find on record in your office any statement or memorandum indicating that Mr.

Swartwout's bond had ever been forwarded to him for execution?

Answer. I did not at the time look in the record of correspondence to see if such a bond had been sent; but that it was duly sent is shown by the handwriting in the bond, which was written by my predecessor in this clerkship. This could be shown by a reference to the records.

Since writing the above, I find, by a reference to the records, that a letter was addressed to Mr. Swartwout on the 3d May, 1834, notifying him of his appointment, and sending to him a blank bond and oath, which he was instructed to transmit, when taken and executed, to the office, with the certificate of the district attorney touching the sufficiency of his sureties, for the approbation of the comptroller.

Question 4. Have you, or not, in the comptroller's office, a record-book to show what bonds have been sent in blank to collectors for execution; what bonds have been properly executed; and other particulars, to enable the office to check any neglect that may occur in a collector to transmit his official bond. If yes, please describe the character of the entries in such record, and whether any entry whatever was made therein respecting Mr. Swartwout's bond, until after your discovery of his remaining in office without bond, in 1837.

Answer. There is, in the office of the comptroller, a book which has this caption: "Record of official bonds received from the following officers;" which is ruled and headed as follows:

Name.	Office.	District.	Port.	Date of commission.	Bond when received.
-------	---------	-----------	-------	---------------------	---------------------

All commissions to collectors pass through the comptroller's office. On the reception of a commission from the office of the secretary of the treasury, a letter is addressed to the person appointed, notifying him of his appointment, enclosing to him a blank bond and oath of office; and an entry is then made in this record; and when the bond is received, the date of its receipt is entered. If no bond is received, within the time prescribed by law, he is written to, informing him that his bond was not received, and requesting its immediate transmission; if not received in a reasonable time thereafter, the secretary of the treasury is advised of the fact. On looking over this record, any failure to forward a bond is readily seen; but in the case of Samuel Swartwout, no entry of his appointment or of the receipt of his bond was made by my predecessor.

Question 2. In reference to what particular bond in January, 1837, did the compliance with the instructions of the secretary of the treasury, dated the 16th of October, 1835, accidentally lead to the discovery that Mr. Swartwout had neglected, from the time of his appointment, in 1834, until 1837, to render the bond required of him by law to be rendered, for the faithful discharge of his duties as collector? Please explain the circumstances of the discovery in detail.

Answer. On the 4th of January, 1837, the auditor addressed to the comptroller a letter, reporting that the accounts of the customs had not been received at his office for the third quarter of the year 1836, from the following collectors, viz: Duncan McDonald, collector at Edenport; Levi Fagin, collector at Plymouth; William H. Hunter, collector at Sandusky; and John Smith, surveyor at St. Louis. This letter was referred to me, to verify the sureties of said collectors of their neglect of duty, in compliance with the instructions of the secretary. On referring to the files for the bonds, I could not find the bond of William H. Hunter. This was the first case which had ever occurred to me of a bond mislaid or lost. I was thereupon induced to examine the files for the bonds of all the collectors in office, when Mr. Swartwout's neglect to render his bond was discovered. I immediately reported the fact to Mr. Laub, the chief clerk; and, at his suggestion, draughted the letter addressed to him by governor Wolf, dated the 9th of January, 1837. The next day (after the letter was sent) Mr. Swartwout came to Washington, and saw Mr. Laub, in my presence. He expressed his surprise that the bond had not been sent, and said he would, on his return, send his bond; which was received on the 23d of January, 1837.

The circumstances under which Mr. Swartwout availed himself of this neglect of the comptroller, are detailed in the following testimony:

Henry Ogden was sworn as a witness.

Examined by Mr. Curtis.

Question 1. Were you cashier of the custom house of New York during the whole term of Mr. Swartwout?

Answer. I was, during the whole term of his office

Question 2. Who were the sureties of Mr. Swartwout during the first term? I mean during the first four years he held the office of collector.

Answer. Caldwell, G. Colten, Henry Eckford, Silas E. Burrows, M. M. Quackenbos, Benjamin Birdsall, and Charles L. Livingston, were the sureties.

Question 3. State all you know concerning the execution, approval and delivery of the official bonds of Mr. Swartwout, both for his first, and also, for his second term of office.

Answer. The first bond was not considered as good and sufficient security by John Duer, esq., then the district attorney, until Mr. Burrows certified that he was worth fifty thousand dollars. It was then approved, and Mr. Swartwout entered upon his duties.

The second bond was executed by Charles L. Livingston, M. M. Quackenbos and Benjamin Birdsall. It had five or six seals to it, but no other person to my knowledge executed it. This bond remained in a trunk which contained all valuable papers, which was daily deposited in the bank after the closing of the office. The bond remained unexecuted until towards the close of 1836, and, as far as I can recollect, I handed it to Mr. Swartwout soon after or the commencement of 1837.

Question 4. Was the last-mentioned bond sent from the treasury department at Washington to New York to be executed, or was it prepared at N. York?

Answer. The last bond was transmitted from Washington to New York to be executed.

Question 5. When was this bond transmitted from Washington for execution?

Answer. Soon after the reappointment of Mr. Swartwout.

Question 6. State, if you know, why its execution and delivery was delayed so long?

Answer. The bond remained unexecuted because I declined asking the gentlemen who afterwards executed it to become security for Mr. Swartwout. Believing Mr. Swartwout to be indebted to the government, I refused to apply to those gentlemen, but urged upon Mr. Swartwout to pay up his deficiency by a sale of his property. Mr. Swartwout himself spoke to the gentlemen who became his securities, and they applied to me for the bond to execute. An elapse of six to nine months occurred between the signing of the first and the last person on the bond.

Question 7. How much did you consider Mr. Swartwout indebted to the government when you declined to ask gentlemen to sign the bond as sureties?

Answer. I considered Mr. Swartwout indebted to the government from thirty to fifty thousand dollars.

Question 8. When was it that you declined to ask gentlemen to sign the bond for the reason you have mentioned?

Answer. It was 1834, and after that year, that I declined asking the gentlemen. I held the bond about three years before I handed it to Mr. Swartwout to deliver to Mr. Price, the United States district attorney. It was then executed.

No palliation of such negligence has been seen or offered in any circumstance or proof that has come to the knowledge of the committee; and, indeed, it seems to be a case which, from its nature, admits of no palliation. It is, moreover, obvious that when Mr. Swartwout's bond was finally received, no comparison of it was instituted with his former one, or other information sought respecting it, beyond the certificate of the district attorney, to secure it to the approval of the comptroller. It is not difficult to suppose that the department felt inclined to compromise with an apparent insufficiency of the bond, rather than to excite an inquiry that would probably lead to an exposure of its own culpable negligence in regard to it. Had it, however, been compared with the former bond, it must have been discovered that, while on the former six sureties were given, on the latter only half that number had been furnished. One would suppose that such a comparison, in the exercise of due diligence, would have been instituted; and, if instituted, such a falling off of sureties would have called for explanation. Had explanation been sought, it is apparent that the three sureties actually furnished would not have been found entitled to the approval of the bond by the comptroller, as the bond was to serve as the whole reliance of the government for indemnity against a faithless discharge of duty by a collector through whose hands and under whose control nearly two-thirds of the whole revenue of the government must pass. The following additional testimony from Mr. Ogden warrants the conclusions thus drawn:

Examined by Mr. Wise.

Question 40. Were the three securities to the last bond of Mr. Swartwout equal in point of wealth and responsibility to the three who were their co-securities on his first bond; if not, what was the probable difference?

Answer. The sureties in the last bond, in point of wealth and responsibility, bore no comparison to the first. The only person of actual wealth on the last bond was Mr. Quackenbos, who was estimated, I believe, from fifty to seventy-five thousand dollars. Mr. Birdsall I never considered worth over $10,000; and Mr. Livingston has nothing. Those on the other bond were much more wealthy.

Mr. Eckford died worth nearly half a million of dollars. Mr. Burrows qualified upon signing the bond that he was worth $50,000. Mr. Colten when he died left but little, though at the time he executed the bond he was estimated over $30,000.

There is yet another feature of extraordinary disregard of the requirements of law and neglect of duty of still later date on the part of the comptroller towards Mr. Swartwout's accounts.

By the act of January 31, 1823, sec. 3, it is required that every officer or agent of the United States who shall receive public money, which he is not authorised to retain as salary, pay or emolument, shall render his accounts quarter-yearly to the proper accounting officers of the treasury, with vouchers necessary to the correct and prompt settlement thereof, within three months at least after the expiration of each successive quarter, if resident within the United States.

By the act of March 2, 1799, sec. 21, every collector, naval officer, &c., who shall refuse to render his accounts for settlement for the term of three months, after they have been required by the proper officer, is subject to fine, &c.

By act of March 3, 1795, sec. 3, it is provided that if any collector of the revenue, &c., who shall have received the public money before it has been paid into the treasury, shall fail to render his account or pay over the same in the manner or within the time required by law, it shall be the duty of the first comptroller to cause to be stated the account of such collector, &c., exhibiting truly the amount due to the United States, and certify the same to the agent [solicitor] of the treasury, who shall issue a warrant of distress against such delinquent officer and his sureties, &c.

It appears by the certificate of the comptroller (in committee journal) that the third quarter of Mr. Swartwout's account for 1837 was settled at the comptroller's office on the 8th of May, 1838, and a balance found due from him of $10,207,224 10, as follows:

Bonds not due	$7,216,207 91
Bonds in suit	2,196,264 62
Deposit bonds	45,551 73
Cash, including sundry items not to his credit	738,799 84
	$10,227,224 10

It appears that his fourth quarter for 1837 was adjusted at the treasury on the 21st June, 1838, and a balance found due the government of $9,678,934 56, as follows:

Bonds not due	$6,777,101 55
Deposit bonds	23 864 12
Bonds in suit	2,201,220 55
Cash on hand, including sundry items not yet to his credit	646,698 34
	$9,678,934 56

In the examination of Mr. Barker, (the comptroller), by Mr. Smith, he says, in reply to—Question 12. At what date did the time allowed by law for Mr. Swartwout to render his accounts to the first auditor, for his quarter ending March 28, 1838, expire?

Answer. The accounts were due on the 1st July, according to law. I am informed, in the first auditor's office, that the collector of the port of New York has, by a former secretary of the treasury, been allowed one or two weeks in addition, within which to render his accounts.

And, in examination by Mr. Foster, he says, in reply to—

Question 13. Did you, at any time previous to November last, inform the secretary of the treasury that Mr. Swartwout was a defaulter; or did you know or suspect that he was a defaulter, or that his accounts were fraudulently made out, until about the 1st of November last?

Answer. I knew, in April, 1832, that Mr. Swartwout held in his hands the sum of about $201,000, which he refused or neglected to pay. In no other particular was I acquainted with any default of Mr. Swartwout, until about the 1st of November last.

Question 19. Did not Mr. Swartwout claim that he was entitled to retain the $201,000 mentioned in your last answer, in order to enable him to pay in the claims which he alleges the merchants had against him as collector?

Answer. He did.

Question 20. Were you not aware that Mr. Swartwout was liable to refund money to merchants, in some instances, when the same had been received under protest; and when he explained the reason why he retained the $201,000, did you not suppose that that sum was all he had upon which the government had any claim; and had you any reason then to believe that he would not pay over to the treasury so much thereof as should remain, after repaying to the merchants the amount of their legal claims upon him?

Answer. I was aware that Mr. Swartwout might be liable to refund money to merchants, for duties paid on protest. I had not, at that time, any means of forming an opinion as to his intention or ability to pay over to the treasurer so much of the $201,000 referred to, as should remain after repaying to the merchants the amount of their legal claims upon him.

At the time the correspondence took place between the department and Mr. Swartwout, his accounts not being finally adjusted, I had no means of knowing or forming an opinion as to the sum which might eventually be due from him to the government.

The manner in which the fact stated in the above testimony came to the knowledge of the comptroller, in April, appears from the following correspondence:

Treasury department, April 16, 1838.

Sir: You will perceive, by the enclosed copy of a letter addressed to the department by Samuel Swartwout, esq. late collector of the district of New York, under date of the 13th instant, that he has in his hands a balance of public money amounting to $201,096 40, which he holds until his accounts shall have been adjusted.

I will thank you, therefore, to take all proper steps to have his accounts adjusted and settled at as early a period as may be practicable, and to have the balance not in dispute, or to cover what is in dispute, soon as ascertained and paid over. I am, &c.

LEVI WOODBURY,

Secretary of the treasury.

James N. Barker, comptroller of the treasury.

The letter from Mr. Swartwout to Mr. Woodbury (enclosed in the above letter) is as follows:

Custom house, New York, April 13, 1838.

Sir: Herewith you will receive the return of moneys received and paid at this office, for the last three days of my official term.

If you will observe there is a balance due the United States of $201,096 40. This sum I hold in deposit in bank to my order, subject to the settlement of my account, and the decision of sundry suits at law brought against me to recover duties wrongfully exacted, (as is alleged), and which are now pending in the courts.

On the adjustment of my accounts, the amount due to the government will be immediately paid.

I have the honor, &c.

SAMUEL SWARTWOUT, late colPr.

Hon. Levi Woodbury, secretary of the treasury.

The steps taken by Mr. Barker, on the receipt of the preceding letters, appears from the following letter:

Treasury department,

Comptroller's office, April 17, 1838.

Sir: I have the honor to enclose a copy of a letter received this day from the honorable secretary of the treasury, requesting an early settlement of the accounts of the late collector at New York.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

J. N. BARKER, comptroller.

Hon. Jesse Miller, first auditor of the treasury.

To Mr. Swartwout the comptroller wrote as follows:

Treasury department,

Comptroller's office, April 17, 1838.

Sir: In order to a compliance, on the part of the treasury, with a request contained in your letter of the 13th instant, for an early settlement of your accounts, you will please to transmit to the first auditor your accounts up to the date of the transfer of your books to your successor.

The accounts of the third quarter are in progress of revision in this office, and those of the fourth quarter, 1837, are now in hand in the office of the auditor. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. N. BARKER, comptroller.

Samuel Swartwout, esq. late collector, New York.

Another letter was received by the comptroller, as follows:

Treasury department, April 18, 1838.

Sir: Accompanying my letter of yesterday, urging an early adjustment of the accounts of Samuel Swartwout, esq. late collector of New York, I transmitted a copy of a letter from him, stating his reasons for retaining in his hands the large balance of public moneys mentioned. One reason he declared to be, with the view to await "the decision of sundry suits at law brought against me (him) to recover duties wrongfully exacted, as is alleged, and which are now pending in the courts."

To expedite matters in this case, I will thank you to call upon the solicitor of the treasury, to obtain from the district attorney in New York a list of the suits now pending against Mr. Swartwout, as late collector, together with the amount of money involved in each, and the probable termination of them. I am, &c.

L. WOODBURY.

Secretary of the treasury.

James N. Barker, esq. comptroller of the treasury. On the same day the comptroller forwarded the last preceding letter to the solicitor, endorsed as follows:

Respectfully referred to the solicitor of the treasury, who will be pleased, after addressing the attorney on the subject, to return this, and advise this office of the result of the inquiry.

J. N. BARKER.

Comptroller's office, April 13.

On the 23d of April, the comptroller was written the following additional letter by the secretary:

Secretary of the treasury, April 20, 1838.

Sir: I herewith refer to you a letter, and enclosures, just received from Samuel Swartwout, esq. late collector of the district of New York, and should be pleased to have a report upon the subject to which it alludes, so soon as you hear from the United States district attorney.

I would suggest that, as the collector is refunding duties imposed on certain articles of merchandise, which were paid under protest of the parties at the time, it consequently becomes proper that Mr. Swartwout should furnish Mr. Hoyt with money, out of the funds now in his hands, to meet payments in this class of cases, and should be so instructed. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

LEVI WOODBURY,

Secretary of the treasury.

James N. Barker, esq. comptroller, Washington. The letter thus enclosed by the secretary from Mr. Swartwout was as follows:

New York, April 21, 1838.

Sir: I have the honor to state, in reply to your letter of the 16th instant, that, although the balance in my hands appears to be very large, it will not be more than sufficient for the settlement of the outstanding claims upon me. I enclose a letter received yesterday from the district attorney, showing my individual liability for the judgments obtained against me. I received notice from Mr. Lord yesterday that he would issue execution against my furniture, unless I paid the amount of the several judgments forthwith. I paid, of course. The next court will pass upon twice as large an amount.

The notices of protest served upon me for duties paid and passed to the credit of the treasury are estimated at between $200,000 and $300,000, and the circuit court decided that the collector, being alone liable, ought not to pay the duties into the treasury. In addition to these immense liabilities, the settlement of damages, when the parties have paid full duties on damaged goods, which cannot be adjusted by the present collector, must take a large sum, and cannot all be brought in under three months. I hope, therefore, that you will not consider the present balance in my hands at all unreasonable. I am, &c.

SAMUEL SWARTWOUT.

Hon. Levi Woodbury, sec. treasury, Washington.

Upon the receipt of the foregoing, the comptroller addressed Mr. Swartwout as follows:

Treasury department,

Comptroller's office, April 21, 1838.

Sir: The secretary of the treasury has referred to me your letter of the 21st instant, explanatory of the large balance of public moneys retained in your hands.

Your successor having been instructed to refund duties on certain articles of merchandise imposed, and paid by the importers under protest at the time, it is necessary that you should furnish him with funds to meet the payments in this class of cases.

This direction is given at the instance of the secretary of the treasury. I am, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

J. N. BARKER, comptroller.

Samuel Swartwout, esq. late collector, New York. In reply to the comptroller's endorsement to the solicitor of the secretary's letter of the 18th of April, given in the preceding, the solicitor wrote to the comptroller as follows:

Office of the solicitor of the treasury, April 27, 1838.

Sir: I have had the honor to receive the letter of the secretary of the treasury to you, dated the 18th instant, and referred by you to this office.

I transmitted a copy of it to the attorney of the United States for the southern district of New York, and have a copy replied, dated 25th instant, of which I send a copy herewith.

On receiving the further report to which Mr. Price refers, it shall be communicated to you. Very respectfully, yours, &c.

H. D. GILPIN,

Solicitor of the treasury.

To J. N. Barker, esq. comptroller of the treasury. The letter thus enclosed by the solicitor is as follows:

United States district attorney's office, New York, April 25, 1838.

Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 19th instant, enclosing a copy of a letter addressed by the secretary of the treasury to James N. Barker, esq. comptroller, and by the latter gentleman communicated to your office, calling for a statement of suits now pending in this district against Samuel Swartwout, esq. late collector of the port of New York, to recover duties levied by him, which are alleged to have been wrongfully exacted, together "with the amount of money in each case, and the probable termination of them."

By reference to my register, I find that there are at present but two suits pending, undecided. One brought by Robert Deidericks, to recover the value of a package of goods sent to the public store for examination, and there lost or mislaid. In this case the damages are laid at $2,000, though the recovery will probably exceed half that sum. The plaintiff will certainly prevail.

In the other suit, Lee, Savage & Co. are plaintiffs, who claim to recover $138 80, being an excess of duties charged at 25 per cent. ad valorem, on a case of silk gloves, which they contend are free of duty.

At the term of the United States circuit court commencing on the first Monday of the present month, four judgments were recovered against Mr. Swartwout: three by John Charters, Alexander Charters, and Samuel M. Charters, and one by Aaron Thomson, John H. Austen, and Thomas Cochran; in the aggregate amounting to $5,561 63, yet unsatisfied; being for an excess of duties charged on certain linens, which were reported by the appraisers as having been died or colored, but were, on the trials, proved to have been known in commerce as unbleached linens.

I have in my possession 115 protests served on the late collector by various merchants in this city, against the payment of duties, giving him notice that they intend to commence suits to recover back the amount of duties thus paid. Not having sufficient data, I am unable to ascertain the amount of duties involved in those protests; nor can I anticipate with certainty what will be the result of suits that may be brought, of which the importers have given notice.

The protests to which I have referred present a great variety of questions, all relating to excess of duties; many claiming as high a return as 50 per cent; others a return of but small per centages; and others, again, a reduction of duties in various appraisements at the custom house, in reference to the questions presented by the protests, the amount of each claim can be readily ascertained. I will apply to the present collector for such statement, and transmit it to you upon my receipt thereof. It will, however, require several days to prepare such a document.

By the protests it appears that there are 660 packages of linens, blankets, silk, hosiery, worsted and other articles, on which a return of duty is claimed.

As the questions involved in many of the protests have been adjudicated, (as, for instance, the worsted, linens and silks), the importers will of course pursue their claims without delay. I am, &c.

W. M. H. PRICE, U. S. dist. attorney.

To Levi D. Gilpin, esq.

Solicitor of the treasury, Washington.

The next proceeding of the comptroller is to address Mr. Swartwout the following letter:

Treasury department,

Comptroller's office, April 26, 1838.

Sir: You are respectfully requested to render your accounts of the customs to the first auditor as early a period as may be practicable.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. N. BARKER, comptroller.

Samuel Swartwout, esq. late collector, New York. With the last letter ended all correspondence between the comptroller and the other departments of the treasury, as also between him and Mr. Swartwout, on the subject of either the $201,000 retained by him, or the settlement of his accounts generally. The man and his accounts seem, in fact, to have been lost sight of by the comptroller for that period for four succeeding months, and until he received the following letter from the first auditor:

Treasury department,

First auditor's office, August 31, 1838.

Sir: I deem it proper to report to you that the accounts of the customs for the district of New York, for the first quarter of the present year, have not been received at this office. I wrote to Samuel Swartwout, esq. late collector for that district, on the 13th instant, requesting him to forward said accounts so soon as practicable. Since then, I have received no communication from him on the subject. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. MILLER, first auditor.

James N. Barker, esq. comptroller of the treasury.

This admonition, in the course of three days, roused the animation of the comptroller's department to notify Mr. Swartwout's sureties as follows:

Treasury department,

First comptroller's office, September 3, 1838.

Sir: In compliance with a regulation of the secretary of the treasury, I have to notify you, as one of the sureties of Samuel Swartwout, late collector at New York, that he has not rendered his accounts of the customs for the quarter ending 31st March last.

Respectfully,

J. N. BARKER, comptroller.

Charles L. Livingston, esq. Benjamin Birdsall, esq., and M. M. Quackenbush, esq., city of New York.

But again the department fell into a dead slumber relative to Mr. Swartwout's accounts, from which it was not awakened until in the early part of November, over seven months after Mr. Swartwout had retired from office, and over four months after the return day of Mr. Swartwout's last quarter's account had expired without having been returned, and two months after his sureties had been notified of his neglect to return and settle his accounts.

From April until the 31st of August, a period of four months, Mr. Swartwout, though known to be holding a large amount of public money, and no longer an officer of government, was not disturbed by even a call from the comptroller to settle, or explain his neglect to settle his accounts.

Yet, on the adjustment of this collector's accounts in the mean time, viz: June 21, 1838, for the quarter preceding his last quarter, the comptroller knew the balance of bonds, cash, and unsettled accounts against him, the collector was nine millions six hundred thousand dollars and upwards.

On the 1st of July the comptroller knew, or should have known, but for extraordinary inattention and neglect of duty, that the time for rendering and settling Mr. Swartwout's accounts had expired; and that by the act of March 3, 1795, it had become his express duty to cause Swartwout's accounts to be stated, and to issue a warrant against him and his sureties.

But no steps were taken by him to even obtain any explanation or settlement of even the acknowledged balance of $201,000, which Swartwout had reported as in his hands unsettled. He had seen that, by all information from the district attorney at New York, obtained through the solicitor in April, only two suits were pending against Swartwout to offset his retention of the $201,000, and that in those suits the aggregate judgment would be less than $1,200. By the same letter of the district attorney, given in the preceding correspondence, and dated April 25, 1838, was also informed that "on an examination of the invoices and appraisements at the custom house, in reference to the questions presented by the protests, the amount of each claim can be readily ascertained," showing the precise aggregate for which Swartwout had any pretensions for retaining the $201,000; and yet no application was made at that early day, or after Swartwout's return day of accounts had silently expired, on the 1st of July, to obtain from the custom house invoices and appraisements, the most obviously essential information. Why so much active bustle was made on the part of the comptroller in April, through the auditor and through the solicitor; and why, after the results at that early day pointed to information which could "be readily ascertained" to solve all pretended doubts hanging over Mr. Swartwout's accounts then, of a sudden all exertions ceased and every effort was paralyzed, to remain so until the last day of August, and then to be renewed in the faintness of a spiritless form of notifying Swartwout's sureties, is to the committee inexplicable, inasmuch that even the conclusion of culpable negligence seems scarcely to represent correctly the whole truth. Even the secretary of the treasury appears to have felt sensible of the comptroller's neglect of law and duty. In answer to question 33 by Mr. Curtis, the secretary says:

"Answer. I considered, as before remarked, according to my own impressions, that the comptroller might, under all the circumstances, be justified in a 'short delay.' By that I supposed it would be a delay long enough to get the further information, previously mentioned, from the district attorney, as to the mode of protests, &c., and to decide whether there was any legal reason for waiting any longer than the acts of congress point out, before bringing the collector's accounts to a final settlement, and to a collection of all not in controversy or doubt. On these points I supposed he would act according to his own sense of duty under the laws, and not expect any special instructions from the secretary, as none such are required by the laws. I had already given the general directions, or made the general request before mentioned; not because they were required by any acts of congress, or were usual to be given when collectors quit office, as it is the duty of the comptroller, in such cases, to proceed to make settlements, and require collections without such instructions; but I gave them for the reasons stated, in substance, in the monthly report, viz: that the amount on hand, as stated in the last return of the collector, appeared unexpectedly large; and the explanation given in respect to it by the collector alone did not seem to me entirely satisfactory without further inquiry into the subject by the comptroller.

"I took no further steps in relation to the subject myself, as the business belonged to different officers of the department: first, the accounting officers, to ascertain what was due; and then the solicitor, through the district attorney, to cause the balance to be secured and collected after the comptroller reported it to him in conformity to the existing laws.

"To say that there was absence of suspicion on the part of the comptroller in regard to Mr. Swartwout's accounts, appears to involve a most negligent and obvious disregard of every fact that transpired between April and November relative to those accounts. And, besides, want of suspicion or infidelity in the collector's accounts could furnish no excuse for a known neglect of the law requiring their return to the department. There must have been not only suspicion, but actual knowledge, by the comptroller, from the 1st of July onwards, that the law had been violated in the non-return for settlement of this important account. Even the newness of the comptroller in this office furnishes no apology in this respect as, to take the office of comptroller, he had just left the collectorship of Philadelphia, where the law must have been familiar to him, enjoying the return for settlement within three months of all collectors' accounts. In whatever light viewed, the case exhibits extraordinary inefficiency and neglect of duty, if not a mystery also, which the committee have been unable to solve. The law and duties of this important office have not been executed as the nation had reason to expect and believe they were; and the public money has consequently been unguarded and plundered with impunity.

In yet another aspect, the inefficiency of the comptroller's department, as at present administered, has been most singularly manifested.

A searching scrutiny was made by the comptroller and solicitor of the treasury, at New York, into the causes why Mr. Swartwout's defalcations escaped the immediate detection of the naval officer at New York. They found it to be attributable, in the first instance, to the want of a proper execution of the duties of that officer, and came to the conclusion that new instructions were necessary to render the office an efficient check upon the collector's accounts. Immediately thereafter, on the 10th of November, as soon as the comptroller had returned to Washington, he began to issue his new instructions, in the shape of circulars to the naval officer. First, as will appear by reference to the documents imbodyed in the testimony of Mr. Coe, deputy naval officer at New York, (committee's journal), the comptroller issued what was named by him "partial circular," dated November 10, 1833; on the same day another, which he denominated "circular." On the 15th of the same month he issued another, styled by him "circular to naval officers." On the 17th he issued another, called "supplemental circular to naval officers." On the 4th, and again on the 24th of December, as will also be seen, the naval officer wrote the comptroller, in effect, that his partial supplemental and other circulars were impracticable, and asked for explanations, &c. On the 27th the comptroller wrote, in reply, that "to-morrow's mail you will be furnished with instructions as to the manner in which you are to proceed," &c. And, accordingly, on the 26th of December another effort was made, under the caption of "circular to naval officers." Whether, in the mean time, any new light was shed or not by the naval officer upon the comptroller's administration of his office, in the shape of a new exposure of the impracticability and inapplicability of the latter document, does not appear of record. It appears, however, that on the 2d of January the comptroller wrote him a letter, in the nature of a suspension of the last circular, thus: "Before the arrangements are concluded for making the examinations as directed in my letter of the 26th ultimo, it is deemed necessary by the secretary of the treasury that you should make to the department some specific recommendation in regard to the rate of increase proposed to be made to the compensation of the respective clerks who are to be employed in the duty. You will please, therefore, furnish me with the requisite information."

On the 14th of January, the naval officer informs the comptroller, in regard to his new theory of discharging the duties of naval officer, imbodyed in his multiplicity of circulars, &c., as follows:

"I am of the opinion that it will require at least six of the clerks in the naval office to discharge their extra duties, while, at the same time, they will be expected to perform the ordinary duties which they have been and are now performing;" and proposes the sum of $2,000 additional compensation.

On the 7th February, in the examination of the deputy naval officer before the committee, with the preceding "partial circular," "circular," "circular to naval officers" of December 15, "supplemental circular to naval officers," and "circular to naval officers" of December 26, before the witness, he was interrogated by Mr. Smith, and answered as follows:

Question 6. Under the existing system of the naval office, is the naval officer enabled to determine, either what amount of bonds have been taken by the parties to said bonds, or in any quarter, or who are the parties to said bonds, or the dates of such bonds, or when they are payable, or when any such bonds are paid, or whether the collector does or does not account truly for bonds that have been paid?

Answer. In answer to the sixth interrogatory I have to state, that the naval office, under its existing system, is not enabled either to determine what amount of bonds have been taken by the collector for duties, in any quarter, or who are the parties to said bonds, or the dates of said bonds, or when they are payable, or when such bonds are paid, or whether the collector does or does not account truly for such bonds.

Such recorded specimens of inefficiency would seem to indicate that, whether the comptroller be attentive or negligent to the duties of his office, the government must remain equally exposed to the frauds and peculations of a dishonest collector at the port of New York. And yet the law of 1799, defining the records and checks upon the collector, which shall be kept in the naval office is so plain that the comptroller himself, when looking at the law, and apart from his own proposed mode of executing it, was constrained to say in his circular to naval officers under date of December 15, after reciting the language of the law: "Had the books designated above been kept, and the quarterly examinations and comparisons been duly made by the naval officer, it is scarcely possible the defalcations in the accounts of the late collector at New York (S. Swartwout) could have taken place, or so long escaped detection."

The committee believe that the house and country will alike readily discern the only proper remedy which such an exposure of facts and feebleness imperiously demands, as also the quarter whence it must proceed.

From the preceding evidence the committee report the following facts as established:

1st. That the late comptroller of the treasury, George Wolf, esq., now collector of the port of Philadelphia, was guilty, while in said office of comptroller, of culpable disregard of law and neglect of duty, both in regard to the bonds of collectors filed in his office, and the records thereof required by law; and in settling and certifying to the register the accounts of Samuel Swartwout, late collector, without having transmitted to him the vouchers therefor required by positive injunction of law.

2d. That the present comptroller of the treasury has been guilty of culpable disregard of law and neglect of duty, in settling and certifying to the register the quarterly accounts of Samuel Swartwout, collector, without having transmitted to him the vouchers therefor required by positive injunction of law.

3d. That said comptroller is also guilty of culpable disregard of law and neglect of duty: first, in not having sought and ascertained from the "invoices and appraisements" at the custom house at New York, either through the solicitor of the treasury or otherwise, the true amount of Swartwout's claim upon the $201,000 retained by him on going out of office, as suggested in the letter of the district attorney that was before him, dated April 25, 1833; secondly, in not causing the accounts of said Swartwout to be forthwith stated, or instituting measures therefor immediately on the neglect of said Swartwout to return and settle his accounts at the expiration of the time allowed him by law for that purpose, to wit, in the early part of July, 1833; thirdly, in continuing the same neglect, and to issue warrants of distress against said Swartwout and his sureties, from the 31st of August, 1833, which it appeared by the letter of the first auditor that said accounts still remained unsettled, until the month of November, when the detection of Swartwout's larger defalcations was communicated from New York.

4th. That the administration of said office is marked with such signal inefficiency, as well as neglect of duty, as to render nugatory many of the most important checks upon the first auditor, and collectors, receivers and disbursers of the public money, which the laws creating and regulating its duties contemplated, and have sufficiently provided.

5th. That, in said disregard of law and neglect of duty by the said comptroller, and inefficiency of the office as now administered, it is to be found a primary cause of the immense defalcations of the late collector at the port of New York, and consequent loss of the public money.

CAUSE 5. The discontinuance of the use of banks as depositories of the public moneys, and permitting the same to accumulate in the hands of Mr. Swartwout.

By the deposit act of 1836, as construed by the frequent practice of the secretary of the treasury, the secretary has been at no time precluded from the use of banks as special depositories of the public money, in preference to allowing the same to accumulate in the hands of the collector.

For instance, as appears by the testimony of the cashiers of the bank of America and of the Manhattan company, each of those banks was used as a special depository of the government for large sums during the period of their suspensions of specie payments. All banks might have been, in like manner, so used.

It appears, further, from the testimony of Mr. Woodbury, answer 38, that, during the suspension of specie payments, circulars were issued, "in substance," that, where no general deposit banks remained, that could be legally employed as such, the collecting officers might place the surplus of their funds, if increasing beyond certain specified amounts, not exceeding their official bonds, in some safe bank, in specie, to be drawn out again only on drafts of the treasury, placed on the collectors and receivers and payable to the bank.

Had the secretary of the treasury, instead of discontinuing the use of banks, and leaving it discretionary with the collector to deposit, or not, specially in bank, made it imperative on collectors and receivers thus to have used banks, the evidence, weekly, of the collectors' deposits in bank would have accompanied the collector's own return of the fact that the money was on hand, and had not been used. When, however, this species of check upon the collector was abandoned, the return of the collector alone was necessarily relied on; and, although it did state truly the amount of money collected, it would fail to be evidence of satisfactory character that it had not been diverted from public to private uses by the collector. The following testimony illustrates the evident loss of a portion of the public money to the government in the case of Mr. Swartwout, from the deception he was enabled to practise from week to week respecting the money actually on hand, by means of the power he had of retaining it in his own personal control, instead of depositing it in bank.

Mr. Fleming, auditor of customs, examined by Mr. Smith.

Question 111. Did you make out the weekly cash return of Mr. Swartwout to the secretary of the treasury, bringing the account up to March 28, 1838, as found in house document 13, p. 11, and showing a balance of money due on cash account of $201,000.40? Was said balance the true result and state of that branch of Mr. Swartwout's accounts? and did he, in truth, have on hand, within your knowledge, any such amount of money at the time said account was rendered?

Answer. The said weekly cash return was made out by me. The balance of $201,096.40 was the true result and state of that account, provided the cash book from which the data were derived was correct. Whether Mr. Swartwout had on hand that amount of money at the time the account was rendered, I am unable to state, having no knowledge of that portion of his business.

Question 112. Previous to the discontinuance of banks as general depositories of the government by the treasury department, were, or were not, certificates of the cashiers of the banks used as depositories required by the treasury department to accompany the weekly cash accounts rendered by Mr. Swartwout to said department, and as vouchers of the account, and that the moneys was, in fact, on hand? Since such discontinuance of the use of banks as depositories by the treasury department, has any species of voucher required to be furnished in connexion with the weekly returns of the collector, to prove that the money reported to be on hand was so in fact?

Answer. Previous to the discontinuance of banks by the treasury department, certificates from them were required to accompany the weekly returns, as vouchers for the transfer, and that the money was in bank.

Since such discontinuance, I know of no species of voucher required by the treasury department to be furnished in connexion with the weekly returns, to denote that the balance of money reported was, in fact, on hand.

It is, then, apparent that, had the depositing system of banks been continued, Mr. Swartwout could not have had money, beyond the collections of a single week, exceeding the current expuses of his office, to have retained on going out of office; and the evidence of his not having diverted any previous to that time, and that all previous collections were in bank, would have been regularly derived from the banks, as well as in Mr. Swartwout's official returns.

CAUSE 6. The negligence and failure of the secretary of the treasury to discharge his duty, as the head of the treasury department, charged by law with the superintendence of the collection of the revenue.

By the act of September 2, 1789, section 2, it is made the duty of the secretary of the treasury to digest and prepare plans for the improvement and management of the revenue, and for the support of public credit; to prepare and report estimates of the public revenue and public expeditures; to superintend the collection of the revenue; to decide on the forms of keeping and stating accounts, and making returns, &c.

By the act of May 8, 1792, section 6, it is provided that the secretary of the treasury shall direct the superintendence of the collection of the duties on impost and tonnage, as he shall judge best; and by section 9 of the same act, that the forms of keeping and rendering all public accounts whatsoever shall be prescribed by the department of the treasury."

By virtue of section 6 of the above recited act, it appears, in the following extract of a circular of the secretary, that from thenceforward the duties originally confided to the secretary were in part assigned to the comptroller, to wit:

"Circular to the collectors of the customs.

"Treasury department, October 23, 1792.

"Sir: Pursuant to the discretion vested in me by the 6th section of the act entitled 'an act making alterations in the treasury and war departments,' I have concluded to commit the immediate superintendence of the collection of the duties of imports and tonnage to the comptroller of the treasury.

"You will, therefore, henceforth correspond with that officer relatively to all matters arising out of the laws which respect the laying or collecting of those duties; and you will consider his communications and instructions, in regard to such matters, as of the same force and validity which they would have if coming from me.

"This, however, is not to be understood to comprehend the disposition and payment of the moneys accruing from those duties, which, as heretofore, will be under my immediate direction.

"Accordingly, all the returns and documents which you have been accustomed to transmit to the secretary of the treasury are hereafter to be transmitted to the comptroller, except the following: 1. Weekly return of moneys received and paid; 2. Monthly schedule of bonds; 3. Monthly abstract of bonds unpaid; 4. Paid drafts, and receipts for moneys paid to banks; and otherwise, under special directions from me."

Through all periods since 1792, as well as before, and from the first organization of the treasury department under the act of 1789, the weekly and monthly returns of collectors, expressly reserved to the secretary in the above circular, have been required to be made to the secretary, and have been so made.

Whatever may be the construction of modern days, of the use or utility of these returns to the secretary, it is, beyond dispute, an established fact, that they originated in the wise purpose of placing that officer in possession of a ready and constant check, and independent of all other departments, upon all officers employed to receive public moneys; and, also, upon the treasurer having the moneys in keeping after the same have been paid over by the former.

For a correct exponent of the purposes of these weekly and monthly returns, nearly concurrent with their origin, the committee have reverted to a report made to the house of representatives in January, 1831, by a committee appointed to inquire into the condition of the treasury department, and in which it is said "the actual amount of moneys in the custody of the treasurer may be at any time ascertained, independently of his own returns, by the statements which are constantly made and transmitted to the secretary by those who collect and receive public moneys into their custody in the different parts of the union."

The importance in which these returns were held in other days by the heads of the treasury department, may also be seen in the constant repetition of circulars issued to collectors and receivers of public money, enjoining particularly and punctuality in the transmission of them. The following may be taken as an example of the estimation of them that has prevailed from the days of Jefferson downward:

CIRCULAR.

Treasury department, August 20, 1801.

Sir: At the same time that the punctuality manifested by the greater number of the collectors is acknowledged with real satisfaction, the remissness discovered in others renders it incumbent on me to impress on the minds of all, the absolute necessity of conforming to those regulations which have been heretofore prescribed, either by law or by this department. Of those, a punctual transmission of accounts to the comptroller of the treasury for settlement, pursuant to the twenty-first section of the collection law, is deemed to be of the first importance; and the president has accordingly directed me to say, that a rigid adherence to the regulation of rendering each quarterly account, previously to the expiration of the next ensuing quarter, shall hereafter be considered as indispensably necessary.

The documents to be forwarded to this office particularly, and which you are requested to render with punctuality, are as follows:

A weekly return of moneys received and paid by you. On this it is necessary, on account of the forms observed by some of the collectors, to request: 1st. That the return should be made regularly the last day of the week, and should include only the whole of the receipts and payments for the entire week, the said last day included. 2. That it should regularly be transmitted by the mail next ensuing the day on which it is stated. 3d. That the moneys received for bonds paid on the week when they became due, for bonds paid after having been put in suit, for duties on merchandise paid at the time of importation, and for duties on tonnage, should respectively be distinguished from each other, and also from moneys received on any other account. 4th. That the payments made in the treasury, the payments for debentures falling due on the same days with the duties on the same parcel of merchandise, for debentures issued for drawback of duties already paid, for bounties on pickled fish and salted provisions, for drawback on the exportation of domestic distilled spirits, for allowances to fisheries, and for expenses attending the collection of the revenue, should also be respectively distinguished from each other, and from payments made on any other account. 5th. That the day on which payments are made in the treasury, either by remittances, payments of drafts, or payments in bank, should be respectively specified. 6th. That the moneys received from seamen as hospital money, or in the care of agents disbursed for the assistance of seamen, should not be included in the return. But the specifications here mentioned must not be construed to prevent or exclude any other more detailed return which may have heretofore been adopted by the collector.

A weekly return of debentures issued during the week for drawbacks, and of such entries made during the same week as will hereafter entitle the person making the same to either a drawback, bounty, or allowance for fisheries.

A weekly abstract of bonds put in suit during the week designating those paid, and not so during the week, at the end of the abstract the bonds put in suit at any time previous to the week to which the abstract refers, and which may have been paid during the said week.

A monthly schedule of liquidated bonds, and a quarterly return of the moneys received and paid by you on account of the marine hospital.

It is to be understood, however, that this letter is not intended to forbid the transmission of any other accounts or documents in pursuance of former instructions from this department, and particularly of those usually transmitted to the comptroller and to the register of the treasury.

It may be proper here to remind those collectors who pay into banks, that the public moneys ought not to be permitted to accumulate in their hands, and that those whose local situation renders it practicable should, at the end of every week, pay in the whole amount of the balance of the week, excepting only such sums as may be absolutely necessary to face the current disbursements of the ensuing week. It is, indeed, very seldom necessary to retain any money for that purpose, as the receipts of each week almost universally exceed the disbursements thereof; and the amount payable during the course of each may be always previously ascertained with great precision, except in relation to bounties; the payment of which depends, it is true, on a contingency, but the amount of which never can make any material difference in the estimate. The same principle should, as far as practicable, regulate the payments of those collectors who live at a distance from the bank in which they are directed to pay the amount of their receipts.

From the best view I have been able to take of the subject, it is my opinion that nothing is here requested from you which is not essentially necessary either for the security of the revenue, or for furnishing this department with important information; that nothing is requested which is not in your power to perform. Should you, however, apprehend any real and considerable difficulty in a strict compliance with every part of what is prescribed, your objections will be weighed with candor, and reasonable alterations introduced, so far as they may not derange the general system adopted, keeping this department constantly and regularly acquainted with every transaction which relates to the revenue.

Not doubting that your inclination will therein coincide with my own. I take this opportunity to invite you to communicate, from time to time, whatever your observations and experience may suggest, in relation to any defects, improvements, or evasions of the revenue laws. The effect of the present rate of duty on the importations and consumption of the several species of merchandise, as they may affect either revenue or commerce, and the efficacy of the present laws and establishments towards preventing frauds, equally injurious to the public and to the fair trader, are objects of primary importance, and on which your communications will be particularly acceptable.

I have the honor to be, with consideration, sir, your obedient servant.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Benjamin Lincoln, esq., collector, Boston.

"Every transaction," which related to the revenue was thereby constantly brought to the acquaintance of the secretary's department.

With a view to render these returns still more available in their important uses, by the secretary, as well as in a better state of preservation, they were, until lately, made a component part of the records of his department. All the cash transactions of the weekly returns were carefully selected, and condensed into a record divided into columns, and the character of which will be fully understood by the following examination of Mr. Young, chief clerk, at the present time, in the secretary's department.

Mr. Young examined by Mr. Curtis.

Question 4. You have, at my request, produced to the committee a large folio, having the inscription upon the back of it "weekly returns of receipts and payments of the collectors of the customs," 1831, 1832; treasury department. Is that book from the office of the secretary of the treasury? From what data is that book made up? When was the practice of making entries in that book discontinued? Will you please annex to your answer a portion of the last page written in that book, under the head of "New York, Samuel Swartwout," with copies of the last two entries, to show the character of the book?

Answer. The book referred to is from the office of the secretary of the treasury. It is made up from the returns made to him by collectors, of their receipts and expenditures. The entries therein, as I have understood from the clerk, who had charge of it, were discontinued in 1831.

The annexed paper, marked M. Y. No. 1, is a copy of part of the two last entries in the last page of this book, under the head of New York.

It will be perceived that the same testimony indicates that, since 1831, this species of important record has, from some cause, fallen into disuse in the secretary's department. And with the record, the elements of it appear also to have shared nearly the same fate, until "recent events" have roused them to a different destination. The following testimony of the same witness illustrates this fact:

Examined by Mr. Curtis.
 Question 5. Since the practice of making entries in the book of weekly returns of collectors has fallen into disuse, what disposition has been made of the original "weekly returns?" Have they been carefully preserved and bound together in books? Have they not, until the recent defalcation of Mr. Swartwout, been thrown aside as of no value; and has not search for their been lately made, and have they all been found?

Answer. Since the entries were discontinued in the book mentioned, the returns, after they were received, were referred to a clerk to be examined and filed. It was the duty of this clerk, if he should see any thing suspicious on the face of the return, to report it to the secretary or myself. After an accumulation of them for one or two years, they were removed from the files and put in a room where papers were placed, to which, it was supposed, no reference would be required. These returns have, as I believe, never been bound together since the burning of the treasury building, in 1833. I never considered them as of no value, but of very little consequence; yet, as they were of a character that, possibly, reference to them might be necessary, they were placed aside as stated.

In answering this interrogatory, the period embraced in my answer extends only as far back as September, 1833, when I first entered the department. The returns are now being arranged, and there are some yet missing; but all the bundles have not yet been examined.

As a part of the same system of securing to the secretary an independent superintendance of every transaction which relates to the revenue," instituted immediately upon the enactment of the law organizing the treasury department, another record, deduced from the monthly returns of collectors, has been kept in his department. The following examination of a clerk in the secretary's office will explain this in full:

Charles Dummer examined by Mr. Curtis.
 Question 1. Are you a clerk in the office of the secretary of the treasury, and when did you enter upon your duties as such clerk?

Answer. I am a clerk in the office of the secretary of the treasury, and entered upon my duties on the 7th January, 1837, as I now recollect.

Question 2. Is it a part of your duty as such clerk to take charge of a folio, denominated, by the gilt letters on the back of it, "custom house bonds?"

Answer. When I took charge of the duties which had been performed by Mr. Anthony, I found the entry from returns of bonds taken and liquidated by collectors among the duties which were attached to his desk; and I have, since I was appointed to the situation he held, entered such returns, as I received them, in the book marked "custom house bonds," and consider it a part of my duty; and it is the book I now have before the committee.

Question 3. By way of showing the nature of the book, and that there are two subdivisions, the one under the head of "general account of bonds taken and liquidated for duties on merchandise at the several custom houses," and the other, "account of bonds taken for duties on merchandise which fall due in the month of —, 183?" will you give copies of two pages of that book?

Answer. A gentleman of the committee, whom I afterwards understood to be Mr. Curtis, requested me, when I was first cited before them with the book marked "custom house bonds," to make a copy of two respective pages from said book; which I have done, and present them as a true copy of the pages marked by said gentleman to be copied from the book. These two pages embrace a transcript of the manner in which the book is kept under the heads of "general account of bonds taken and liquidated for duties on merchandise at the several custom houses," and an "account of bonds taken for duties on merchandise which fall due in the month of —, 182."

CHRONICLE.

Value of real estate. There was a sale of ten lots in this city yesterday, in action in the square on which the bank stands. The lots were about twenty-two feet front on Maine street. The highest brought five hundred dollars per foot, the lowest three hundred and forty dollars. [St. Louis Rep.]

Bonds and mortgages. The old Globe insurance company, at the time of the great fire in December, 1835, had in its possession bonds and mortgages to the amount of more than a million of dollars. Nothing could show more satisfactorily the safety of such investments, judiciously made, than the fact that every dollar of the aforesaid $1,000,000 and upwards has been realized by the company—principal, interest and costs. The company has thus been enabled to pay the assured $71 65 on every $100 lost. Its affairs are now completely wound up and settled.

A new company has, however, been formed, with the same name, and we believe under the same charter essentially—capital $500,000. It will go into operation immediately. [Gilbert Allen, esq. president.]

Steam. If the wild tribes of Lake Huron were to be told that the white man's recipe for conquering the waves of the great lake before them was to use up a very small portion of the fuel of six or seven years ago Dr. Johnson had been told as exhausted by a hard day's literary labor, he satrinating at his fire side waiting for his favorite beverage that the tiny volume of white smoke he was lessingly gazing at, as it issued from the spout of his black iron tea-kettle, was a power competent to rebuke the waves, and to set the tornado at defiance—the children of nature would listen to the intelligence with no greater astonishment than our venerable lexicographer would have received it.

[London Quarterly.]

Great Mobile. A destructive fire occurred at Mobile on the 31st March, which destroyed a large cotton warehouse, and several other buildings. About 1,000 bales of cotton were burnt, valued at $75,000, on which there was insurance of $50,000, and 320 bales of sugar, valued to the full value. The total loss is set down at $150,000. The fire was caused by an incendiary.

The silk culture in Connecticut. A silk convention was held at Hartford, Connecticut, April 3d. F. S. Constock, esq. of Wethersfield, president. It was resolved to form a state silk society, to solicit the legislature to protect mulberry trees from depredation, to publish an address to the citizens of Connecticut on the importance of the silk culture, to give attention to the raising of worms and manufacture of silk, as well as the culture of trees, to form county auxiliary societies, and institute premiums, &c. Many specimens of silk were presented, interesting addresses made, committees appointed to examine machinery, &c. After which the convention adjourned to meet at the same place the 2d Tuesday of May.

Connecticut (and especially Hartford), has been foremost in this great enterprise, now become national—nor does she intend to abandon it.

The Alexandria Gazette says that at the last term of the criminal court for that county, in the case of the United States vs. R. B. Randolph for an assault and battery on Andrew Jackson, late president of the United States, a nolle prosequi was entered by the district attorney, with the assent of the court.

The Philadelphia papers state that the companies engaged in transporting merchandise to the west have agreed to reduce the rates of freight to the following prices:

Dry goods, &c.	$2 25 per cwt.
Hardware,	2 00 "
Groceries,	1 50 "

The portable car body line of Messrs. O'Connor & Co. which went into operation last week, has opened the intercourse between Baltimore and the west by way of the Pennsylvania improvements; and when the tide water canal is opened, and the Susquehanna rail road extended to Wrightsville, both of which objects are now secured by the grants just made by Maryland, Baltimore will also have her transporting companies, and enjoy all the benefits to her trade connected with this operation. [Balt. American.]

More troops. The steamboat Ozark arrived here on Wednesday last from New Orleans with one hundred United States troops for Fort Gibson, under the command of captain Hart, of the U. S. Army.

The steamer Little Rock arrived on Thursday last with about the same number. She left on Friday for Fort Gibson. [Little Rock, Ark., March 25th.]

The Pittsburg papers state that the first iron steamboat in this country, of American iron is now building at the Washington works in that city, by Robinson & Mans. Her keel is 140 feet, deck 172 feet, 25 feet beam, and 6 feet hold; she is to measure over 230 tons, and will be finished by the 4th of July next.

The St. Petersburg papers state, that the population of the Russian empire at the end of 1835, since which time it appears no authentic account of it has been published, consisted of 53,123,353 persons, viz: 23,206,332 males, and 30,137,332 females. If this account be correct, and the circumstance of the females so much exceeding the males, is, we believe a solitary example in the world. Out of the above total number, the population of Poland amounted to 4,133,222; of Finland to 1,372,122; of the Trans Caucasian provinces to 1,373,316; and of the American possessions to 61,053.

Some modifications in the armament of the navy have recently been made by the admiral, whereby a proportion of bomb cannon is given to each vessel, as low down as the 23 gun frigates. The weight of metal in a broadside of a ship of 120 guns is now 2,023 lbs. The guns of the new patterns are ultimately to supercede the bored guns of the Congreve and Bloomfield patterns, but as there are a great many of these patterns to store, they are to be used as long as they last. The Congreve 24 pounder thus bored out is 7 1/2 feet long and 40 cwt; the Bloomfield 7 1/2 feet, 24 pounder is 41 cwt; and there is a Bloomfield 24 pounder of 8 feet, which has been bored out to the calibre of 32 pounds. There are also some 24 pounders of common pattern, of 7 and 9 feet length, of 43 cwt. and 50 cwt. respectively, which have been enlarged to the calibre of 32.

We extract the following from the Northern Bee of Saint Petersburg: "The average consumption of wood at this city is 150,000 cu of sleep 45,000; of calves 23,000; of pigs 20,000; of poultry 65,000, and of game 93,000. During last 10,000 cart loads of fish are consumed; and brandy to the value of 700,000 fr. and the favorite drink of the Russian peasantry, spirits distilled from grain, to 1,000,000 fr. During 1835, although the water was not severe, the consumption of fuel was 523,240 reves of wood, and 30,000 loads of charcoal. During the year no extensive robberies occurred; petty thefts amounted to 8,248 and of these the value of the property stolen in 6,000 cases did not exceed 100 fr. each.

Extraordinary performance. A locomotive, built by M. W. Baldwin, esq. of Philadelphia, drew a train of 45 cars freighted with 150 tons of nails and hoop iron staves, including an engine, and a load of 1,000 lbs. at a gross weight of 223 tons, from Reading to Bridgeport, at an average speed of 12 1/2 miles per hour. The quantity of wood consumed was 1 2-sins cords, which, allowing 2,000 pounds to the cord, is 2,600 lbs. or 11 lbs. 10 oz. per ton for the 40 miles, or 4 2/3 oz. per ton per mile.

The number of students at the university of Vienna for the present winter half-year is 2,620, of whom 232 study the law, 177 philosophy, 683 jurisprudence, the medicine and 466 surgery. The three colleges of the faculty are frequented by 1,634 pupils.

Death of Benjamin Pierce. The Nashua Gazette announces the death of an hon. Benjamin Pierce, a soldier of the revolution, and formerly the governor of New Hampshire.

Some idea may be formed of the taste for operatic entertainments in Paris, by the announcement of Robert le Diable for the one hundred and seventy-seventh time—no wonder when the orchestra is composed of one hundred and twenty finished solo players, and every thing else belonging to the establishment on a doubly great and perfect scale. [Nat. Gaz.]

Virginia banks. An act has recently passed the legislature of Virginia, which allows the banks of that state to increase their capital, and relieves them from the penalties incurred by the late suspension of specie payments. The bank of Virginia is allowed to increase its capital $600,000, and the Farmers' bank of Virginia $735,000, a portion of which is to augment the capital of the bank of the state. The latter is authorized to increase its capital $150,000. The Exchange bank is authorized to increase its capital $200,000, provided a branch is established at Falmouth.

The Eastern rail road company (from Boston to Salem) has declared a dividend of five per cent., being the profits of the first seven months since the opening of this road.

Large cargoes. The Natchez Free Trader of the 30th ult. publishes the following:

"The ship Talleyrand, which cleared at this port yesterday for Liverpool, had on board two thousand one hundred and sixty bags of cotton weighing eight hundred and eighty-one thousand and six hundred pounds—the largest cargo ever taken from Natchez. The cotton is valued at one million two hundred and ninety-six thousand dollars, and the freight amounts to fourteen thousand nine hundred and sixty dollars.

"The ship St. Charles, which started for New York, Franklin, which left port on the 25th instant, and on board one thousand eight hundred and eighty-six bales of cotton, weighing seven hundred and ninety-nine thousand nine hundred and ninety-one pounds, and worth one million one hundred and eleven thousand nine hundred and ninety-eight dollars.

The ship Lelia sunk off Tanner's creek, a few days since. She was a new ship and belonged to Alexander Brown and Sons, of Baltimore. Her cargo was estimated at from five to seven hundred thousand dollars, consisting principally of dry goods and hardware. Nearly all was insured.

Extraordinary recital. The overland route from Europe to India, requires a line of native Hindostan or estafettes, between Calcutta and Bombay. They go with the fleetness of the antelope through morass and mountain, ravine and jungle. But the number is almost limited by the smallness of the animals, and the encounter, and who, singling out his victim, seizes and devours him, while the rest of the party continue in Indian life to pursue their route, looking to this event as one to be expected in so serious an expedition. Frequently the leather bag containing the letters has been sent after and obtained, when a courier has been missing from the cause above stated.

Western rivers. The Pittsburg Advocate of Saturday, the 20th ult. says that the creaser in the Ohio for some days past, had been warm and dry, and delightful for every kind of business; but it was affecting the rivers. There was yet, however, 6 3/4 feet in the channel, and no danger of scarcity for some weeks yet. The steamboat business was still very active.

The steamboat Kio arrived at St. Louis on the 29th ult. from Orleans, and reports the Upper Mississippi low, only two feet and a half water on the Rapids.

Wabash river. The Disseminator, published at New Harmony, Ia., of the 23th of March, says the "Wabash river is nearly bankfull. Since our last, the steamboat Rover has passed down, and the Jim Brown, Shylock, Native, Rover and Tide, arrived and gone up the river. Hitherto but a few trading boats have gone down the river. We expect the present high water will bring whole fleets of them in a few days."

The past winter. An observing correspondent of the Boston Centinel says: "During the winter past, snow in small quantities has fallen on 18 different days, amounting in the whole to about two feet, less, probably, than was ever known to fall here in any winter before. In 1822 and '23, the quantity was judged to be 93 inches.

Relict of barbarism. The Quebec Gazette of the 1st April, chronicles the sentences passed at the criminal court of that city, on King's bench. Seven persons were sentenced to burnt at the head, and to undergo different terms of imprisonment. Of the seven, three were convicted on two indictments against each, and severally sentenced to be twice burnt on the hand.

Idleness of fashionable life. Obligated to pay attention to every foolish thing uttered and to all the idle compliments, paid and constantly to keep my mind on the rack, that I may not fall to introduce in my turn my jest or my tale. And this is called idleness! 'Tis the labor of a galley.

Tolerant! The Philadelphia U. S. Gazette of Tuesday, the following:

The New York papers of yesterday say:—"The Jews Synagogue at Philadelphia, was destroyed by fire on Saturday."

"Not all—not all. On Sunday morning the burning of some rubbish under the stairs in an old building, one floor of which is occupied by a Hebrew congregation, caused a monstrous snoker, but nothing more; and we hope for many years yet to hear our elder brethren on Friday evening raise their anthem in our neighborhood, unless they can find a better house—and on Wednesday to listen to the more modern strains of a Baptist society in the same house.

Launch. The United States sloop of war Deatur, of sixteen guns was launched in fine style at the navy yard, Brooklyn, last evening, at five o'clock. She edged gracefully into her destined element, and was greeted with a salute from the guns of the frigate Hudson, and "Hail Columbia" from her band. We rejoice to see the name of a man so justly dear to our country and navy, thus renewed in one of our noble ships of war. [New York American.]

The legislature of Massachusetts have passed an act which contains the following provisions:

Sec. 2. Whenever any property of the value of fifty dollars or more shall be destroyed, or be injured to that amount, by any persons to the number of twelve or more riotously, or tumultuously assembled, the city or town within which said property was situated shall be liable to indemnify the owner thereof to the amount of three fourths of the value of the property so destroyed, or the amount of such injury thereto, to be recovered in an action of the case, in any court proper to try the same: Provided, The owner of such property shall use all reasonable diligence to prevent its destruction or injury by such unlawful assembly, and to procure the conviction of the offenders.

Sec. 3. Any city or town which shall pay any sum under the provision of the proceedings section may recover the same against any or all of the persons who shall have destroyed or injured such property.

The U. S. frigate Macedonian, and sloop of war Erie, sailed from Pensacola on the 31st ult. for Tampico and Vera Cruz.

Buried alive. New Orleans, April 5. Yesterday, immediately after the remains of lieutenant Garnier were interred, the discourse of the numerous persons who had assembled to witness the ceremony, were preparing to return to their homes, their attention was attracted by the noise or groans of some person in distress, which appeared to come from a coffin that had just been deposited in the earth. It was immediately opened, and a young man, who had contained the body of a negro woman, who had fallen from a fall into a lethargic sleep and considered dead, but was awakened by the entrance of water into the coffin. She was taken out and brought to the city in fine spirits; and there is now every prospect of her recovery.

The new capital, or state house of North Carolina, at Raleigh, is described in the Raleigh Star as a superb building, of 160 feet high, 30 feet in height, built of granite, and surrounded with 30 feet of the same material, 5 1/2 feet in diameter, and 30 feet in height. The model is the classic Parthenon at Athens. There is a splendid dome and a great number of spacious apartments, besides the twogigleisive halls. Cost $500,000.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED, EVERY SATURDAY, BY WILLIAM OGDEN NILES, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE

The news by the Great Western, published in the present sheet, is quite pacific, and, with the improvement in the cotton market, has infused great spirit into the business of the Atlantic cities, and especially in the money market—which was much cramped by the impression that the boundary question might provoke a war. But it is evident that the public sentiment and the public policy of Great Britain are opposed to any belligerent movements—and that, discarding all considerations of its effects upon the trade of the country and the interests of individuals who own our stocks, the government will have enough to do to preserve peace at home—which is seriously menaced by the chartists and other disaffected persons in many sections of the kingdom.

A SPECIAL MESSENGER. It is stated in the New York papers that Mr. Kaye, who arrived in the Great Western, is bearer of despatches to the British minister in this city, and that they contain instructions to treat about the boundary question.

The New York Commercial Advertiser of Wednesday says: "We are enabled to state, on what we believe to be good authority, that such instructions have been transmitted to her Britannic majesty's minister at Washington, by the Great Western, as will obviate the necessity of sending a special minister to London. The seat of negotiations for the final adjustment of the boundary question is transferred from London to Washington; and these negotiations will be pressed to a definitive conclusion."

DEATH OF SENATOR TIPTON. By the Logansport Herald, Extra, of April 6th, we have news of the decease of general JOHN TIPTON, late a senator of the United States, from the state of Indiana. At the moment of apparent good health, he was attacked, on the night of the 4th instant, with what was called an apoplexy of the lungs, of which he expired on the afternoon of the day following.

General Tipton was a native of Tennessee, aged about 55, and had during his life rendered valuable service in different public stations.

CANADA FRONTIER, &c. The Franklin, St. Albans, Messenger, gives a detailed account of several arsons committed at Highgate, Alburgh, &c. The governor has forwarded 500 stand of arms from the arsenal at Vergennes, and authorised general Nason to call out as many of his brigade as he should deem necessary for the protection of this part of the frontier. About 150 men have been drafted and put on duty.

VOL. VI. SIG. 8.

A public meeting of the people has been held at Highgate, for the purpose of taking into consideration the state of affairs now existing on the frontier, and expressing their sentiments in relation thereto.

Among the resolves was one, "that this meeting views with deep regret the spirit of retaliation and revenge which is manifested by our neighbors north of latitude forty-five; and also by a portion of the Canadian refugees, who have fled to this country for protection, in the inhuman and unnatural practice of making use of the torch as an arbiter to decide their difficulties."

The Burlington Free Press of the 12th inst. states that the burnings on that frontier have been suspended for a few days past, and the gen. Nason, who has some three or four hundred men and arms at the line, it is said, has formed a temporary treaty of amity with the Tories at Mississquoi bay— they agreeing to restrain the brigands on the other side, provided the presses are silenced on this side.

The Sackett's Harbor Journal states that on the 7th inst. col. A. McDowell, sheriff of Midland district, U. C. arrived on board the British steamer "Commodore Barrie," from Kingston, with 22 of the Prescott prisoners, pardoned by the lieut. governor. Colonel McDowell sent for the magistrates of the village, and stated to them that he had been requested by his excellency to inform them of what he had done for these prisoners, and that he earnestly hoped it would have a happy effect in allaying the excitement which had led to so much trouble and distress to both governments; and that if it should have such a tendency, the remaining prisoners, in due time, would receive the benefit of it. The magistrates returned an appropriate reply to colouel McDowell, and the pardoned prisoners drew up and signed a paper declarative of their sense of the kindness with which they had been treated, and of their gratitude for their release.

FROM THE DISPUTED TERRITORY AND NEW BRUNSWICK. From the Boston Daily Advertiser and Patriot. The Frederickton Sentinel of the 6th instant says, on the authority of a person from the Aroostook, that the American militia were about to commence their march homeward, leaving the land agent with a party of about 200 men behind them. Two booms had been thrown across the river, for the purpose of preventing the passage of timber in the spring; but with what effect, the Sentinel remarks, remains to be proved.

We learn from the same paper, that the New Brunswick militia and voluntarily force, were to cease to receive pay and rations on the 10th inst., with the exception of one captain, one subaltern, two sergeants and thirty rank and file, to be stationed at Woodstock; one subaltern, two sergeants and thirty rank and file at Tobique and the mouth of the Restook, and a similar detachment at St. Andrews, for the protection of the queen's stores.

The head quarters and other companies of the 36th regiment, had returned to Frederickton, and they had been replaced by the 69th regiment, the head quarters of which were stationed at Woodstock. These two regiments are the only royal troops which remain in New Brunswick. The 11th regiment under col. Goldie, which has been ordered from Sorel in Canada to Madawaska, together with a detachment of royal artillery, was immediately ordered back to Quebec, where it is expected to arrive before the breaking up of the winter roads.

The first detachment of this regiment arrived at Quebec on the 7th inst., and it was to be followed in a day or two by the second. This is the third time this regiment has traversed the inhospitable regions between New Brunswick and Quebec, since the commencement of the winter.

FROM FLORIDA. The St. Augustine (Florida) News of the 30th ult. contains the following intelligence of the army in Florida.

Lieut. col. Harney, 2d dragoons, sailed for military posts south, on the 27th inst. Two Indians and a negro accompanied him, as guides and interpreter.

The 4th artillery is ordered north. The topographical survey of the military district, as contemplated by gen. Taylor, is rapidly progressing. A corporal attached to the command acting with capt. Mackey, T. C., was killed in the Etanaya Scrub, about a month since. The Indians escaped. Gen. Macomb has arrived at Black Creek. His object, it is stated, is to make a treaty with the Indians.

St. Augustine, April 4. We hear that the house of Mr. Rollins at the head of St. Mary's river, on the edge of the Okefenokee, and within about forty-five miles of Trader's hill, was attacked by the savages soon after the withdrawal of the militia from that district. The wife of Mr. Rollins was shot dead, and himself, made a fortunate and narrow escape.

Tallahassee, April 6. On Wednesday evening last, the dwelling of capt. James Scott, residing about two miles from Baileys mills in Jefferson county, was attacked by a party of 10 or 15 Indians. At the first fire, a Mrs. Ferrine, residing in the family was killed, a lad, nephew of col. Bailey, shot in the arm, and a negro woman dangerously wounded. Captain Scott and his overseer, Mr. Skipper, bravely defended the house, drove off the Indians, killing two of their number, and invited the remainder back by their whoops to renew the attack. They did not however return. A few such receptions as the intruders met with at capt. Scott's, would we think render them somewhat cautious in their future attacks. [Floridian.

FROM JAMAICA. Kingston papers to March 14th, like those of previous dates, give very unfavorable accounts of the working of the apprentice ship system. The Cornwall Chronicle contains the following rather mysterious paragraph relative to an American vessel:

"Information having been conveyed to the officers of the customs at Luca, that a brigantine had been seen at anchor in Bloody bay, (a small inlet to the windward of Negril), for several days, an officer was despatched on Monday to take charge of her, and she was accordingly brought into Luca on the following day, (Tuesday), and proved to be the brigantine Delight, from New Bedford, United States, out on a whaling voyage."

CHILI AND PERU. The united army of Chili and Peruvians are still in the north of Peru, and it is supposed would attack Santa Cruz in Lima. This capital is well supplied with flour at $12 per barrel. So far from Chili abandoning the enterprise against Santa Cruz, a reinforcement was shortly to be sent to Peru of 1,500 men and 600 horses.

NOVA SCOTIA. The two branches of the Nova Scotia legislature are at variance. The council has refused to agree to an appropriation of £1,000 for defraying the expenses of the delegates appointed by the assembly to proceed to England with a representation of the grievances of the province.

THE NEWS AND THE MONEY MARKET. The Journal of Commerce of Monday, 2 P. M. says:

There has as yet been no decisive action in the market since the news, but of course the cotton holders feel very much refreshed, and so do holders of stocks.

The Express of Monday, 2 P. M. says: The arrival of the Great Western has created a good deal of sensation in Wall street, and indeed in all the business parts of the city. The announcement that cotton had advanced about 14 pence from the 1st to the 23d March, and that the market was in a very firm state, together with the pacific character of the English press, caused great relief. The general impression was that the news was favorable and calculated to have a good effect here.

The Express of a later date says: The business omens in Europe are to us all auspicious. Corn is falling. Cotton is rising. American stocks stand pretty firm. Wall street smiles once more. The people who have been scared to death, wonder what has frightened them. It is indeed a glorious reflection that two nations of brothers—who is a common tongue, remember their lineage and cling to peace with an absolute horror of war.

The Journal of Commerce of Tuesday, 2 P. M. in allusion to the market on that day, says: Every thing is bright, though transactions are not numerous. Flour remains quiet as last week. Corn is higher; sales a 92 a 93c. bu.; rye 106c. The holders of cotton are firm in their demands, though there is not, so far, much buying. Money is more plenty, the banks discount more freely.

The Express of Tuesday says:

The cotton holders withdrew their lots and would not sell at Saturday's prices, not until they had time to look round. Capitalists and moneyed men felt much relieved. Stocks immediately went up from a half to 3 per cent, and there were very extensive sales made. The banks show a more speculative spirit, a greater buoyancy, and more extensive operations than we have witnessed for a long time. The effect of the news will be most beneficial, particularly to cotton buyers and cotton operators. Cotton had begun to drag. Exporters and consumers held off with an impression that holders were under such heavy acceptances, that they would be forced into market, and that a fall would be submitted to. There was also a difficulty experienced by holders in obtaining advances or raising money on cotton. That difficulty will now be removed; the rise on the other side will give confidence to capitalists, to make advances, and will induce exporters and consumers to come into market and make their purchases, as there will be no hope of any fall here. The south, however, will reap the great advantage. The great bulk of the crop in this country, as well as that which has gone forward, is for southern account. The result, therefore, will enable the south to pay their debt to the north, which will be acceptable to all.

One of the best signs in the English money market is the decline in the price of grain, and the probable diminution of any extraordinary demand upon the continent. It had been feared that very large importations would take place, and that very great amounts of bullion would be wanted in payment. This apprehension had a decided influence on the money market. The rise of breadstuffs was looked on in this country, although of partial benefit, yet as a great ease. Had the price got up very high, money would have become exceedingly scarce in England. The balance of trade would have been in favor of the continent, and gold would have been exported to a great extent; to counteract this a general contraction would have followed; a great scarcity of money would have taken place; American as well as British securities would have fallen; cotton must have declined, and the effect of this security would have been sensibly felt on this side of the water.

The change will be most favorable to all interests. Cotton has risen, and is probably destined to rise higher. The Americans being well paid for the raw material, can well afford to purchase British manufactures freely.

The great alarm that has been apprehended here has been from a fear that cotton would fall, and that confidence in American securities might be impaired. The news in relation to these two matters have been most acceptable—the one has advanced, and the other, although not so saleable, is well sustained. There is therefore no expectation that stock will come back to the United States. Those capitalists who had American securities pledged in London, will be enabled to make arrangements, so as not to be compelled to submit to a sacrifice.

Private letters state, and the newspaper accounts confirm the report, that Humphreys & Biddle have disposed of their entire stock of old cotton. The management of this house is spoken of in the highest praise: they have succeeded in holding this immense stock through a whole season of depression, and with a powerful combination against them, until at last they have closed the sales at high prices, to the great advantage of the American owners, and to the no small benefit of our common country. The affairs of the United States bank particularly, as regards its cotton operations, are spoken of in the leading money articles, greatly to the praise and commendation of Mr. Biddle.

Philadelphia stock and money market. The Herald of Wednesday says:

The transactions at the stock exchange yesterday were quite large, and in almost every instance at a fine advance on Monday's prices. This improvement was produced by the news brought by the Great Western, which is considered highly favorable to the monetary and commercial affairs of both countries, as well as to the continuance of that good feeling which has heretofore existed between them.

Money was a shade easier, but we have not yet had time to feel sensibly the effect which will be produced by the late news. If it should have the effect of restoring confidence, money will become abundant, and an advance in the price of stocks will be the natural consequence.

The following exhibit of the prices of stocks before and after the arrival of the Great Western indicates more pointedly than any other sign the general impression as to the pacific character of the advices brought by that vessel:

THE TIMES IN MISSISSIPPI. The Brandon Sentinel of the 27th ult. says—

We understand the Union bank intends to commence discounting on the first Thursday in April, and that she will issue at least three millions of post notes, and if the exigency seems to require it, the line of her discounts will be extended to two or three millions more. This course on the part of the bank, the only thing which can dissipate the clouds now hovering over our country, and it will no doubt have a very happy and healing influence. The resources of the institution are perfectly adequate to justify her in adopting this salutary course, and the fact that the faith of the state, as well as nearly all the valuable property in it, is pledged for the redemption of the notes, will we hope, prevent depreciation.

In the subject of the embarrassments existing in Mississippi, we find the following paragraph in the New Orleans Bulletin of the 6th instant:

Mississippi. Great distress is said to prevail in many counties of Mississippi. Extensive plantations are thrown out of cultivation, and lying waste for the want of hands to till them, the slaves having been seized under execution and carried off by the U. S. survey paper that comes from that quarter is filled with advertisements of negroes, lands, &c. to be sold in satisfaction of judgment. This state of things had created quite an excitement. Public meetings were about to be called, to take into consideration the distressing situation of the people. We are glad to learn, however, that a disposition everywhere prevails to respect the law. On this point the Mississippian remarks, that there is very little of the mob-law spirit in Mississippi, much as has been said abroad in relation to that subject. The people seem to be convinced that there has arrived a crisis in our affairs, when property to a certain extent must change hands—and that the sooner the change takes place the better for all parties. Such is the correct view of the subject. To attempt a resistance would be useless. It could result in no beneficial effect, and would destroy the reputation of those involved in it, as well as the character of the state. When the laws of the country cannot be executed, the credit, public faith and honor of that country are threatened with disastrous consequences. However unfortunate the present state of things may be, it becomes every good citizen not only to submit to the laws without opposition, but to lend his influence to prevent the course of justice from being impeded or thwarted.

RECIPROCAL INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS. We are happy to learn from the following message, transmitted to-day to both houses, by governor Seward, that the legislature of Pennsylvania invite, through a highly intelligent committee, the co-operation of our legislature in an effort to connect the canals of the two states at a point which will enable us to exchange New York salt and plaster for Pennsylvania coal.

Executive chamber, Albany, April 15, 1859.
To the legislature: At the recent session of the legislature of the state of Pennsylvania a committee was appointed by the honorable the senate of that commonwealth, with instructions to consult with the constituted authorities of this state, in order to ascertain their views in relation to a connection between the north branch division of the Pennsylvania canal and the Cheango canal, or the Chemung canal, or both of these canals in this state.

The honorable Charles B. Penrose, speaker of the senate of Pennsylvania, the honorable William Purviance and the honorable E. Kingsbury, junior, constitute the committee. I have received from those gentlemen a communication announcing their arrival in this city, and explaining the object of their attendance.

I submit this communication to the legislature, and respectfully recommend that such measures may be adopted in relation to the same as are required by a becoming county toward the enlightened and enterprising commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and toward the honorable body immediately represented by the committee, as well as by the impotence of the subject upon which they desire to consult with the constituted authorities of this state.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

NAVAL. Old Ironsides. The Norfolk Beacon of the 14th inst. says: "This noble and favorite ship got under way from the anchorage off the naval hospital on Wednesday morning last, at about five o'clock, and notwithstanding the wind was easterly, and she drew nearly 24 feet water, and the tide had fallen about twelve inches off Seawall point shoals, she glided gallantly along with nearly all sail set to the breeze, and at 2 P. M. the pilot left her 10 miles at sea, the wind from S. E.

Mr. Hicks, the pilot who conducted the Constitution to sea, says he never saw a ship perform more handsomely, that the wind was ahead off Old Point, and the ship had to beat out of the capes—that the officers and men were in high spirits at the ease and rapidly with which they got to sea from their anchorage off the naval hospital. Mr. Hicks left the ship ten miles out at sea on Wednesday at one o'clock. He thinks the Constitution is a fast sailer, and says she works very easily.

In the first time, we believe, that so heavy a ship as the Constitution passed directly from port to sea without a moment's delay in the road."

We learn from the Army and Navy Chronicle that a board is now setting in Washington, to devise and recommend plans and models for sea steam vessels of war, three of which were authorized to be built, or the materials procured, during the last session of congress.

The board is composed of naval and civil officers, and citizens, and is therefore a kind of mixed commission. It consists of, com. Stewart and capt. M. C. Perry, of the navy; S. Humphreys, esq. chief naval constructor, and Messrs. Hunt and Lenthall, naval constructors, Mr. Haswell, engineer of the U. S. steam ship Fulton, and William Keable, esq. one of the proprietors of the West Point foundry. The Philadelphia Times says: "The keel of a ship of war, to ratify articles of peace, is now being laid at the navy yard in that city; and that a steam ship is about to be erected in the large ship house of which the 'Pennsylvania' was once a noble tenant. A naval tender is likewise to be therein erected, though whether to be rigged sloop or brig-wire is not yet determined. Commodore Stewart will act as overseer of the whole. We congratulate our industrious mechanics, at the prospect of once more hearing the hammer of the workman within the walls of this national depot of our city."

The East India squadron, under the command of com. R. ad, arrived at Bombay, from Muscat on the 1st of November. Wilstn'r ad Muscat the Columbia was visited by the sultan's son, and the young prince, the lord high admiral of Arabia. At the same port, the Columbia lost two men by sickness, and had six men more on the sick list. It was also very sickly at Bombay. From Bombay the squadron proceeded to Colombo, Island of Ceylon, where it arrived on the 23d of November, and on the 30th an English man of war schooner, arrived from Point de Elle with a request from the American consul to the governor, Mackenzie, that an armed English vessel might be sent to the spot, not knowing that the American ships were there just in time to meet the demand. All hands immediately volunteered for the expedition, and on the 1st of December the squadron sailed for Qualla Battoo, and by this time the plunders of the Eclipse have received merited chastisement.

SOUTH AMERICA. Accounts from Buenos Ayres of the 26th of January state, that the blockade of that port was still rigorously continued by the French. No bombardment had taken place. Governor Rosas, in his opposition to the demands of France, was sustained by the unanimous approval of the legislature.

Fructoso Rivera, president of the oriental republic, had taken the field in the province of Entre Rios, against Don Manuel Oribe, the late president, who was endeavoring to raise an insurrectionary army there. The French supported Rivera.

A correspondent of the Journal of Commerce, writing from Montevideo under date 31st January, says:

You are authorized to state that the consul of the United States at Montevideo had protested against the government of the oriental republic, for permitting the sale of property in this port, belonging to citizens of the United States, and seized illegally by the French blockading squadron, within the jurisdiction of this republic; said property having been sold at public auction without trial or condemnation, and sanctioned by said government. The consul also protested against the French for having seized the said property in the waters under the jurisdiction of a neutral power, and selling the same without trial or condemnation.

The property in question was captured by the French 14 miles to the eastward of Martin Garcia island, under the dominion of this republic, and within three miles of the Banda oriental coast.

Mexico. The following is an extract from gen. Mexico's despatch to the commander at Tampico, announcing his victory over gen. Cos:

"Liberating army! Have the pleasure to announce to your excellency, that we have just obtained a complete triumph over the division termed the vanguard of the government troops, under the command of Don Martin Cos. I will inform you of all the details of this brilliant action, as soon as I shall have gathered them. For the present, I shall only state, that after three hours hot firing, we compelled our enemies to capitulate. You will see by the act of capitulation enclosed, that the vanquished troops are to fall back upon Mexico, by regular marches, with the troops of the rear guard, who are advancing on me. I have taken 200 prisoners. One hundred and fifty of the centralists came over to our ranks at the beginning of the action. All their artillery, baggage, and 350 stands of arms fell into our hands.

"We have to deplore the loss of four officers and twelve privates. Six of the officers and twelve privates of the enemy have been killed.

"JOSE ANTONIA MEXIA."

In a letter addressed by general Mexico to the editors of the N. O. Louisianaian, he says:

"The future policy of the country is uncertain. It is true the people are with us, but they are without arms, and many of them are frightened by the French invasion. There is some probability that the negotiations at Vera Cruz are finished, and peace may be restored between Mexico and France. But although the treaty with France has left the government free to make head against us, yet we are not intimidated, and, as before, we shall do our duty. The result of the struggle is very uncertain, but my heart assures me of success. We shall see."

General Martin Perfecto Cos, who commanded the government army, fled in a shameful manner before the engagement, leaving the command in the hands of colonel Avalos, who conducted himself with great bravery.

A letter from Tampico to a merchant in New Orleans, dated on the 23d of March, says:

General Mexia is here; has well fogged the government troops, at Tuspan, and is now waiting for general Urrea, who will be here to-morrow, to concert plans for future proceedings. The French question has been settled. Bustamante has left Mexico to lead the army against this place. Gen. Arista and the government forces are in Tula, about sixty leagues from this. All may yet go well for the federal cause.

New Leon. By way of Tampico we have received the important intelligence that the state of New Leon has declared in favor of the federal system. The plan adopted at Tampico on the 16th December was proclaimed, and a provisional government established. The governor had called upon the electors to appoint municipal councils. It is probable that this declaration of New Leon will enable general Lemus to march into the interior at the head of a strong force.

Advices from Tampico to the 3d instant have reached New Orleans. It appears that the federal general Urrea was fitting out a secret expedition of 700 men, which was to sail from Tampico on the 4th, in five vessels chartered for the purpose. Conjecture (says the New Orleans Bee) was busy with the supposed object of the expedition. Some were of opinion that its operations would be directed against Matamoros; while others imagined that the federalists aimed at getting possession of the fortress of San Juan de Ulloa.

Mexico and France. New Orleans slips of the 10th and 11th instant, announce the arrival in that port of the French steam frigate Meteore, from Vera Cruz, which place she left on the 2d instant. She brings the interesting information of the final ratification of the treaty recently concluded between admiral Baudin and the Mexican authorities. The following "order of the day" was issued by admiral Baudin, upon receiving the intelligence of the ratification of the treaty.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

Frigate Neride, port of Vera Cruz, March 29, 1839.

The admiral announces to the crews of the squadron and to the garrison of Ulloa that he has just received from the Mexican government the ratification of the treaty of peace concluded on the 9th March, between France and Mexico.

These ratifications are such as the admiral required. The cabinet of Mexico has renounced the pretensions which it had avowed. The doubts which had been raised of its sincerity at this moment, have been dissipated.

The admiral, representing the kind and generous intentions of France, has imposed moderate conditions upon Mexico. The object of the expedition nevertheless, has been fully attained.

Mexico pays an indemnity of three millions of francs to those of our countrymen who had put in their claims before the war.

The necessary guarantee for the future security of persons and property of Frenchmen is obtained.

The amount of indemnity to those who have suffered through the law of expulsion will be fixed by arbitrators.

Our commerce in Mexico hereafter is placed on the same footing with that of the most favored nation. In consequence of the peace, the fortress of Ulloa will be restored to Mexico. This restitution will take place in the first days of next month. The squadron will then return to France, with the exception of a small number of vessels required for the station.

Seamen, artillerymen, marines! each of you, in quitting the coast of Mexico, will carry in his heart the satisfaction of having co-operated in a work useful and glorious to France. The country against which you have fought, and to which you had it in your power to do much harm, will bless your valor and your generosity. And your admiral will always be happy to bear witness to the spirit of order and subordination, to the courage and devotion which you have shown in the whole course of this expedition.

(Signed) CHARLES BAUDIN.

The following additional items are furnished by the Louisianaian:

Among the passengers on board the Meteore is the abbe Auduze, who has acted in the capacity of chaplain to the fleet. We understand that the worthy abbe is charged with a mission from the French government to the republic of Texas, for which country he will depart in a few days.

Intelligence from the interior of Mexico states that Santa Ana received $200,000 from the merchants of Mexico for signing the treaty. This sum, joined with the threats of admiral Baudin to act with violence, and the declaration of the inhabitants of Vera Cruz to place themselves under the protection of France and of the federalists of Mexico, in case the treaty should not be ratified, induced Santa Ana to sign.

As we have already stated, the false Gorostiza intended a trick, and the government of Mexico sanctioned it. That minister formally declared, in a speech to the senate, that if the treaty were promptly ratified, they might afterwards allege that the word pagar (to pay) signified entregar (to deliver).

Admiral Baudin, vexed at such an impudent artifice, immediately sent an express to Mexico, to declare in plain and strong terms, that after what had passed since the treaty was signed, he considered it as null, unless the Mexican government made a protestation renouncing every sinister interpretation of the said treaty, and declaring that the treaty was made in good faith, and without any reservation, mental, verbal, or grammatical.

The answer of the government was satisfactory, and the official ratification arrived at Vera Cruz on the 25th March.

The Ontario, sloop of war, sailed from Vera Cruz to Tampico.

The brig Consort was to sail for the United States after the arrival of the conducta, which was expected from the interior.

Extract of a letter, dated,

Vera Cruz, April 2d, 1839.

"All the difficulties between France and Mexico have been terminated to mutual satisfaction. The conduct of admiral Baudin during the whole course of the negotiations, while advancing the interest of France, he treated the Mexican government with the utmost deference, and spared it even the shadow of any humiliation which might wound her amour propre.

"Vera Cruz has resumed its activity. The confidence of the inhabitants in admiral Baudin, is such, that he debates in good faith, and has made them fear for a while that, the treaty concluded by the plenipotentiaries at Vera Cruz, would not be entirely ratified, and we are all determined to hoist the French flag, and place themselves under the protection of the admiral. The ratification arrived, however, at last, on the 25th. It was full and satisfactory.

"An imposing ceremony took place on the 27th, for the funeral services of the French who had died during the expedition."

All the French in the harbor, all the Mexican authorities, among others general Gaudalope Victoria, one of the signers of the treaty, admiral Baudin, and abbe Auduze were present at the ceremony. abbe Auduze delivered a funeral discourse over the deceased, full of eloquence and beauty.

Every five minutes, until three o'clock in the afternoon, when the ceremony was finished, guns were fired on board the admiral's ship, the Neride, the English frigate Madagascar, and the American sloops of war, the Ontario and Vandalia, the Consort being under repairs.

SIXTEEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The steamship Great Western reached New York at an early hour on Monday morning, after it will be seen by her log, a very boisterous passage. She left Bristol on her regular day, the 23d March. She brings London and Liverpool accounts to 22d March inclusive, and Bristol to the 23d inclusive.

Boundary question. The England, which left New York on the 2d of March, arrived at Liverpool on 19th. She carried out the president's message relative to the northeastern boundary, and the "memorandum," or temporary arrangement, concluded at Washington between the British minister and Mr. Forsyth, secretary of state. In short, at the departure of the Great Western, the British government and people were in possession of the worst features of the case; yet they seemed to have received it with tolerable equanimity, and to have anticipated no other than a pacific termination of the dispute. The spirit of the government is seen in the annexed paragraph from the London Morning Chronicle, and as for the people, we learn through a British subject who came passenger in the Great Western, that they manifested very little effervescence on the occasion. Even the Times is adverse to war, and proposes a compromise on terms which, if we understand them, Maine would probably be ready to accede to.

The London Morning Chronicle (government paper) of March 21st says: "The intelligence from the United States, is upon the whole, of a satisfactory character. Notwithstanding the disposition of the citizens of Maine, and the apprehensions which a portion of the American press entertains that some hasty and inconsiderate proceedings of that state may precipitate war, we are strongly disposed to confide in the central government, and without whose approbation it is scarcely possible that collision should take place. Where the disposition is so manifestly good, we are justified in anticipating a peaceful issue."

The temporary adjustment of the boundary dispute appears to have given general satisfaction to the London press, and even the most ultra of the anti-American journals have manifested a degree of moderation on the subject which was hardly expected.

The Herald, it is true, recommends the immediate sending of 20,000 men and 10 sails of the line to the North American coast; and the Standard affirms that no diplomacy but that of cannon and bayonets can be relied on—but the Times—the thunderer of the British press—discourses on the matter in the following moderate and reasonable manner:

"We have heard from high and grave authorities in the United States men who seem to believe that there have been really conscientious in their allegation, that there could be not a shadow of doubt as to the right of Maine to the whole of the disputed territory; these persons at the same time intimating a strong conviction that the bone contended for was not worth to either country a dozen human lives.

It now appears that, however the joint memorandum of Messrs. Forsyth and Fox may be calculated to avert, (and God grant it may succeed in doing so), any immediate appeal to violence and bloodshed, the tone of the senators who have spoken upon the subject corresponds minutely with that of the senate which put aside the arbitration of 1830-'31, and insisted that England had no right to the least portion of the soil contended for. Although, therefore, measures humane and considerate have been pursued on this occasion for postponing the armed conflict, and saving the irregular and precipitate effusion of blood, nothing has taken place to encourage the least hope that by any expedient but surrender of the whole subject in dispute, will this country be able to calculate on a more than transient gleam of repose for her provinces in North America.

In this journal we have repeatedly thrown out a suggestion, which with a due sense of our own very humble pretensions to be heard where great national interests are concerned, our unfeigned and cordial love of "peace, in the spirit of peace," now inclines us to reproduce, viz: that as most national misunderstandings are best healed by each party sacrificing something of its extreme rights, for the sake of showing good will and good neighborhood, England should frankly offer to the state of Maine that large section of country which has always been an unquestioned and recognised part of New Brunswick—viz: that portion of it which lies west of the town of St. John's, along the shore of the Bay of Fundy, until it meets the present Maine frontier of Passamaquoddy bay, including the whole of the Charlotte county," extending north to what is called in the maps the "military post" on St. John's river, and thence along the southern extremities of the highlands of which "Mars Hill" forms a part, until it strikes the meridian, close to that old landmark.

This scheme of compromise we recommended in the Times journal six or eight months ago. It would be better for both parties—1st, for England, because it would leave in her possession the whole of the disputed territory, and her interprovincial communication between Fredericton and Quebec unbroken; 2d, and eminently better for the state of Maine, inasmuch as she would gain for it a fine country, to which she has never dreamed of putting forth a pretension; a definite and profitable water frontier on the west, formed by the St. John's river and the Bay of Fundy, a greater compactness and roundness of territory than at present, and considerably more in point of surface than England could in the way of mutual cession be on any fair principle called upon to relinquish, being even in superficial miles considerably beyond one-half of the space disputed. We cannot for our parts comprehend on what pretext the state of Maine should object to a settlement so true and beneficial. Nor, in the case of any man but lord Palmerston, does it appear to us that any English minister could throw difficulties in the path of such a proposal.

Remember, this is not yielding on our side to compulsion. We declared this opinion more than eight months ago. We did so from an honest anxiety for national peace and human welfare. There is through this temporary convention of Messrs. Forsyth and Fox a gleam of light, and that one we see and if well employed, it may conduct us through the labyrinth. But with such inducements to activity, and such materials of compromise, and such repeated warnings to prepare for the worst, what must this man, lord Palmerston, be made of who would neither negotiate through the ordinary methods of diplomacy, nor recollect that an armed negotiation is among the most approved and infallible means of prevailing upon an inattentive adversary to give an ear to reason?

The letters from London all agree in saying that the English ministry are entirely averse to war, and that no serious apprehension is felt of such an event in the money circles, though the possibility of such an event had created a good deal of caution.

The Bankers' Circular. We have the London Bankers' Circular of March 29th, the latest, and probably only copy in this country, as it was sent off at 7 o'clock on the evening of that day. Its leading article is a temperate, and (for that side of the water), very intelligent review of the border difficulties between Maine and New Brunswick. Not the least idea of war is entertained. We cannot give the entire article, and prefer not to mutilate it. The following article forms a sort of postscript to the leader, and as it relates to the cotton and stock markets, and to the effect of the news from Maine on the latter, we lose not a moment in extracting it.

The grave character of the question of peace or war between England and the United States, which is now so discussed in the political circles of London, must for the present we think supersede other subjects which we wish to notice, because it is one of the most scribable importance to the manufacturers, capitalists and bankers of this country. And as our reflection had led us to a more favorable conclusion concerning it than most public men and periodical writers worthy of attention had arrived at, we felt it necessary to state at some length the grounds on which we had formed it. The amount of British capital invested in American stocks is so large, and the confidence of its holders received so severe a shock by the intelligence that the respective border authorities had threatened, and one of them had actually commenced hostile operations, that the minds of all men were directed to the consideration of the issue of this state of things. We have the strongest confidence in its being a favorable one, and think that the awkward incidents which have taken place may well be converted into a means of bringing about a speedy settlement of the dispute, which both parties, we believe, sincerely and earnestly desire.

In the meantime, the great amount of business which has recently been transacted in American stocks, will be in a great measure stopped or suspended, until the determination of congress with relation to the report of the committee on foreign affairs be known, and the conduct of the government of Maine be ascertained. Ask any broker in the stock exchange about those securities, and he will answer, "they are all sellers and no buyers, therefore there are no transactions in them." Even the stock of the United States bank, which, if we may use the expression, is a description of security naturalized in this country like the stock of our own banks, so many undisturbed family investments have been made in it, has been affected, and sales have been made in it at prices a fraction or two lower. Now the reports of that bank being extensively engaged in cotton speculations never lowered the value of their stock. Those reports were groundless as far as any immediate interest beyond liberal banking profits secured to the bank was concerned. If they had been well founded to the alleged extent, the bank would have gained a sum exceeding, we believe, £500,000 by those cotton operations. Messrs. Humphreys and Bidde, of Liverpool, have not a single bale of their immense stock left unsold, and all that they will in future have for sale will be from fresh arrivals. So that the accounts, as far as the old stock is concerned, may be wound up, and this will indirectly augment the resources and efficiency of the United States bank, and enable it the better to assist the banks of the south, whose comparative weakness now compels them to press severely on their customers, in order to be enabled to maintain their own resumed payments in cash.

On this matter last alluded to we must shortly make some observations, when we shall take the opportunity of submitting a plan which provides for a more safe, easy and regular method of effecting remittances from the United States to England; because it appears to us to merit consideration with the view of aiding the manufacturing interest of this country. It is one patronised by men who stand deservedly high in the estimation of the commercial world.

We said five weeks since that, on the corn law question, "the number of votes altogether in favor of a change is estimated at a point below 200." The event (195 votes) has merely confirmed this; the termination of the debate and the strength of the voting upon it have, however, tended to give firmness to the corn market, but that which has produced more effect is the knowledge that 500,000 quarters of wheat bought for England abroad have been countermanded. This countermand cannot affect the more remote markets, and, as to those nearer home, we believe that in the northern ports, including HamBurg, nearly double that quantity has been purchased for British account.

Until to-day money has been, throughout the past week, very easy; so much so that the amount borrowed of the bank of England by some of the brokers (which altogether, we understand, did not exceed £500,000) was paid back by them. It is now tight in the same quarters, but the rates for lodgments and discounts remain unaltered.

Intelligent gentlemen arrived in the Great Western state that among the people of England, the government and all classes, the idea of going to war with this country is deemed perfectly preposterous; that rather than it should take place they would see the whole territory sunk in the ocean; that they look upon it as a border dispute, in which the feelings of the two countries are not involved; and that, as it is a mere question of land, and not of honor, it may be easily adjusted, and cannot in any way lead to hostilities between two diverse and kindred nations, whose hearts and interests are indissolubly united.

The proposal of Mr. Webster to take possession of the disputed territory on the 4th of July does not appear to have produced much excitement. It is remarkable that the whole affair had produced no variation in the funds.

The subject of the president's message, and the proceedings of congress had not, however, been brought before parliament before the departure of the Great Western.

A correspondent of the Bristol Mirror, whose letter is dated London, March 21, says: "In London the news from the United States has not produced the variation of a solitary fraction in the funds. People here seem to treat the idea of a war with America as an absurdity."

The London Courier of the 20th March says: The boundary question between Maine and New Brunswick had produced an extraordinary degree of excitement throughout the United States; but for the present, we trust, a rupture between the two countries has been prevented by the memorandum signed by Mr. Forsyth, the secretary of state of the United States, and Mr. Fox, the British minister. By that memorandum, which will be found in another column, it is agreed that the troops sent into the disputed territory by the governors of Maine and New Brunswick are to be respectively withdrawn, and that "if future necessity should arise for dispersing notorious trespassers, or protecting public property from depredation by armed force, the operation shall be conducted by concert, jointly or separately, according to agreements between the governments of Maine and New Brunswick."

Such an arrangement may answer the purpose of a temporary "make shift," but, if allowed to remain, will lay the seeds of future disputes.

The same paper, in copying the remarks of American papers, in relation to the good effects of the protocol, says:

"We sincerely hope this anticipation may prove correct, for a war between England and the United States would be equivalent to a surrender of Mexico and other parts of Spanish America into the hands of France. At the same time, if the United States persist, as they have hitherto done, in rejecting every arrangement, short of a full and unconditional concession of all their claims, we do not see how an appeal to arms can eventually be avoided, a contingency that would not only prove a curse to the two principals in a quarrel, but would be likely to inflict incalculable evil upon the whole civilized world."

The Great Western made her passage out to Bristol in 114 days. The Liverpool steamer had not arrived in England before the departure of the Great Western.

Among the passengers in the Great Western is prof. S. F. B. Morse, of New York, bearer of despatches from our legation in France to the departments of state and war at Washington.

The advance in corn, from the latter part of February when the advance began, to our present latest dates, was rather more than 1d. per lb.

The bank of England on the 14th of March declared a semi-annual dividend of 3 1-2 per cent. for the last half year.

The princess Charlotte Bonaparte, daughter of Joseph Bonaparte, died at Sarzane, Italy, about 11 o'clock beginning of March.

The semi-monthly steam packets from England to Halifax, are to start from Liverpool.

A minister from the Brazils had arrived in England, charged with a settlement of French claims on Buenos Ayres, by the mediation of Great Britain.

Sir Thomas Harvey will proceed immediately to take the command in the West Indies, in the Westchester, and captain John Parker is appointed the flag captain. (This movement is in consequence of the death of the vice admiral Sir C. Pezet.)

The Wesleyan centenary fund, at the latest date had increased to £183,000, (£812,520).

The English papers are full of accounts of turbulence in Ireland, which has attracted, at last, attention in the house of lords. Lord Normanby states the riots to amount to no more than the riots of the last 40 years.

A report was in circulation the evening of the 22d in London, that a message was to be brought down to parliament for a supply of 20,000 additional troops to the army.

The Chartists, so called in England, or the radicals, are reported to be arming in all directions; large masses of the population are in a very uneasy state. Horse artillery, and mounted brigades of foot artillery have been suddenly ordered to Manchester from Warwick.

Parliamentary proceedings. The great question of the corn laws excluded almost every other topic, in both houses, throughout the week ending on the 16th of March. In the house of commons it was brought up by Mr. Webster, who moved that the house go into a committee of the whole to consider the laws—supporting his motion by an elaborate and skillful speech.

In the course of the debate lord John Russell reiterated his preference of a moderate fixed duty.

The debate was brought to a close on the 18th, the motion being negatived by a vote of 342 to 195.

In the house of lords the discussion arose upon a resolution moved by earl Fitzwilliam, that the corn laws had failed to secure that steadiness of price which was essential to the best interests of the country. The resolution was supported by lord Brougham and the earl of Radnor, and opposed by the dukes of Buckingham, Richmond and Wellington, the marquis of Lansdowne, the earl of Ripon and lord Melbourne. It was negated by a vote of 224 to 24.

In the course of the debate the duke of Richmond solemnly declared that if the corn laws were repealed he would sell his property, and depart with his capital and retainers to some happier land. And lord Melbourne affirmed, with great vehemence, that the proposition to abolish restrictions on commerce was the maddest and wildest that ever was conceived.

Lord Brougham gave notice, immediately after the vote was taken, that on the 15th he should move that the house go into committee, to consider what is expedient to be done with respect to the corn laws.

Boundary question. In the house of commons, March 15, Sir S. Canning inquired of the noble lord the secretary for foreign affairs, whether he had received any information from Washington with reference to the recent collision which was reported to have taken place upon the boundary between the state of Maine and our province of New Brunswick. He need not remark how important this subject was. He was desirous to know whether the noble lord had been informed of the course which the American government proposed to take in consequence of this transaction. He also wished to be informed whether there was any reasonable probability of the negotiations which had now been carrying on for eight years, for the settlement of this question of disputed territory, being brought to a satisfactory termination.

Lord Palmerston stated, in reply, that he had received but very imperfect information upon this subject from our minister at Washington. The circumstances to which the honorable gentleman referred were only known generally in that city, their details not having arrived. It was not yet, therefore, in his power to state what course the American government intended to pursue. He would be, however, fully justified in stating that the most friendly disposition towards this country prevailed in that quarter. (Hear.)

Sir S. Canning—What is the date of the communication to which the noble lord referred?

Lord Palmerston replied that he did not remember the exact date, but that the communication had reached him by a rapid conveyance (the Great Western). He could not say whether the result of the negotiations referred to by the honorable gentleman would be satisfactory or not; but this he could say, that both governments were animated by a most serious desire to obtain such a result. (Hear.)

In the house of lords, on the 16th March, the earl of Roden moved for a select committee to inquire into the state of Ireland since 1825, with respect to the commission of crime, supporting his motion in a speech of six columns, giving a most frightful picture of the enormities and outrages committed in that unhappy kingdom, which he ascribed entirely to misgovernment.

Lord Normandy vindicated his administration in a speech of six columns.

The duke of Wellington supported the motion at great length. Lord Melbourne opposed it, declaring in the course of his remarks that the duke of Wellington's speech was one of the boldest he had ever heard, and that the motion was one of pure undoubted censure upon the government.

It was carried, 63 to 58—majority against ministers live.

The boundary question. London, March 20. By the packet ship England, captain Waite, from New York, which city she left on the 1st instant, and arrived at the state of Ireland since 1825, with respect to the commission of crime, supporting his motion in a speech of six columns, giving a most frightful picture of the enormities and outrages committed in that unhappy kingdom, which he ascribed entirely to misgovernment.

The president, Mr. Van Buren, with the promptitude which a subject of such importance demanded, addressed a message to congress, the tone of which is pacific, at the same time that he maintains that the territory in dispute belongs to the United States. He expresses his desire that the hostile force which the government of Maine sent to take possession of this territory, should be withdrawn, but he insists not upon this, as he is bound to do if his interventions are pacific. The correspondence arising out of the message between the British minister Mr. Fox and the American minister Mr. Forsyth, as well as the correspondence between the governor of Maine and Sir John Harvey, will be found annexed to the message, in another part of our paper.

The whole is of surpassing interest, the question being one of the continuance of a prosperous peace, or, if it may be, an immediate recurrence to a war of disastrous consequences to one party, if not to both. The territories of Great Britain in North America must be preserved at all hazards; and aggressions upon them of any kind must be resisted by all means.

[Shipping Gazette.]

From the London Times, (Tory paper), March 20th.
Lord Palmerston has been interrogated more than once, or twice, or a dozen times, within the course of as many years, touching the state of the New Brunswick boundary quarrel, and as often, with that snirk which is peculiar to his lordship, and which conveys a sneer much more plainly than a reply, has left the question to his own imaginings, from utter despair of getting any thing out of his lordship more satisfactory than "I don't choose to tell you—ask some other time."

That other time has often come, and has now gone, we are apprehensive, not to come again.

When lord Palmerston stupidly, or flippanly and carelessly, acquiesced in the rejection by the United States' government of the judgment pronounced by the king of Holland, to whose arbitration the whole question had been absolutely and finally referred on the part as well of the republic as of Great Britain, the result might easily have been foreseen. The duty of lord Palmerston was to have urged the finality of that adjudication, which the litigating powers had reserved to themselves no right or power to rescind, and which, although it actually stripped Great Britain of more than one-half of the disputed land, was at least an intelligible settlement, assigning for a large portion of the boundary line the course of the St. John's river, and leaving in the hands of Great Britain that which has been throughout the object of highest consideration with her government—namely, the most practicable and convenient route between Frederickton and the St. Lawrence.

The haste, however, with which the senate of the U. States, and in imitation of their eagerness, the government at Washington, declared the decision of the king of Holland, to be "inadmissible," must have opened the eyes of any Englishman who was not determined to keep them shut to the real, though unacknowledged views of the republicans, and have led lord Palmerston that he must proceed with all despatch to the settlement, and irrevocable arrangement of the question, by amicable, but active and diligent, negotiation; or provide for the other and more distressing, but, in such circumstances, unavoidable alternative, of maintaining the just pretensions of his country by her armed power.

Lord Palmerston appears to have demeaned himself as if no such contingencies lay before him. He gave in to the rejection of the arrangement made by the king of Holland, without betraying the slightest consciousness that any other adjustment of a difference, in itself so serious, would be required by the United States from this country, or by England at the hands of her foreign minister. He did not merely fall asleep at his post, but never dreamed of spicing by a renewed negotiation the settlement which his own folly had suffered the United States to break off. So far as our recollection carries us, his cool and easy treatment of the question was equivalent to this—"The U. States have hung round the king of Holland's neck, and it is now for them to make theirs." Why, then, was from the beginning precisely this—"We want the whole of the disputed territory, and we will have it too."

But, as lord Palmerston made no movement towards a peaceful issue of this misunderstanding, so was he equally careful that for an opposite issue England should be totally unprepared.

The Americans took care that the success of their own policy should depend on their own will, not on the mercy of their rivals. Our correspondent in this day's Times, "A North American Colonist," explains the shrewdness and composure with which Jonathan goes about his work.

The rebellion in Canada, and the war of "sympathy" have been Godsend to the governor Fairfield and his "jumbos," who will thus have powerful diversions in their favor. Large lots of the soil of Upper Canada were long since said to have been sold by that exemplary patriot Mackenzie, as payment in advance for the personal exploits of all sympathizing riflemen who, in the cause of freedom, should cross the frontier and liberate the queen of England's Canadian subjects from the yoke of cultivating their own lands and reaping their own harvests.

Lord Palmerston told Sir Stratford Canning, the other night, that he could not say whether or not the negotiation respecting the boundary would have a successful issue. Vastly consulting this; but he was satisfied in stating that the cabinet of Washington had the most friendly sentiments towards this country." Vastly encouraging indeed! But if the cabinet of Washington should either willingly or by compulsion happen to support the state of Maine in its armed aggression upon the crown and people of England, will lord Palmerston please to inform us how much Mr. Van Buren's "friendly sentiments" are worth in the public market?

We deprecate war. We dread it for the sake of humanity, for the sake of North America, beyond all for the sake of England, which must dearly suffer. But there is such a thing as driving a great country, however temperate, and tolerant, and pacific, into war, just as it is possible for the best natured and benevolent man in the world to be forced by indignity into a private quarrel. England can do no more towards avoiding war than abstain from offering injustice. If she suffers wrong tamely, then is she unjust to herself and to posterity; for she invites thereby, and will inevitably have to endure, a repetition and variety of insults. If both governments be wise, they cannot go on to bloodshed. But the wise and just may, by the foolish and unprincipled, be compelled, and dragged, and trampled, and spurned into a conflict. In that case the responsibility is not divided, because the crime is altogether unilateral. It is the simple case of a wanton oppressor, and an unwilling and unoffending victim.

If England be kicked into such a war unprepared, the responsibility for so terrible a disaster, though not shared between her and the United States, inasmuch as she, as a nation, must be exonerated, will rest heavily between the United States and the British government, which has the country connected. For such a government there can be no forgiveness, nor any punishment severe enough for its enormous treason.

London, March 21. A good deal of anxiety prevails amongst the leading parties connected with the question of the United States and the North American colonies, in consequence of the unpleasant accounts respecting the disputed territory. People of the first information have to-day openly expressed their opinion that this rupture, for such it is, however the ministerial scribes may gloss the matter, is pregnant with incalculable mischief, not only to our own settlements, but as regards our relations with the United States, the government of which does not appear to have the power to restrain the lordly and reckless vagrants that infest the border frontiers of the self-styled land of liberty. It is maintained that our government alone are to be blamed for the unpleasant political aspects which have for some time threatened our supremacy from the other side of the Atlantic; with a crippled navy it is not to be expected that the despot of the world, whether monarchial or republican, would respect British dictation. [Morning Post.]

From the Bristol Mirror March 23.

The Great Western. This unrivalled ship will sail from King Street takes 105 passengers, and one o'clock she takes 105 passengers, and a quantity of goods, consisting of silks, printed cottons, worsted stuffs, hardware and a large stock of jewelry. Among the passengers are Mr. Kaye, a government messenger, with despatches, lord Frederick Paulett, lieutenant Col. Oldfield and capt. John Forbes, Judge Halburton, alias "Sam Slick, the clock maker," is also passenger, who is going home to Nova Scotia.

London, March 21.—State of the country. A large body of artillery marched yesterday from Woolwich into Northamptonshire. The object is, doubtless, the prevention of outrage in the manufacturing districts. In reply to a question put by the duke of Buckingham, lord Melbourne admitted a few days ago, that government was cognizant of the fact that the Chartists, throughout the kingdom are arming by thousands. The times are such as to require on the part of the executive, a large measure of wisdom, promptitude and firmness. Violent language is now used in every quarter, in order to prepare the people for violent action, as the only cure for the grievances, under which poor producers of all sorts have so long suffered.

The duties of government in the circumstances are of a most onerous kind. Firmness and promptitude, are as we have stated, necessary in order to repress outrage;—but more promptitude and firmness in the use of the means of coercion will not eradicate those social evils, of which violent language and preparations for arming are but the indications. The miseries of the laboring poor must speedily force themselves on the consideration of the legislature. Well will it be for the country, if the legislature shall be found to administer relief. The new poor law must, assuredly, be repealed.

From the London Sun of March 22

Cily 12 o'clock. Ministers being in the minority last night in the house of lords, on the motion of the earl of Roden respecting Ireland, has rather damped the funds this morning, as well as the sale of some three and a half per cents.

Flat passed on. The British market appears rather heavy, owing to a report that the government are going to increase the army with 25,000 men, for in all probability great reinforcements may be required to send out to Canada, should the United States government continue obstinate in their demands on the boundary question. Several sales, both of three and a half per cents and consols have been effected during the morning. Consols at one period were at 92 5/8; at present they may be quoted at 92 5/8-3/4 money; account 92 5/8; exchequer bills lower, 55 5/7.

Militia. Notice has been received that one-third of the available force of the militia will be called out for 12 months for permanent duty, to be succeeded by the other portions in rotation, and the whole body to be called out for twenty-eight days' training yearly.

[See Flying Post.]

From the Manchester Guardian.

The Chartists and their arms. We learn from a variety of sources that the making and selling of pikes and fire arms, amongst the working population of this neighborhood, is going on in the most open and barefaced manner; and judging from what we have heard on the subject, we can imagine that there can be little doubt that some thousands of these dangerous weapons are now in the hands of parties who at all events declare that they are ready to use them at the bidding of what is called "the national convention."

Icebergs floating in the Atlantic. Liverpool, March 22. Several vessels which have arrived within the last fortnight were interrupted in their progress by getting entangled in fields of floating ice. The George Washington, the Elizabeth Bruce and the South America were all in this predicament! The South America was entangled among floating icebergs for thirty hours. The first iceberg the ship fell in with rose from fifty to sixty feet above the level of the sea. It was dark when she approached it, and capt. Barstow very wisely resolved to lay to till day light. About two o'clock, when the moon broke out from the dense clouds in which she had been previously enveloped, and threw her light on the numerous icebergs, shooting up like towers, which were visible round the horizon, the spectacle is described by the persons who beheld it as having been awfully sublime. The ice reflected the beams of the moon, and the combination produced a mild splendor, which approached if it did not rival the light of day. The presence of so much floating ice in the Atlantic as far down as lat. 44 is rather an unusual occurrence.

BELGIUM. The chamber of deputies, after 14 days debate, agreed to accept the treaty as proposed by the London conference, by a vote of 58 to 42. The assent of the senate was confidently expected. The decision of the chamber caused no excitement out-of-doors. The dispute between Belgium and Holland may be looked upon as settled.

FRANCE. The elections having resulted unfavorably to the cabinet, the ministers again tendered their resignation on the 8th, and it was accepted. Marshal Soult was then sent for by the king, and subsequently M. Thiers was also called in. Negotiations for the formation of a new cabinet were in progress until the 20th. On that day the new ministers presented to the king an outline of the policy on which they would come in, as follows:

1st. That France should declare war against Don Carlos. 2. That France should declare to Austria that she would not allow of a marriage between an Austrian prince and the young queen Isabella, as had been proposed by prince Metternich. 3d. That the affairs of Belgium must be considered as settled. 4th. That the war against Mexico should be persevered in. 5th. That the conversion of the five per cent. rentes should be adopted. 6th. That certain concessions should be made to the growers of beet-root sugar. 7th. That the question of electoral reform should be adjourned. 8th. That the laws of September should be revised; and 9th, and principally, That the presidence reele should be insisted on, or, in other words, that, except on very state occasions, the king should not preside at the council of ministers.

To these conditions the king refused his assent, declaring that, if necessary, he would rather submit to be deposed than accede to the terms insisted on; but the latest postscript from Paris says that he afterwards withdrew his refusal, and expressed his willingness to accede to the conditions.

The constitution of the new ministry had not been officially announced; but it is given as follows by the London papers:

Marshal Soult, war and president; Thiers, foreign affairs; Passy, interior; Humann, finance; Dupin, justice and religion; Duperré, marine; Dufrane, commerce; Sauzet, public works; Villeman, public instruction.

The Paris diorama had been destroyed by fire, with the three paintings on exhibition.

RUSSIA. The emperor of Russia, convinced of the mischievous effects of the lottery on the poor and industrious peasantry of Poland, has published a decree, ordaining that the lottery shall be abolished in the kingdom of Poland on the 1st of January, 1840.

Markets, money, &c. London money market, March 21. The late intelligence received from the United States has not created any unfavorable impression upon our money market. The accounts are deemed rather satisfactory by most parties connected with America, in so far that they are calculated to impress on both governments the necessity of an immediate settlement of the disputed question, which has been the origin of such unpleasant proceedings, and although some border collisions are apprehended, it is generally anticipated that no very serious results will ensue.

American stocks, London, March 20. The American securities have been sold freely, and United States bank shares have fallen 2s. 6d. per share. The supply of every description has been ample, at the following quotations:

Five per cent. pound sterling Alabama, 91 to 92.
Five per cent. Alabama, 92 to 93.
Five per cent. Indiana, 92 1/2 to 93 1/2.
Five per cent. Louisiana, (Baring's), 93 to 94.
Five per cent. Louisiana, (Lizardi's), 95 1/2 to 96 1/2.
Five per cent. Mississippi, in £ sterling, 93.
Six per cent. Ohio, 1856, 98 to 99.
Five per cent. New York, 91 to 95.
Five per cent. Pennsylvania, according to dates, 90 to 93.
United States bank shares, £24 15s. 0d.
Six per cent. Virginia, 93.
Six per cent. Florida, in £ sterling, 95.
Six per cent. Camden, &c. rail road, 104 to 105.
Six per cent. Maryland, par.
Five per cent. South Carolina, in £ sterling, 95 to 96.
Five per cent. Harrisburgh and Lancaster rail road, 90 1/2 to 91 1/2.

London, March 22. Several purchases of U. S. bank shares, &c. rather a large amount, have been made to-day for investment, at £24 10s., and there are more purchasers at that price, and if the sellers remain firm they will probably obtain an advance.

The general impression as to the boundary question, is that the recent disturbances will not lead to war, but will have the beneficial effect of bastening an adjustment of the difficulty.

We understand there is more inquiry for state stock. There is no market for second rate securities. Our capitalists are at present extremely cautious, and will not encourage any new American loans or companies. Nothing could more tend to increase the permanent price of American securities, than a final adjustment of the boundary question.

Money is tolerably plentiful and the bank not at all uneasy at the constant drain of gold, though I think there will be a pinch for money yet.

Our accounts from France as to political prospects are rather threatening. So they are from India. Trade is generally good and the demand for goods from the continent is brisk.

English cotton and corn markets.

Liverpool, March 22. Cotton. The accounts by the packet which left this on the 2d instant, would inform you that we had experienced some revival in the demand for cotton, and that prices had improved 1-2 per lb. Since then the demand has been far more active, and the business unusually extensive at gradually improving prices, amounting to a further advance up to this time of 3-4d. a 1d. per lb. the greatest advance being in the low and middle qualities. In good and fine the advance is about 1-2d. per lb. The moderate revival of demand at the close of last and first of this month seemed to arise from some improvement in goods and yarn, but our market received a fresh impulse on the 4th instant from New York accounts to the 7th ultimo, more decided than before as to the short crop and to the falling off in the supplies into the ports, which, together with the further rise in prices here, produced extensive speculative operations, and large purchases on the part of dealers and consumers. Subsequent advices from New York down to the 1st instant of similar import, and quite as decided, have had the effect of keeping up the demand, and it may be that the possibility of hostilities, arising out of the northeastern boundary question, has contributed to give firmness to the market the last day or two. The improvement in yarns hitherto is not at all equivalent to the rise in cotton, but greater confidence in the short crop accounts induces a more general belief that goods and yarns must continue to advance, and hence there are not so many mills working short time.

The sales for the week ended 8th inst. amounted to 88,900 bales; about 40,000 to speculators. For the week ended 15th inst., they were 60,750 bales, about 45,000 on speculation, and this week they amount to 49,820 bales, 19,000 of it taken by speculators. Of this week's business, 17,000 are Upland, at 70 3/4-9 3/4; 17,000 New Orleans, at 7 1/4-1 1/4; 2,520 Alabama and Mobile, at 8 1/2 1/8-1 1/8; and 170 S-A island at 22 a 36d per lb. Fair qualities may be quoted at 9 1/4-1 1/8-3/8. The import into Liverpool since the 1st January, amounts to 210,000 bales against 365,000 to same period last season. The supply from the United States is 158,000, being a decrease of about one-half. The stock in this port is estimated at 234,000 bales, of which about 182,000 is American cotton.

By the returns received to day the last aggregate average of wheat was exactly 73s. per qr. so that the duty remains at the lowest point for another week.

A reduction of a penny in the average would have advanced the duty, and it is not unlikely to go up to 4s. or possibly to 6s. 5d. per bbl. on flour in a few weeks. The foreign supplies of wheat are very heavy and the markets much depressed. Flour extremely dull at 36s. a 37s. with some retail at 38s. per bbl. About 5,000 bbis. Turpentine have been sold this week at 12s. 6d. per cwt. for good quality. The business in tobacco this month has been about 500 lbs. at full price.

Liverpool, March 20. Grain. Of wheat the exports from this to Ireland continue to exceed the imports from thence—but of foreign wheat, chiefly from France and Italy, and of flour from the United States, the arrivals have been very considerable during the past week; much exceeding the demand, which has been very limited from the millers and dealers, and though some parcels from Odessa and Marianopolis wheat have been taken by speculators, last quotations have been barely obtainable, and in some instances a small decline has been submitted to on this, and on every article in the corn trade; the Yorkshire markets of the past week were also much depressed, and a little lower; and at Manchester on Saturday, very few sales of grain, flour or oatmeal, could be effected from this port.

The duty on rye and beans from foreign ports is this week increased 1s. 6d. per quarter; an order is given that there is no alteration; it is likely that the duty on wheat will be increased next Friday to 2s. 8d. per quarter. Some few sales of foreign flour for export have been made at 37s. a 39s. per bbl. for sweet, and 33s. a 35s. for sour.

March 22. We have again to notice a good arrival of foreign wheat since Tuesday last, amounting to nearly 11,000 quarters, exclusive of several cargoes not reported, besides about 20,000 barrels flour, chiefly from the United States.

On Wednesday a fair sale was experienced for good fresh wheats, but the demand has since slackened materially, and beyond a moderate retail inquiry from our local millers for the lower qualities of foreign, which have been disposed of at 2d. to 3d. reduction, very little business has been done to-day, and were buyers to appear for the better descriptions, rather lower terms would be accepted.

Irish flour quite unobtainable in the face of the heavy imports from abroad, and foreign appears for the present to be almost equally neglected.

SWARTWOUT DEFALCATIONS.

Report of the committee of investigation, chosen by ballot, by the house of representatives, January 17 and 19, 1839, on the subject of the defalcations of Samuel Swartwout and others, and the correctness of the returns of collectors and receivers of the public money; also, the report of the minority of the committee.

Question 4. Do you know the object for which that book is kept in the secretary's office, and what is the use made of it?

Answer. I do not know the object for which the book was originally kept, or what use was made of the information, as my connexion with the book has not been long. I should think, however, that the object must have been to aid the department with information, particularly when the system of credit was different from the present.

Question 5. From what data do you make entries in this book from time to time?

Answer. I make the entries from returns which are received from the collectors of customs; they are made of bonds taken and liquidated monthly, as I think.

Question 6. Do not these returns purport to be "monthly returns of bonds taken and liquidated," returned by collectors to the treasury?

Answer. As far as I have examined those I have received, they are monthly returns.

Question 7. Has that book ever been called for by the secretary of the treasury, the chief clerk or other person in the secretary's office, for examination?

Answer. It has not been called for by the secretary or chief clerk or other person, for examination, since I have had charge of it.

Question 8. Up to what period are the entries in that book brought up and completed?

Answer. January, 1839.

Question 9. Does that book enable one who examines it to see what amount of bonds are payable in any given month at the port of New York, and other ports?

Answer. So far as the returns present them, it does.

In continuation, and to complete the record view secured to the secretary at all times, of "any transaction which relates to the revenue," a third book was formerly compiled for his office from the quarterly returns of collectors made to other accounting officers of the treasury. It will be seen, from the following testimony of the present secretary, what was the nature of this record, and how far it has fallen into disuse under his administration of the office.

Levi Woodbury, secretary of the treasury, examined by Mr. Wise.

Question 21. When were you appointed to the office of secretary of the treasury? Please look on the book presented, entitled "collectors' quarterly returns," and say whether you have ever examined this book, and when?

Answer. I entered on the duties of secretary of the treasury about the 4th of July, A. D. 1834. The book mentioned appears to be that before referred to, in which one of the clerks in my office was in the habit of making the entries sent from the auditor's office. I have no recollection of ever having had occasion to examine that book for any particular purpose, or ever to have examined it till since the question arose concerning the discontinuance to make those entries. On some occasions I have visited the rooms of the different clerks in my own office, and made a general inspection of the books in which they were then writing, or of the business in which they were then engaged, and noticed their handwriting, filing, arrangement of papers, &c. and make such inquiries as to their business as occurred to me to be proper; but have no recollection of examining this book.

Question 22. Does not the book referred to in your last answer show the following statements respecting each quarterly account of each collector in the United States, and in distinct ruled columns.

Collector's account current, second quarter of 1835. S. Swartwout, collector, New York.

And was not the foregoing entry, which is given as an example, the last entry made in said book of the accounts of Samuel Swartwout, being for the second quarter of 1835; and have any entries of a like character been made in said book, or any other book in your office, as to the accounts of any collector, since the third quarter of 1835?

Answer. The book in which the entries were made of the aggregates of several items from the accounts returned by collectors to the first auditor, contains such headings or titles as are described in the above interrogatory; and the entries, made as I suppose by the clerk in my office, Mr. Dungan, who had charge of the book, are in the sums or amounts described in the interrogatory.

In the next pages the entries for the 3d quarter of 1835, do not contain any sums for twenty or twenty-three ports, including New York among them; and no other entries for any port appear to have been made in that book afterwards. Nor do I know that these aggregates were, subsequent to that time, entered or copied in any other book in my office, either for New York or any other port; but presume, from Mr. Dungan's statements, that the accounts not having been afterwards sent in to him from the auditor's office, he omitted to go after them, or send for them, and the aggregates were not afterwards copied by him; and that he omitted also to make any report to me of these circumstances, for the reasons before stated in reply to a former interrogatory.

Mr. Dungan is, however, now a clerk in the office, where he has been, I understand, over twenty years; and can give to the committee, if they desire it, fuller explanations as to the entries made by him, and the cause of his discontinuance to make them, and the use, if any, which had ever been made of them during his acquaintance with them.

From the preceding testimony, it is manifest that although all the before named records appertain to one "general system," which was devised to secure an independent superintendence of the revenues to the secretary of the treasury, at the same time the execution of the laws for collecting those revenues was committed to subordinate officers. The system has, of late years, been permitted to fall into utter neglect and disuse, 1st, by the total discontinuance of two out of the three books of records of which it consisted; and 2d, by the entire disuse of the third book, though preserved in form.

The following testimony adds to the surprise of this result in the investigation of the committee; that while a part of the important system of the treasury department, designed to guard and preserve the public revenue against speculation and frauds, has been permitted to fall into oblivion, and another fragment of it has been continued to be made to this day; neither the part abandoned nor the part continued has ever been known to, or comprehended, and much less appreciated in use, by either the head or any subordinate clerk of the treasury department.

Thomas Dungan, the clerk in charge of the quarterly book, and referred to in the preceding testimony of Mr. Woodbury, being examined by Mr. Curtis, testified as follows:

Question 10. Have you sufficient knowledge of the nature of the weekly and monthly returns made by the collectors to the secretary of the treasury, so that you can say whether they were not intended both for a check on the collectors, and also to enable the secretary to make estimates?

Answer. I have not. They have, except for three or four years before the burning of the treasury, been kept by other persons.

Question 11. If the weekly and monthly returns would enable the secretary to estimate the amount of money he could calculate upon, would they not also furnish the secretary a check upon the collector, if they were carefully compared with the quarterly return book which you had charge of?

Answer. I cannot tell how that would be, as there has never been any comparison that I know of. They might, if honestly made out.

Question 12. Do you think yourself competent to give an opinion concerning the objects for which the weekly and monthly returns were originally intended, or concerning the use that was made of them by the secretaries, before you had charge of the quarterly book?

Answer. I do not think I am.

Question 13. How did it happen that the entering of the quarterly returns of collectors on the book of quarterly returns in the secretary's office was discontinued, and when was it discontinued?

Answer. I was sick; and when I returned to the office, the quarterly returns were taken from my desk by the auditor's clerk. I went after them; they had been sent to the register's office. I consulted Mr. Anthony; he thought they were not of much use, as credits were so short, and I never entered any more after that. This was the second or third quarter of 1835.

Question 14. When you had the quarterly return book, and when you had charge of the "weekly returns," had you any orders to do any thing with them except to enter them in the books?

Answer. Not any.

Mr. Young, chief clerk in the department of the secretary of the treasury, examined by Mr. Curtis, testified as follows:

Question 22. Can you, or any other clerk of the department known to you, in the department, speak with certainty of the import, effect and meaning of all the entries in the "bond book" under the head of "collector of New York?" Who formerly had charge of it?

Answer. I am not aware of any clerk who is conversant to a sufficient degree with the entries in the book referred to, who could satisfactorily explain them. Having already stated what I believed was the object of requiring the returns which are entered therein, I have never had occasion, myself, to make myself acquainted with the manner in which it was made up. The clerk who kept it for many year died in December last.

William B. Randolph examined by Mr. Curtis.

Question 1. Are you employed in the treasury department? What situation have you held, and what situation do you now hold? How long have you been connected with the treasury department?

Answer. I am employed in the treasury department at this time as chief clerk in the treasury's office, and have been connected with the department in several offices and situations for nearly thirty-one years.

Question 7. From the examination you have made of the "bond book" from the secretary's office, and of the entries therein, can you speak with certainty of the import, effect and meaning of the entries of bonds taken at New York?

Answer. I cannot explain them all satisfactorily to myself.

Mr. Woodbury, secretary of the treasury, examined by Mr. Wise.

Question 23. Is any book of registration, in the nature of a ledger account, or other transcript, made in the department of the secretary of the treasury, of the monthly returns of the collector of the port of New York, of bonds and revenue accruing; by which registration, or other transcript, the balances or differences in said monthly returns can be ascertained without recurring to the original returns? If yes, please exhibit the same for the year 1837 and the first quarter of 1838.

Answer. I am not aware that any book of registration of those returns is now kept up or made in the department. I have not been accustomed to resort to it or examine it, if one is. But when I have had occasion to know the aggregates in any of the weekly or monthly returns after they passed out of my own hands, I have sent for the returns themselves, and obtained the information wanted from them. My impression, at the same time, is, that such a book was formerly kept, into which these aggregates were copied, but that the copying of them has been discontinued: of this fact, however, I cannot speak with certainty without examination. In the great amount of business in my office, and the extraordinary increase of it during the past three or four years, the making up of the records and entries, and the immediate regulation and disposition of the books in which they are made, is, from necessity, devolved on different clerks; and the supervision to see that they are made in season, and in proper cases, must be intrusted, in a great measure, to the chief clerk in the office, under general instructions from the secretary. Whether a similar practice was not always in existence, the older clerks in the office will be able to explain.

James H. Smoot, a clerk in the treasury department, was sworn as a witness.

Examined by Mr. Curtis.

Question 1. Are you a clerk in the office of the secretary of the treasury, and how long have you been such clerk?

Answer. I am. I was made a permanent clerk in the department under the act of June 23, 1836; previous to which I had been employed for some eighteen months or so as a temporary clerk?

Question 2. Have you charge of the weekly or monthly returns of collectors made to the secretary of the treasury?

Answer. I have charge only of abstracts of bonds in suit, and of debentures, which reach the department very irregularly. Such as have reached my desk have been faithfully preserved. It is not in my power to state certainly any thing like a proportion of such as should have been received, being ignorant of the business of the custom houses. I believe they are required once a month. Some of the collectors make returns "none."

Question 3. What are your orders in respect to these returns? Has the secretary ever called for them since in your possession? Are they bound in books, or are they loose and not filed or endorsed?

Answer. My orders were simply to preserve them on taking possession of the desk. I have lately received directions to have them bound, and to continue that practice. I do not recollect that the secretary has ever called for them. I am satisfied he has not. They are loose, and not bound in books. They are not endorsed, save that most of them in lead pencil naming the port.

It seems to be the opinion of the present secretary of the treasury, (under whose administration this important system of record-checks has been permitted to fall into neglect, and almost oblivion,) that the returns of collectors to him, from which it is made, are only for the purpose of enabling him to obtain a vague estimate of the current receipts of the treasury. This may explain his neglect of those returns, although it is not a justification of it. But if this were their acknowledged and sole purpose, it is most apparent, from the testimony before the committee, that such a use of them by the secretary has been but inconsiderable and exceedingly sparing.

The far different use of which they are susceptible, and which was once made of them, is illustrated in the following examination:

The examination of Mr. Randolph by Mr. Curtis. Mr. Curtis exhibited to the witness the following extract:

"The abstraction of the amounts paid on bonds never returned as liquidated, forms about one-half of the entire defalcation of the late collector at New York. Of the other moiety, the two principal items are, cash held on deposit to meet unascertained duties, and cash retained ostensibly to refund duties paid under protest.

"In connexion with the abstraction of those sums, as well as of those paid on bonds, I would observe that, until a few years past, the accounts current received at the office of the first auditor, with the quarterly accounts of collectors, were called for and compared, in the office of the secretary of the treasury, with a record there kept, and with the several returns rendered to the secretary, in conformity with the requisitions of his circular dated the 14th of October, 1815, and repeated on the 14th of November, 1835.

The list of returns thus rendered embraced the following:

- A weekly return of moneys received and paid;
- A monthly return of debentures paid;
- A monthly abstract of bonds put in suit during the month;
- A monthly summary statement of duties collected;
- A monthly schedule of bonds taken and liquidated during the month;
- A quarterly return of the moneys received and paid under the acts for the relief of sick and disabled seamen.

"Those examinations and comparisons would, it is conceived, be greatly useful, and especially when it is considered that the returns thus rendered to the secretary, weekly and monthly, are the only returns of the kind received by the department within or during the current quarter.

"Should it be deemed proper to revive the practice, it is suggested, to obviate the inconvenience and delay, in the office of the first auditor, attending the use, in the office of the secretary, of the accounts current, that the collectors furnish those documents in duplicate.

"I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant, "J. N. BARKER.

"Hon. Levi Woodbury, secretary of the treasury.

Question 8. Will you please to examine the foregoing extract of a letter addressed by the present comptroller to the secretary of the treasury, and say whether or not you concur in the opinion expressed by the comptroller in respect to the utility of the examinations and comparisons mentioned by him, and whether or not one or two intelligent clerks could perform that duty?

Answer. The returns enumerated in the foregoing list, (considering the "statement of duties collected" to be a statement of all duties accruing and secured in the period,) seem to embrace all the items of debit and credit which could arise in the quarter. If they do, it follows that, taken in connexion with the condition of the account for the previous quarter, they would afford the means, by comparison, of ascertaining the general results of the account current for the present quarter. The utility of such comparison would depend upon the advantage gained by knowing general results at an earlier period than they could be obtained from the settled account; and the advantage upon the degree of reliance which could be placed upon the correctness of the returns. Intelligent clerks would be required to carry on this business. The number necessary would depend upon the quantity of details, which I cannot well estimate.

To the same point may be cited Mr. Miller, the first auditor.

Examined by Mr. Dawson.

Question 36. Have the books which were adopted and used by former secretaries of the treasury as checks on collectors of the customs, viz: "Weekly returns of receipts and payments of collectors of the customs," "collectors' quarterly accounts current," and "account of bonds taken and liquidated," been regularly attended to, or have they fallen into disuse and been neglected for the last four or five years?

Answer. There do appear to be some books in the secretary's office that seem to have fallen into disuse for a number of years past. The condition of those in the auditor's office, in regard to the bonds taken at New York, who also suffered to fall back, as has been fully explained.

Question 37. If those books had been regularly kept, would they not have furnished means to detect any defalcation of any collector of customs?

Answer. I have not examined the books alluded to with care, but am of opinion that, if the returns required by the several circulars of the secretaries of the treasury to be made to the department are properly entered and compared with one another, any material error or fraud practised by a collector must be discovered soon thereafter, unless the naval officer and collector and their clerks should combine to defraud the government, by making false returns of the real amount of duties secured within the quarter. The books alluded to, I understand, were used to make entries in, from the said returns.

It is, then, ascribable to a want of proper application and use of the means actually within the reach, and constituting an important feature in the archives of the secretary's department, that the defalcations of Mr. Swartwout escaped detection in that department, as they did in the subordinate departments from like causes. Whenever these means have been used with discrimination, and for the purposes which, in the opinion of the committee, suggested their necessity, (and it is apparent that they were sometimes so used by the present secretary,) they did not fail to lead to useful inquiry and explanation. For instance: in disclosing to the committee portions of official correspondence with Mr. Swartwout, the following letters are of the number, and indicate the practical worth of proper attention to the returns of collectors to the secretary, as checks upon collectors, in conjunction with their use as mere estimates of receipts:

Treasury department, August 17, 1837.

SIR: I perceive in your return No. 31, "of moneys received and paid," for the week ending the 5th instant, the sum of $92,196 35 for payments on account of "revenue cutters and boats, contingencies, &c.;" and also, in the succeeding weekly return, No. 32, the additional sum of $92,009 91 is also charged for similar objects. As expenditures for these objects have been heretofore small, in comparison with these, and as there is some press for money at your port, I will thank you to inform me of the cause of the great increase of expenditures for these purposes. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

LEVI WOODBURY, Secretary of the treasury.

Samuel Swartwout, esq., Collector of the customs, New York.

Custom house, New York, Collector's office, August 19, 1837.

SIR: In your letter of the 17th instant, received this morning, it is stated that in No. 31 of our "weekly returns of moneys," $92,196 35 is charged to payments on account of "revenue cutters and boats, contingencies, &c.;" and in No. 32, $92,009 91 is also charged for similar objects.

I would first observe, respectfully, (to correct an error,) that these sums have been reversed at the department, through mistake, as it will be found on examination of the returns, that in No. 31 the latter amount is given, and in No. 22 the former amount.

With regard to the great increase of these sums, I have to state that it is owing to the amount of treasury drafts, and which are thus explained: On the credit side of the return we enter, as so much money, the amounts received on bonds and cash duties by drafts; and to counterbalance these sums, we charge, on the opposite side, the aggregate amount of the drafts themselves. But there being no express item in the return, to which we could distinctly apply the drafts, they were placed under that of "revenue cutters and boats, contingencies, &c."

This was the only place where we thought proper to put the amount, unless it might be under the item "payments on account of collections;" but even there it would be blended with other sums.

The true amount in No. 31, of payments actually on account of "revenue cutters and boats, contingencies, &c.," is $7,134 17

The amount of treasury drafts $8,159 74

The amount in No. 32, for the same object, is as follows:

$4,096 68
$8,099 67
$92,196 35

If our course should be disapproved, we might, for the present, erase the item "payments in bank to credit of treasurer," and over it write "treasury drafts," and opposite place the amount; or the item might be interlined, as would be best preferred.

I have the honor to remain, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

SAMUEL SWARTWOUT, collector. Hon. Levi Woodbury, secretary of the treasury.

The following is a specimen deduced from the attention in practice of the present secretary, to the monthly returns of the collector at New York to the secretary, and illustrating how effectual these returns are in the detection of deficits, as well as in the estimate of receipts:

Treasury department, March 15, 1838.
 Sir: Perceiving that the amount of duties received at your port during the month of February is much smaller than was anticipated, I will thank you to explain to me the cause, if you can account for it. By the extension of credit for nine months, under the first section of the act of the 16th of October last, those which fell due in the latter part of the month of May preceding would become payable towards the close of February last. Besides, under the second section of the same act, allowing a credit of three and six months upon all merchandise subject to cash duty imported "on or before the 1st day of November," the three months' bonds bearing date the 1st of the last mentioned month would consequently fall due in February. Should the diminution of the anticipated amount of receipts from duties prove to be owing to the default of the obligators in not paying their bonds, you will be pleased to state the amount of such, together with any other facts tending to throw light upon the subject. I am, very respectfully,

LEVI WOODBURY,
 Secretary of the treasury.

*Samuel Swartwout, esq.,
 Collector of the customs, New York.*

*Custom house, New York.
 Collector's office, March 17, 1838.*

Sir: In answer to your letter of the 15th instant, inquiring into the causes of the discrepancy between the amount of duties received at this port during the month of February last, and the amount that was anticipated, I have to observe that whatever difference exists has arisen out of some error in estimating the amount payable, and not from any actual or material difference between the amount accruing and the amount paid.

Of the bonds which fell due from the 16th to the 31st May last, there were extended $290,000
 Of this sum, there have been put in suit 15,000
 Thus leaving 275,000
 Under the second section of the act of 16th October last, there were taken and paid, due in February $110,000
 385,000

The ordinary three months' bonds taken in November last, and due and paid in February, were 75,000
 Total, $460,000

By the above, it appears that the bonds which were payable in February have been collected, with the exception of an amount of $15,000, which has been put in suit; and that the whole amount payable did not amount to $500,000.

The residue of our receipts, as per the returns in February, were composed of cash duties, bonds in suit paid, and interest on extended bonds. I have the honor, &c.

SAMUEL SWARTWOUT, collector.

Hon. Levi Woodbury, secretary of the treasury.

In the opinion of the committee, had the same scrutiny of Mr. Swartwout's returns to the secretary been uniformly made in his office, as by the preceding letters it is apparent was made occasionally, the legitimate purposes of those returns would have been accomplished, and Swartwout's defalcations could not have escaped detection beyond the termination of the first quarter in which they originated.

It may be remarked, that in the testimony of the secretary, as of that of this chief clerk, which repudiates the use (on the ground of there being valueless to detect defalcations) of the records deemed so essential in the opinion of so many individuals who have preceded themselves in office, there is to be found also the proof that no use of these records had, at any time prior to Swartwout's defalcation, been attempted by the secretary, or any other person in office under him. While, therefore, the one branch of this testimony seeks to found an opinion that is to serve as an apology for the neglect of a palpable duty, the other branch divests that opinion of all claim to actual experience in the use of the thing it repudiates and must proportionally weaken any reliance that otherwise might be placed upon it.

In this connexion, it should also be remarked, that, since the discovery of Mr. Swartwout's defalcations, the same comparisons for which the neglected records in the secretary's department are believed by the committee to have been instituted, have been revived for future observance by the secretary. The results of negligence, and not those of experience, have been the sources from whence lessons of prudence have been derived, but too expensively to the government in this instance. The subjoined answer to the eighteenth interrogatory propounded to Mr. Woodbury by Mr. Wise elucidates these particulars:

"The entry of the amount of the quarterly accounts of collectors in a book was discontinued in November, 1835, and is stated by the auditor to have happened in consequence of one of his clerks not sending them for that purpose to the clerk keeping the book here, because they were detained by him too long.

"But this discontinuance was never reported to the secretary of the treasury, either by the auditor, or the clerk keeping the book, till last November or December. When it was reported, I deemed it proper, till congress made some legal provision on the subject, to adopt their suggestions, and ascertain if any benefit would result from such comparisons. I therefore requested the auditor himself to report to me weekly, not only the balances on the accounts as rendered, (which alone did not seem likely to afford much aid in detecting faults, if a comparison was instituted), but to report the balances found due on the final settlements. And I have since requested him to report explanations as to those balances when large or unusual.

"Whether, after this, any comparisons in my own office, between those and the weekly abstracts which I have directed to be made, will ever lead to any detection of such defaults as escape the accounting officers, is somewhat problematical, for reasons stated in document No. 69.

"But I deemed the effort proper, under the opinions expressed by those officers."

The foregoing testimony renders it certain that a revival of the comparisons resorted to under other administrations of the department, is now made designedly. The whole testimony is equally explicit that the records for such comparisons were not discontinued designedly, but little by little, through the slow and dull process of oversight and neglect—oversight in regard to the value, and neglect in regard to the actual use of the records.

It was undoubtedly by means here adverted to that Mr. McLane, while secretary of the treasury, was induced to call for an explanation of Mr. Swartwout, of a large outstanding balance which appeared upon his quarterly account at one period. In the testimony of Mr. Shultz, former auditor of the custom house under Mr. Swartwout, answer 6, the circumstance is thus adverted to:

"Soon after Mr. L. McLane came into office as secretary of the treasury, he sent to the comptroller for the account current of the collector of New York for the preceding quarter, and observing therein a large balance due to the United States, he wrote to Mr. Swartwout a letter, the substance of which was—'Mr. Collector, I perceive by your last account current that you are indebted to the United States in a large sum. Please to deposit that sum in the Branch bank to the credit of the treasurer of the United States, and send on the receipt therefor without delay.' Mr. Swartwout referred this letter to me, with the request that I would give an account of that balance, saying he was not aware of being indebted to the United States in any sum. I took the necessary custom house books home with me, sat up a great part of the night, and rendered an account of every item making this balance. This account was next morning sent to the secretary of the treasury, who, not understanding the manner in which the custom house books were kept, sent this statement to the comptroller's office, with the request that it might be examined by the comptroller of the collector's department, and be reported to the secretary. The statement was found correct of the items of the balance, without a difference of a single cent. This same statement is probably now in the office of the secretary of the treasury, if not burnt."

The great probability that an habitual recourse by the secretary of the treasury to a condensed record of the accounts of collectors, such as was heretofore kept in the secretary's department, would laterly, as it did in the days of Mr. McLane, have arrested the attention of a prudent and energetic officer, may be readily estimated by the extraordinary manner in which the quarterly balances of Mr. Swartwout's accounts for "cash retained" and for "amount of duties credited and not yet paid, and suspended accounts," have been permitted to grow and enlarge, unchecked, within the last few years. The following is an illustration, not of what came to the knowledge of the present secretary, but of what would have reached him had "the records" of his office been perpetuated, estimated and used.

By the testimony of Mr. Fleming, auditor of the custom house, (see committee's journal), it appears that Mr. Swartwout had charged to the government, in his accounts, items as follows:

1st quarter, 1835. "Amount of duties credited and not yet paid"	$206,919 09
2d quarter. "Amount of duties credited and not yet paid"	295,416 84
3d quarter. "Amount of duties credited and not yet paid"	553,178 74
4th quarter. "Amount of duties credited and not yet paid, suspended accounts, &c."	274,343 43
1st quarter, 1836. "Amount of unsettled duties on deposit, unsettled accounts, &c."	543,204 67
2d quarter. "Amount of unsettled duties on deposit, unsettled accounts, &c."	856,019 93
3d quarter. "Amount of unsettled duties on deposit, unsettled accounts, &c."	1,053,531 57
4th quarter "Amount of unsettled duties on deposit, unsettled accounts, &c."	1,168,116 44
1st quarter, 1837. "Amount of unsettled duties on deposit, unsettled accounts, &c."	675,695 43
2d quarter. "Amount of unsettled accounts, duties on deposits, &c."	577,493 22
3d quarter. "Amount of unsettled accounts, duties on deposit, &c."	516,331 06
4th quarter. "Amount of unsettled and suspense accounts"	532,396 69

And, in the same quarterly accounts, the following items:

"Cash retained the 31st March, 1835"	70,882 46
"Cash retained the 30th June, 1835"	56,111 32
"Cash retained the 30th Sept. 1835"	14,083 19
"Cash retained the 31st Dec. 1835"	108,349 17
"Cash retained 31st March, 1836"	145,675 02
"Cash retained June 30th, 1836"	159,933 68
"Cash retained September 30th, 1836"	152,579 43
"Cash retained December 31st, 1836"	38,763 55
"Amount retained March 31st, 1837"	31,528 01
"Amount retained June 30th, 1837"	117,842 15
"Amount retained Sept. 30th, 1837"	49,295 54
"Amount retained December, 31st, 1837"	79,231 56

The fact that the incumbents of the two accounting offices in the treasury were, as represented in the annexed examination of the secretary of the treasury, borne down by age and infirmity, furnishes, perhaps, some explanation why less attention was devoted to the extraordinary balances contained in Mr. Swartwout's preceding quarterly and weekly returns than otherwise might have been in those offices; but the same consideration, notorious as it was, would seem to have demanded greater watchfulness and particularity in the principal superintendent of the revenue, the secretary himself.

Mr. Woodbury examined by Mr. Owens.

Question 25. Who held the offices of first auditor and comptroller at the time these defalcations, or the greater part of them, occurred? Were you personally acquainted with them? Were they competent, physically and mentally, to discharge the duties of their respective offices? Did you ever suggest to the president of the United States the great importance of having competent men in those offices, and the circumstances under which you made the suggestion?

Answer. Judge Anderson held the office of comptroller for many years previous to 1836, and resigned, I think, in the summer of that year.—Richard Harrison, esq. also held the office of first auditor a great number of years before November, 1836, when he also resigned. I was well acquainted with them after 1834. They were both gentlemen very much advanced in life—I think over seventy years of age; and they had suffered (and especially the former one) from the infirmities incident to their great age and long continued labors. But they were both men of much worth and fidelity; and hence, though less able than in former years to meet the calls on them of the usual business of their respective bureaus, and much more the increasing calls and business of 1835, and especially 1836, the department felt reluctant to see their removal on account of the complaints and similarities made of their increasing infirmities and disabilities. But after several conferences on the subject with the president, I understood that they both agreed to resign, and did so at the time mentioned; but without the slightest complaint or reproach as to their integrity and disposition, while in office, to exert all the vigilance, energy and labor, of which they were capable.

From the following testimony of William B. Randolph, now chief clerk in the office of the treasurer, it appears that balances so extraordinary were sufficient to arrest the attention and excite the astonishment of subordinates in office.

Examined by Mr. Curtis.

Question 2. Have you, at any time, while employed in the comptroller's office, examined the quarterly returns of Samuel Swartwout, late collector of New York? If yes, for what year were these returns which you examined; and was there any feature in the accounts which attracted your attention?

Answer. During parts of the years 1835 and 1836 I was employed in the comptroller's office to revise the accounts of collectors north of the Potomac; among them, the accounts of Samuel Swartwout, late collector of New York. His accounts for the last quarters of 1835 and the account for the first quarter of 1836 passed under my inspection; in these I noticed the large and increasing balances of cash on hand, amounting on the 31st March, 1836, to nearly $700,000, for which I was not aware of any sufficient reason.

Question 3. Do you mention this fact to any person, and to whom?

Answer. I spoke of this circumstance frequently among my fellow clerks as affording Mr. Swartwout a fine opportunity for accommodating his friends, and perhaps benefiting himself; and I feel confident that I mentioned the fact to Mr. Laub, the then chief clerk, who frequently acted as comptroller; but I did not otherwise speak of it in a manner calculated to excite the attention of my superiors.

The house will discover, by recurring to the form of weekly record of the returns from collectors, formerly kept in the secretary's office, so minute was the care then deemed essential to the security of the revenue, that one column was devoted specially to recording the day on which such weekly returns were received at the department. A day's omission of duty in these returns then, was liable to immediate detection. In the care with which Mr. Gallatin, while secretary of the treasury, enjoined the duty of collectors to have their returns "brought regularly the last day of the week, and include only the whole of the receipts of payments for the entire week, the said last day included," may also be appreciated by recurring to the circular of that energetic and distinguished financier, also given in the early part of this division of the committee's report. How effectually this same scrutiny would have checked the earliest misuse of public money by Mr. Swartwout is apparent, when it is considered that the whole of it was covered up and concealed prior to 1837 by uniformly omitting in his weekly returns the official receipts of Saturday, and not forwarding his returns until the following Monday, and frequently not until Tuesday of the succeeding week, thus giving the receipts of from two to four days, with which he replaced his prior deficits. The mistaken estimate by the present secretary of the utility of this precision on the part of the treasury, is easily measured by the advantage which is now seen to have been taken by Mr. Swartwout of the absence of it. The practice of Swartwout, in this particular, will be found illustrated in the following examination of Mr. Phillips, late assistant cashier of the customs; and the indulgence of it, through the negligence or want of a just estimate of it, by the present secretary of the treasury, is no less clearly brought to view in the testimony which is also subjoined hereto.

Mr. Phillips examined by Mr. Curtis.

Question 33. In your statement, contained in your letter of the 9th of November, 1838, addressed to Mr. Griffin, you say, at the close of the letter; "by reference to the weekly returns made to the treasury department, it will be seen that large amounts were frequently retained, under the name of 'amount due the United States, to be carried to next return,' which accounts have the signature of Mr. Swartwout; and, in many instances, would not be forwarded until Tuesday, in order that the collections of Saturday and Monday might place him in funds to make the transfer from his account to that of the treasury of the United States." Please state whether it was a frequent practice to delay the weekly returns required by the secretary to be made on Saturday, and not to send them forward until Tuesday; and when that practice began?

Answer. It was the rule of the office to make up the weekly return early on Monday of each week, and it embraced all the collections of bonds up to Friday afternoon; consequently, the bonds falling due on Saturday and Sunday, and payable on Saturday, would not appear on the account until the following week. It was the frequent practice to delay the weekly return until Tuesday; and it commenced, I think, in 1833 or 1834.

Question 34. Until the banks suspended specie payments, and the collector was ordered to withdraw the bonds from the banks and collect them at the custom house, was it not the practice of Mr. Swartwout to pay over to the credit of the treasurer of the United States, weekly, nearly all the money in his hands; and does not this appear from the weekly returns?

Answer. It was the practice, until the banks suspended specie payments, for Mr. Swartwout to pay over to the credit of the treasurer of the United States, weekly, nearly all the money in his hands; and it does appear in the weekly returns. After the suspension of specie payments, Mr. Swartwout retained all the moneys collected in his own hands, (except $70,000 in specie, transferred to the credit of the treasurer), and the same continued to accumulate until he retired from office.

Mr. Woodbury examined by Mr. Curtis.

Question 25. Do you remember to have noticed that Swartwout got into the practice, during the last year or two of his term of office, of omitting to despatch his weekly returns from the custom house until Tuesday?

Answer. I do not remember to have noticed any general change on that subject; nor should I be likely either to notice the difference of a single day in their arrival at the office, or the alterations in the mode of transportation by the mail, and in its general speed, and the interruptions in the mode of arrival, have been frequent, and accidents both in the custom house and the post office in New York and this city may occasionally affect the arrival or delivery of the letter here for twenty-four hours. But from so large a port as New York, and especially since the suspension of specie payments, I should notice two or three days' omission. The times, or days, when the returns were actually mailed or despatched, do not appear on the face of the returns; and the wrappers showing when the package was mailed, but not always with accuracy the day it was left in the post office, and thus despatched by the collector, are not taken off and inspected by me, but are removed by a messenger; after that, the returns themselves are examined by me in person.

Question 29. During the time Mr. Swartwout was acting as collector, did you regard the "weekly returns of cash received and paid out at the custom house," as including the cash paid for bonds and cash duties on the several Saturdays on which those returns are dated?

Answer. If my attention was ever turned to that particular point, I could state what my opinion was, provided it was expressed in writing; but I do not remember that the question ever arose. Looking, however, to the circular requesting the weekly returns, and to the period when the return are received at this office, I should suppose they were intended to embrace the receipts of Saturday, as well as every other day in the week.

Question 30. If the weekly returns included only the cash received for bonds paid, and cash duties received up to Friday, inclusive, on what day thereafter might those returns ordinarily have come into your hands, as the mails have run for the last two years?

Answer. If they were made out after the close of business on Friday, and mailed the next night, they could reach here by Sunday or Monday evening, I suppose; though my recollection as to the speed of the mails, or the hours of departure of them from New York, during the whole of the two years, is not very accurate. They would, then, if delivered punctually at the post office here to the messenger, reach my office Monday or Tuesday morning. But I think they are not generally received in the office here till Wednesday morning.

There is another feature in the policy which appears to have been pursued by the secretary of the treasury towards Mr. Swartwout, which is deserving the consideration of the house. It consists in the fact, that while the secretary, through the comptroller, acquiesced in the claim of Mr. Swartwout to retain, under pretence of indemnity for duties to be refunded by him to merchants who had paid them to him under protest, the large sum of $201,000, he acceded to the provision of money by the comptroller for the successor of Mr. Swartwout to refund those same duties. It is true that, on being informed by the successor of Mr. Swartwout that he had borrowed of the latter the sum of $25,000 for the purpose of these payments, the secretary, under date of April 21, 1838, expressed a hope, in reply, "that Mr. Swartwout would consider that a sum as a payment to that extent on account of the" $201,000 due the United States then in his hands. It is likewise true that, being informed, on the 21st of May following, by the successor of Mr. Swartwout, that the $25,000 borrowed of the latter had been repaid, the secretary, under date of June 12, expressed himself as follows: "The duties refunded under old protests will, it is hoped, be paid by your successor out of the money he retains for his indemnity."

It is not clear, from any evidence attainable by the committee from the secretary of the treasury, or any other treasury officer, what moneys were refunded by Mr. Swartwout's successor, upon the before named claims. But it is manifest, from the correspondence, that the sum thus in effect permitted to be drawn a second time from the public moneys is of large amount, and that Mr. Swartwout was compelled to contribute towards it a sum only equal to $5,000. It is difficult to perceive a proceeding more strongly characterized by the absence of that energy and vigilance which are essential at all times to the security of the public treasury, and most desirable of all to be found in the head of the financial department of the government.

While the committee entertain the opinion that cases of defalcation among revenue officers may arise, respecting which the secretary of the treasury ought not to be regarded as in any degree in fault, they are far from believing that cases of defalcations may not arise, in which the secretary should be regarded as alike responsible with his subordinate accounting officers. A just principle is believed to have been advanced upon this subject by the committee of the house of representatives appointed to examine into the condition of the treasury in 1801. In the report of that committee it is said: "It is the immediate duty of the comptroller to superintend the adjusting of the public accounts, and to direct prosecutions for all delinquencies of officers of the revenue, and for debts due to the United States, though the secretary, in virtue of the authority as superintendent of the collection of the revenue, would be also responsible for the permission of any neglect or abuse of trust in the officers of the revenue, and receiver of public moneys, after the same should come to his knowledge." The knowledge of Swartwout's defalcation by the superintendent of the revenue, and to each accounting officer of the treasury, cannot surely be controverted after the period when it was known that $201,000 had been retained by him under the pretence of refunding protest money, and that he had, notwithstanding, so neglected and refused to apply the fund, as to compel the treasury of the United States to satisfy the same protests from its separate and subsequently accruing resources.

The committee will further to recapitulate here the extraordinary submissiveness and want of energy that are betrayed by the secretary of the treasury, in his tolerance, without known complaint made to the executive, of the retention and use of the public moneys collected by the present collector at New York for collected or imposed against, and under the protests of merchants. The correspondence between the secretary and said collector on this subject has been already incorporated in detail in a prior division of this report, relating to the correctness of the returns of the collector, and need not again be presented. But it is most apparent, from that correspondence, that such retention and use of the public money by said collector is not only against the letter and spirit of the revenue laws, but also against the solemn opinions of duty communicated to the collector, of the secretary of the treasury, and of the attorney general of the United States. And yet the collector is permitted to execute the law only as he understands it. In fact, as well as in example, this submission of the higher to the subordinate officers charged with a due execution of the laws, is derogatory of the government and most pernicious to the public interests. It is believed that the secretary of the treasury, for immediate correction, whether regard be had to the honor of the government or to the security of the public money.

From the preceding evidence, the committee report as established facts:

1st. That, of late years, important books of record, designed to contain a condensed statement of the accounts and liabilities of collectors of customs, weekly, monthly and quarterly, have been permitted to fall into disuse in the department of the secretary of the treasury, and thereby render nugatory many of the essential checks upon the defalcations of that class of officers, arising from existing laws and treasury regulations.

2d. The negligence and failure of the secretary of the treasury to discharge his duty as the head of the treasury department, charged by law with the superintendence of the collection of the revenue, and his want of a correct appreciation of the before named records in the superintendence of the collection of the public revenues, and the consequent neglect to continue and complete them, are justly regarded as a primary cause of the escape from defalcation, for so long a period, of the immense defalcations of the late collector at the port of New York.

3d. That the secretary of the treasury has been acting in a proper discharge of his duty in office, permitting Samuel Swartwout, late collector of the city of New York, quietly to retain the sum of $201,000, now being out of office, under pretext of indemnifying himself against claims of importers for duties in him under protest, and liable by him to be returned, while it was known to the secretary, within a few weeks thereafter, that said Swartwout was neglecting to refund such protest moneys, as he pledged to do, and that the same was being refunded, from necessity, out of other accruing resources of the government, by said Swartwout's successor in office.

4th. That the secretary of the treasury has been acting in a proper discharge of his duty in office, permitting the present collector at New York to retain, under his own control, and subject to his own use, commingled with said collector's private funds, large and accumulating sums of the public moneys, collected for duties paid under protest, and against the declared opinion of said secretary, and the declared opinion of the attorney general of the United States on the subject, also, against all former orders of the department, and instead of causing the same to be paid into the treasury of the United States.

PART II.

THE DEFALCATIONS OF WILLIAM M. PRICE. The extent of the defalcations of Mr. Price, as district attorney, is found in the testimony of B. F. Butler, esq., his successor in office, to be $72,124 36; and, however, in all probability, to some other illegal services not yet rendered in the charges of Mr. Price.

The subjoined extract from the testimony of Mr. Butler presents the results of his own examination into the subject. The committee is unable to comprehend, however, the practicability of any concealment by the district attorney, respecting suits commenced, or suits discontinued, by payment of services, from the knowledge of the solicitor of the treasury, for any period much exceeding the vacation between terms of the district and circuit courts in any state, provided clerks of courts, marshals and collectors, are properly held up to a discharge of their respective duties by the solicitor, and provided due diligence is used in the solicitor's office in comparing the periodical and frequent returns to him required by law of these several officers. It is unnecessary to recapitulate here the requirements of the law in these particulars, and the duties of the solicitor arising therefrom, as they will be understood in the sequel.

It does not appear that the returns actually made by Mr. Price were untrue, but all the returns required by law to be made were not made; and this act must have been detected in each case at the receipt of the office, if the comparison expressly required by law, of returns made there, had been made with proper care. For instance: the case of the United States vs. Bancker, particularized by Mr. Butler, must have been originally, and for many terms, certified by the clerk of the court to the solicitor as a suit pending. When it ceased to be pending, it ceased to be certified, of course; and then due diligence on the part of the solicitor could have detected the fact, and held the attorney immediately accountable.

The discharge of Treadwell in 1835, on which Mr. Price received $5,000, was made on terms prescribed by the treasury department; and it is presumed that it must, of course, have been conducted through the solicitor's office, as such is the requirement of law. Is it possible due diligence on the part of the solicitor would not have laid sight of an order upon the records, when it had specially directed that no order upon so large a sum, even though the attorney had neglected to report upon it?

The same remarks are equally applicable to each of the other cases, wherein Mr. Price is a defaulter, and wherein he omitted to make report to the solicitor.

It will be observed that Mr. Butler says, it appears that in January and February, 1837, Mr. Price received $9,646 07, and in May, 1837, $6,051 11, on custom house bonds, no part of which has ever been paid.

The solicitor of the treasury, in his testimony, says: "the clerk of the district court, during the year 1837, reported two hundred and forty-one bonds put in suit by the district attorney. On a comparison of the returns with the returns of the district attorney, on bonds put in suit, so as to ascertain what the legal proceedings, it appeared that judgment had been entered on all but fifty-two bonds; of those forty-four came within the provisions of the second section of the act of 19th March, 1836, for the relief of the sufferers by fire, and the suits thereon were accordingly discontinued; of the remaining eight, seven bonds are reported as put in suit on the 25th January, 1837, and one on the 5th April, 1837. On these eight bonds, the clerk does not report that judgments were recovered by the district attorney, who, therefore, remains charged with them."

Now, if the money received by Mr. Price in January, February and May, of 1837, was received on any of these last named eight suits, (as, probably, it must have been, inasmuch as the solicitor says, in his testimony, all the bonds reported by the collector as transferred to the district attorney had been reported on and accounted for by the latter), and, as the clerk of the court, in his report, it is difficult to attribute the escape of Mr. Price's defalcations for these sums to any thing but negligence on the part of the solicitor of the treasury. The suits having been once reported as pending, the suits having been certified in like manner, at each successive term of the court; or omitted altogether, because settled, or otherwise, in the attorney's report. The law requires each report to include suits pending as well as suits concluded. If they were reported as concluded, vigilance by the solicitor would have detected the fact, and held the attorney responsible for them at the return day of the execution; if not reported as pending or concluded, vigilance would equally soon have detected the fact, and sought an explanation. His defalcation on these eight suits, and the want of information concerning them at the solicitor's office, are attributable, therefore, to a negligent administration of the duties of that office, in the opinion of the committee, and find no apology in any defect of the existing laws.

Extract from the testimony of B. F. Butler, esq. Having had no knowledge or information of Mr. Price's conduct as a receiver of public moneys, until since his departure from the city in December last, I am not able to state the causes which led to his defalcation, nor have I formed any decided opinion on that subject; but I have become acquainted, since I have been in office, with some circumstances which appear to have enabled him to receive and retain public moneys, without being liable to be called to a prompt settlement therefor, and which I regard as among the causes that led to his defalcation. First, and principally, by the circular of the solicitor of the treasury, dated July 27, 1830, district attorneys whose custom house bond shall desire to discharge part of the whole, of his debt previous to judgment, may request him to pay the money to the collector, who delivered the bond for suit, taking the same to him and handing over to the district attorney proper receipts therefor; but if, instead of paying the money to the collector, as requested, the obligor makes a tender of the whole amount due the government to the district attorney, he is to receive the same, and forthwith to deposit it in bank to the credit of the collector who delivered the bond for suit; or, if there be no bank near in which government deposits are made, to pay the amount to such collector. Pursuant to these instructions, I understand that Mr. Hamilton, the predecessor of Mr. Price, always referred persons applying for this to pay bonds received from the collector of this to the collector's office; and that Mr. Price generally pursued the same course until some time in the year 1837. It appears from his registers, in the year 1837, that he received payment, in the winter of 1836-'37, he received payment, in several instances, on bonds in suit or judgment; and that, in the spring or summer of 1837, he practiced receiving payment at his office on custom house bonds delivered to him for collection became a settled one. In this way public moneys, to a large amount, were brought into his hands, and he was exposed to temptations, and they to hazards, which would not have existed had the former usage been kept up, especially as neither the collector nor the officers of the treasury department could generally know, except from Mr. Price's own reports, what payments were made to him on this account. More than two-thirds of the sum for this account. More than two-thirds of the sum for this account. More than two-thirds of the sum for this account.

This practice also enabled him to retain this money in his hands for a considerable time before paying them over. Several of the payments made by him to the collector during the year 1838, were after a delay of one or two months, and I have found one case in which he held $3,849 57 for ten months.

Secondly. In suits on treasury transcripts, and in litigated cases generally, and in proceedings of a special nature, the treasury officers have no means of knowing officially, except from the report of the district attorney, what moneys are received by him. This enables an unfaithful or careless officer to retain money in his hands, and exposes them to loss. Mr. Price's defalcation commenced with cases of this nature.

The first instance of official delinquency which I have discovered, was in not paying over to the collector of Boston any part of the sum of $2,500 received by Mr. Price on the 17th June, 1835, from Evert A. Bancker, assignee of Scoville & Birbeck, against whom a chancery suit had been brought for the purpose of recovering a balance due to the United States on a custom house bond executed by Scoville and others. This chancery suit had been pending for several years, and the officers at Boston had no knowledge of the progress made in it, except from the communications of the district attorney. It was only during the last week that I ascertained from Mr. Bancker the fact of the above payment, no entry of it being found in the register of Mr. Price; and I have reason to believe that it was never made known to the collector of Boston. On the 7th September, 1835, Mr. Price received from Ephraim Treadwell, of this city, on his discharge as an insolvent debtor, pursuant to an order of the secretary of the treasury, the sum of $5,000. This money was not paid over, nor was the fact of its payment, nor of the discharge of Treadwell, communicated to the treasury department. In October of the same year, Mr. Price appears, from his register, to have received about $1,066 in two chancery suits then pending, in which the United States were interested, and which sums have never been paid over. His defalcation, prior to December, 1836, according to the information in my possession, was confined almost exclusively to the sums above mentioned. In December, 1836, he appears to have received $1,228 97; in January and February, 1837, $9,646 07; and in May, 1837, $6,051 11, on custom house bonds, no part of which has ever been paid over. This increased his defalcation to about $25,000, at which it appears to have remained until after the 1st April, 1838; between which time and the 5th day of December, 1838, it was extended to about the sum of $72,124 36, above mentioned.

I am not able to state whether or not Mr. Price made all the returns to the treasury department at Washington required by his duty and the instructions of the solicitor; but I have reason to believe that, when suits were commenced on bonds, they were generally reported; and that the returns of custom house bonds in suit were regularly made to the solicitor up to the end of the last September term of the district court.

But there is a cause auxiliary to that of inefficiency or negligence in the administration of the department of the solicitor of the treasury, to which are ascribable the incipient impulses of Mr. Price's defalcation. It is to be found in the pecuniary irresponsibility and want of trustworthiness, as a professional man, at the time of his appointment to the office of district attorney in 1834, by president Jackson, as also at the time of his reappointment in 1838, by president Van Buren. To these characteristics of Mr. Price appear to have been added, at each period of his appointment in the capacity from which he was selected. The subjoined proof establishes the fact.

Question 4. Did you know William M. Price, late district attorney of the United States, and his general reputation for pecuniary responsibility? What has been that reputation for fifteen years past?

Answer. I have known him for the period mentioned, and during the time have understood him to be entirely without pecuniary responsibility.

Question 10. Are you acquainted with William M. Price, late district attorney of the United States? If yes, please state whether he was regarded, before and after his appointment, as a man worthy to be intrusted with collection of large sums of money?

Answer. I am acquainted with William M. Price, late district attorney, and answer the question in the negative.

Russell H. Nevins, called and examined by Mr. Owens.

Question 5. What was the reputation of Wm. M. Price for pecuniary responsibility at the time of his late appointment as district attorney of the United States?

Answer. It was, in my estimation, and according to the best of my knowledge, the general opinion that he was utterly unworthy of any pecuniary credit. I have known Mr. Price upwards of thirty years.

Question 6. How long has Mr. Price been thus regarded in your community?

Answer. My opinion of him has been the same for the last twenty years. With the public, he may have gained something in the course of the last few years, prior to his late departure.

Question 7. Do you say that Price's reputation had improved any before his appointment as district attorney of the United States?

Answer. Not to my knowledge.

George A. Worth, cashier of the City bank of New York.

Examined by Mr. Curtis.

Question 4. Were you acquainted with William M. Price, late district attorney of the United States? If yes, what was his general reputation for pecuniary responsibility prior to, and at the time of, his late appointment as district attorney? Was Mr. Price regarded in this community as trustworthy in pecuniary matters?

Answer. I was acquainted with Mr. Wm. M. Price. My impression is, that Mr. Price's responsibility, in a pecuniary point of view, was very light. Prior to his appointment as district attorney, his name would have had no weight in bank.

Question 5. Was Mr. Price's reputation such that you would have felt justified in intrusting him with the collection and receipt of money for the City bank, prior to and at the time of his late appointment as district attorney of the United States?

Answer. I was not at the time alluded to, sufficiently acquainted with Mr. Price to have done so without first making the necessary inquiries.

Question 6. Was it not notorious in the community at the time of Mr. Price's appointment as district attorney of the United States, and before that time, that he was regardless of pecuniary obligations?

Answer. I have no distinct knowledge that will authorize me to answer that question. How Mr. Price may have stood in pecuniary matters with others I know not.

Question 7. You are asked concerning the common report, the general reputation, in respect to Mr. Price, and not concerning your own knowledge of him. Would you, (if it had been within the scope of your duties as cashier of the City bank,) relying upon the general reputation of Mr. Price, at the time above alluded to, have intrusted him with the collection and receipt of any considerable sum of money for your bank?

Answer. No.

James B. Murray, late president of the Morris canal company, called by Mr. Owens.

Examined by Mr. Curtis.

Question 5. Were you acquainted with William M. Price, late district attorney of the United States? If yes, how long? Was Mr. Price prior to, and at the time of, his late appointment to said office, regarded in this community as worthy of confidence in pecuniary matters?

Answer. I have been acquainted with Mr. Price for thirty years, and have never known him to be considered as of much pecuniary responsibility prior to his being appointed district attorney.

Question 6. Would you, as a merchant, have regarded it as safe and prudent to place demands in his hands for collection, when, in the course of business, the money to any considerable amount would have passed into his hands.

Answer. I should never have employed Mr. Price to have collected any demand for me involving the necessity of a large sum of money passing through his hands.

George Griswold, merchant, called by Mr. Owens.

Examined by Mr. Curtis.

Question 2. Were you acquainted with William M. Price, late district attorney of the United States? If yes, how long have you known him, and what was his reputation in this community for pecuniary responsibility at the time of, and prior to, his appointment to said office?

Answer. I think I have been acquainted with him for about fifteen years. I should think he had as little reputation for pecuniary responsibility as any man you could find. I should say his reputation was decidedly bad; I never saw the day when I would trust him with two hundred dollars.

Question 3. Was Mr. Price's reputation such at the time of his late appointment, in this community, that you should have regarded it safe and prudent to intrust him with the collection and receipt of any considerable sum of money?

Answer. Certainly not.

Jonathan Goodhue, merchant, called by Mr. Owens.

Examined by Mr. Curtis.

Question 3. Were you acquainted with William M. Price, late district attorney of New York? If yes, what was his reputation for pecuniary responsibility at the time and prior to his appointment to said office? You are not asked for your own knowledge, but of the general report in this community, concerning Mr. Price's pecuniary responsibility.

Answer. I have known Mr. Price for many years, but not in the way of meeting him frequently. From what I understood of his business in his profession, and of his inheritance from his father's estate, and, on the other hand, of his habits of expenditure, I did not suppose his pecuniary responsibility was of much account, if, indeed, of any.

Question 4. From what you knew of Mr. Price, and his general character in the community, would you have considered it prudent, at any time, to intrust him with the collection of notes or bonds, to any considerable amount, if the money was to pass into his own hands?

Answer. I should not have considered it prudent to do so.

John Ward, broker, called by Mr. Owens.

Examined by Mr. Curtis.

Question 5. Were you acquainted with William M. Price, late district attorney of the United States? If yes, how long have you known him? What was his reputation for pecuniary responsibility at the time of and prior to his appointment to said office?

Answer. A slight acquaintance for a year or two past. He was generally considered without pecuniary responsibility.

Question 9. Have you, or not, known his general reputation for a longer period, and for many years past?

Answer. I consider his general reputation has been exceptional for many years, and I have known it for many years.

Question 10. Would you, as a broker and man of business, have regarded it safe and prudent to have trusted Mr. Price with the collection and receipt of any considerable sum of money?

Answer. I should not.

David Clarkson, president of the Brooklyn (late deposit) bank.

Examined by Mr. Curtis.

Question 1. Were you acquainted with William M. Price, late district attorney of the United States? and how long have you known him?

Answer. For many years.

Question 2. For the last ten years, or prior to and at the time of his taking said office, what was his reputation in this community for fidelity and responsibility in pecuniary transactions? Would you have deemed it safe and prudent to intrust him with your business, if your money were consequently to pass into his hands?

Answer. Since I have known him I have been, myself, unfavorably impressed as to his standing; and his pecuniary responsibility secure that I should have considered my property insecure in his hands.

While it is not deemed by the committee within the scope of its legitimate province to investigate the causes "which have disturbed the right course of appointment, and have placed or continued power in unfaithful or incompetent hands," the conviction is irresistible, that, in the case of Mr. Price, as well as in that of Mr. Swartwout, they have resulted in immense losses of the public money, alike disreputable to the government and demoralizing to the country. And, from the testimony in the case, the committee find the following facts established:

1st. That William M. Price, as district attorney, is a defaulter to the government in a large amount.

2d. That his defalcations are attributable to the notorious irresponsibility and want of character of said Price at the periods of his appointment and re-appointment, and during his entire terms of office; and to the continued neglect of the proper and efficient discharge of duties as the office of the solicitor of the treasury, by the late and present incumbents of that office.

PART III.

THE CORRECTNESS OF THE RETURNS WHICH HAVE BEEN MADE BY THE PRESENT COLLECTOR AND NAVAL OFFICER OF THE PORT OF NEW YORK, RESPECTIVELY.

So far as this inquiry related to the returns of the naval officer, no impediment was started or encountered from any source. And, considering that nearly two thirds of the whole revenue of the government passes into the hands of the collector of this port; and considering the natural, and by no means unworthy, distrust that has of late pervaded, and still pervades, the public mind in relation to the safety and proper disposition of so large a portion of the government funds as are managed, while in transit to the treasury, by him; and considering, more especially, how free and well prepared, as a general rule, every officer intrusted with the delicate task of conducting the money concerns of the people should be to lay bare to the public gaze, at any time when called upon for the purpose by even the semblance of competent authority, if all as it should be in the department of such officer; the committee regret extremely that they were not equally successful in pursuing their inquiry into the correctness of the returns which have been made by this collector, as into those of the naval officer. But they feel constrained to say, that, of the part of the collector, there was a sensitiveness manifested upon the subject of their inquiry wholly incompatible with the high bearing that ordinary characters pure dictates and conscious integrity and wholly at variance with the obligations of duty imposed upon him by his station. The hope is indulged, however, that, in this case, it may have proceeded only from the petulance and vanity some times incident to the possession of "brief authority;" although it would be claiming too liberal an exercise of charitable feeling to require the committee to yield, without qualification, to such conviction. The inquiry reached far enough to enable them to pronounce definitely that the return of the collector, in relation to the public money received by him, if true in their details, have not been made in details according to the requirements which should be enjoined upon him by the secretary of the treasury, in whom is vested, by existing laws, the absolute superintendence of the collection of the public revenue, nor have they been what the safety of the treasury demands.

But, being desirous of presenting the case of this collector to the house and country in the precise light in which they reached and viewed it, the committee will adhere closely to the order and to the facts in which it stands upon their journal.

The committee being in session at New York, apprized Mr. Hoyt, the collector, of the fact; and furnished him a copy of the resolution of the house under which the committee were proceeding.

On the 26th of January the following resolution was passed in committee, without a division, and communicated by the chairman to the collector, to wit:

On motion of Mr. Dawson,

Resolved, That the collector of the customs for the district of New York be required to place before this committee the book containing a copy of all letters to and from the treasury department of the United States since the first of January, 1837; also his book containing the record of all orders and instructions from that department since the first of January, 1837.

To which resolution the following answer was received from the collector:

Custom house, collector's office, New York, January 26, 1839.

SIR: I have this moment received your communication of this day, covering a resolution in the following words:

On motion of Mr. Dawson,

"Resolved, That the collector of the customs for the district of New York be required to place before this committee the book containing a copy of all letters to and from the treasury department of the United States since the 1st of January, 1837; also his book containing the record of all orders and instructions from that department since the 1st of January, 1837."

I now send you two letter-books, which I am informed by the only clerk now in this office during the time of Mr. Swartwout, that had any especial charge of the correspondence; which two books contain "the letters to and from the treasury department of the United States since the 1st of January, 1837," up to the time Mr. Swartwout went out of office.

I also send you a book of circulars, which the same clerk informs me is the only one he knows of. I am not aware of any others.

If I have not interpreted the resolution correctly, you will be pleased to inform me. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. HOYT, collector.

Hon. James Harlan, chairman, &c.

The foregoing reply of the collector, and its accompaniments, bore upon its face a designed restriction of the call made upon him to the letters, orders and instructions that had passed between the treasury department and the late collector, Mr. Swartwout, and embraced none of a subsequent date, or to which the present collector was a party, although the only legitimate construction of which the call was susceptible embraced the latter as well as the former. Believing the documents withheld in this manner to be essential to the investigation, Mr. Dawson moved, on the 28th of January, the following resolution in committee:

Resolved, That Mr. Hoyt, the collector, be required to furnish this committee with all letters to and from the treasury department and the collector of the customs at New York; and also all orders and instructions from the treasury department to said collector since the 1st day of January, 1837, up to the present day; and the answers of said collector, if any, to said orders and instructions, not already furnished to this committee.

Mr. Owens moved the following amendment: "Provided the said letters, orders and instructions, have reference to the late defalcations embraced in the inquiry of this committee."

On this amendment the yeas and nays were ordered, on the motion of Mr. Owens, and decided in the negative by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Foster, Owens, Wagener—3.
NAYS—Messrs. Curtis, Dawson, Harlan, Hopkins, Smith, Wise—6.

The question was then taken on the original resolution, and the yeas and nays being ordered, on motion of Mr. Wagener, the resolution was adopted by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Curtis, Dawson, Harlan, Hopkins, Smith, Wise—6.
NAYS—Messrs. Foster, Owens, Wagener—3.

At the evening session of the same day, the following letter from the collector was received, and read in committee:

Custom house, collector's office,
New York, January 28, 1839.

SIR: I received your note at half past 1 P. M. this day, covering a resolution, in the words and terms following, viz:

"Resolved, That Mr. Hoyt, the collector, be required to furnish this committee with all letters to and from the treasury department and the collector of the customs at New York, and also all orders and instructions from the treasury department to said collector since the 1st day of January, 1837, up to the present day; and the answers, if any, to said orders and instructions, not already furnished to this committee."

"A true copy from the minutes."
"P. R. FENDALL, clerk."

In reply to that resolution, I have to remark, that I am a public agent, responsible to the law, which I recognise as my superior, to the same extent as the committee are; and I have no right to exceed the authority delegated to me, and more than [than] the committee have to exceed that delegated to it.

It is a rule I have observed since I have occupied my responsible station I now do, in all matters connected with the performance of official duty, to look into the authority of all persons asking for my official action, to see upon what authority that action is demanded or requested. In pursuance of this principle, with which the committee must be familiar, I have looked into the "copies of certain proceedings of the house of representatives," furnished to me on the 25th instant, by order of the committee; and I there find, after a recital of the defalcation of the late collector of New York, that the committee are authorized to inquire "into the causes and extent of the late defalcations of the custom house at New York and other places, the length of time they have existed, the correctness of the returns which have been made by the collectors, naval and other officers, and the deposit banks respectively, and all such facts connected with the said defalcations as may be deemed material to develop their true character." "That the said committee be required to inquire into and make report of any defalcations among the collectors, receivers and disbursers of the public moneys which may now exist, the length of time they have existed, and the causes which led to them."

This, then, being the authority delegated to the committee, it becomes necessary to inquire, before I send the correspondence of the collector's office of this port with the treasury department, since the 1st day of January, 1837, up to the present day; "to inquire whether the said committee, or any of its members, charge the undersigned with being a defaulter. Respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. HOYT, collector.

To the hon. James Harlan, chairman, &c.

On the following day, January 29, Mr. Wise moved in committee the following resolutions:

Resolved, That, in response to the letter of Mr. Hoyt, of the 23th instant, the chairman be instructed to call upon him again to furnish this committee with all letters not heretofore furnished, from the several officers of the treasury department to the late and present collector at New York, and from said collectors to said officers of the treasury department, since the 1st day of January, 1837, up to the 17th day of January, 1839; and, also, with all orders and instructions from said officers to said collectors, and the answers of said collectors thereto, if any, not heretofore furnished, since the 1st day of January, 1837, up to the 17th day of January, 1839.

And it further resolved, That this committee cannot recognise any authority or right whatever, in any collector, receiver or disburser of the public money, to call upon "the committee," or "any of its members," to prefer or to disavow a charge of his "being a defaulter," before such officers send "the correspondence" of his "office," when required under the authority of the house of representatives, "to send for persons and papers," to enable its committee "to inquire into, and make report of any defalcations among collectors, receivers and disbursers of the public money which may now exist;" nor can this committee, or "any of its members," report whether Mr. Hoyt is, or is not, now, a defaulter, until, by examination of the "persons and papers," for which it has sent and will send, it shall discover "who are the defaulters; the amount of defalcations; the length of time they have existed; and the causes which led to them;" and when the committee shall have found the facts embraced by these inquiries, or closed its investigation, it will make report thereof to the house of representatives.

On motion of Mr. Hopkins, the yeas and nays were ordered.

The resolutions were adopted.
YEAS—Messrs. Curtis, Dawson, Harlan, Hopkins, Smith, Wise—6.

NAYS—Messrs. Foster, Owens, Wagener—3.

On the 30th of January the chairman laid before the committee the following letter from the collector:

Custom house, collector's office,
New York, January 29, 1839.

SIR: Your letter, covering two resolutions passed by the select committee this day, came to me at half-past one, P. M.; but the pressure of current official duties was such, that I had not the opportunity to make a reply in time to lay it before the committee previous to its adjournment.

I regret that the committee has not thought proper to reply, explicitly, to the inquiry made in my letter of yesterday, as to whether it intended to charge me with official defalcation. An answer to that inquiry appeared to me to be not only a matter of right, but also one which it was my duty to institute, inasmuch as I could not conceive what connexion that portion of the documents called for by the committee which relates to my own official conduct could have with the defalcation of my predecessor; nor could I see any cause for calling for such a report, unless it was the intention of the committee to extend to me the charge of defalcation. But though an explicit answer has not been given to my inquiry, I cannot but consider the second resolution passed by the select committee, and enclosed in your letter, as intimating, at least, that the committee deem it necessary to inquire into "the collection and disbursement" of the public moneys by me, as collector of this port, and into the accounts appertaining to the same; and that they also deem it possible that such an inquiry may show me a defaulter. Regarding the resolution referred to in this serious aspect, I feel it due to the public service, as well as to my own character and rights, to call on the select committee, as I have now done, to make a full and thorough investigation into my necessary, before leaving this city to the end that it may make such a report in the matter as shall either sustain this intimation, or remove all grounds for the injurious suspicions it is calculated to excite. The justice of this appeal is too obvious to need comment, and I will not doubt the readiness of the committee to recognise it; although I cannot but question the accuracy of the construction which the committee has given to its powers, under the resolutions of the house of representatives, which I can scarcely think were intended to authorise the committee to make a sweeping call for the papers of a public officer, against whom no charge of defalcation is preferred, for the purpose of ascertaining whether he is not a defaulter. Yet, such is my anxiety to give every facility to the investigation of my accounts, and such my unwillingness to rest for a moment under the imputation implied in the resolution of the select committee, that I shall cheerfully submit to it all the official correspondence I have held with the treasury department, and all books and papers relating to the receipt and disbursement of the public money, and to the particulars and state of the accounts during the period mentioned in the resolution.

It will also give me pleasure to communicate, either orally or in writing, any other information on the subject which may be in my power, and which the committee may wish me to lay before it.

I shall, therefore, immediately proceed to select all the letters, orders and instructions, received from the treasury department, within the period referred, relating to the receipt and disbursement of the public moneys, and the state of the accounts; and I will have the honor to transmit the same to the select committee as soon and as fast as schedules thereof can be prepared. As to the official letters, on the same subject, written by me to the department, the originals of them are in the possession of the several officers to whom they were addressed, and I am therefore unable to send them, as requested in the resolution; but I shall be enabled to lay copies thereof before the committee, if copies will be received, and are desired. Such copies, if called for, will be furnished as speedily as expert copyists can prepare them.

I have already communicated to the select committee all the correspondence of my predecessor in office, on the subject referred to, which the committee has called for, so far as I know of its existence. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. HOYT, collector.

Hon. James Harlan, chairman, &c.
Also, on the same day the chairman laid before the committee the following letter from the collector:

Custom house, collector's office,
New York, January 30, 1839.

SIR: In pursuance of the promise made in my communication of yesterday, to the select committee, concerning my correspondence with the treasury department, I now send to the committee the official letters from the secretary of the treasury to the undersigned, as per schedule A, hereto annexed.

I also send the letters from the treasurer of the United States, as per schedule B.

I also send the letters from the first auditor of the treasury, as per schedule C.

I also send the letters from the solicitor of the treasury, as per schedule D.

I also send the letters from the first auditor of the treasury, as per schedule E.

I also send the letters from the first comptroller of the treasury, as per schedule F.

I also send a book, labelled "circulars from the comptroller and secretary of the treasury." The clerk whose duty it was to arrange that book, I regret to say, has not put the circulars in the book in the order in which they bear date; and there may be some in manuscript not in that book, but in the letters transmitted.

I have made a hurried selection of the letters I now transmit, from my desire to comply promptly with my undertaking; and it is therefore possible I may have omitted some, which I will send hereafter if I discover that any have been omitted.

To avoid the contingency of a loss of any of the letters, I would respectfully request that you would permit the clerk of the select committee to compare them, and indicate to me whether the letters correspond with the schedules. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. HOYT, collector.

P. S. In the heading of this communication I have stated "schedules annexed;" I have put the schedules on the top of each separate file of letters.
J. HOYT.

Hon. James Harlan, chairman, &c.

The evasive responses thus made by the collector to the calls of the committee, partaking of a species of special pleading quite out of place in the intercourse of public agents, however suited to some other forum, and studiously withholding thereby all records by which the correctness of his own proceedings in the returns he had made while in office could be tested; and especially the disposition of mind indicated in the quasi apology put forth in his letter of the 29th of January, for not communicating his own official letters to the officers of the treasury department, viz: that "the originals of them are in the possession of the several officers to whom they were addressed, and I am therefore unable to send them as requested, &c. but would send copies if desired," &c. precluded the hope of obtaining from that quarter any thing like satisfactory information respecting his returns and the basis of them, with the exception to something of more binding solemnity than respectful calls in the shape of resolutions, and probably not without recourse to the testimony of others. No more, consequently, was obtained from the collector, except by making him a witness, and examining him under oath, which, at a subsequent and proper stage of the investigation, was done.

On the 5th of February, Mr. David S. Lyon, formerly a deputy collector at New York, was under examination as a witness, and information was sought of him respecting the amount of money which had been received under protests by the collector. This part of the proceeding is extracted from the journal of the committee, in the order of its occurrence, as follows:

Question 3. What is the total amount of money received into the possession of Jesse Hoyt, as collector, or individually, under protest, from the commencement of his official term to this day?

Mr. Owens objected to the 2d interrogatory.
Mr. Foster called for the yeas and nays on the question, shall the interrogatory be propounded?

The question was then put, and decided in the affirmative.

YEAS—Messrs. Curtis, Dawson, Harlan, Hopkins, Smith, Wise—6.

Question 16. Has any, and what amount received by you under protest been paid into the treasury of the United States?

Answer. My correspondence with the department on this subject leaves it in doubt on my own mind how I am to consider the question with reference to the understanding of the department. I have frequently stated to it that it could use the money in its own way and form, if adequate protection was given to me. In answer to one of my letters, the secretary wrote me under date of 22d of December last, of which the following is a copy. Treasury department, Dec. 22, 1838.

Sir: As heretofore intimated to you, the opinion of the attorney general has been taken upon the subject presented in your letter of the 17th of October last, a copy of which is herewith transmitted for your information.

In view of this opinion, I would suggest, that the moneys held by you on account of duties paid under protest by the parties, as also those received on account of cash duties not ascertained at the time, should be placed to the credit of the treasurer, so that they can be drawn for as needed; but at the bottom of each weekly return the amount held for each of these objects may be enumerated.

By this course no difficulty will arise till congress legislate on the subject, as they have been requested to do, because the accruing duties will all be paid enough to return from, and the comptroller or myself will give proper directions in all cases presented, for retaining duties which have been paid under protest.

So in regard to duties not ascertained: any excess or deficiency can be regulated afterwards, when the duties shall have been actually ascertained, until some legal provision is made by congress. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

LEVI WOODBURY, sec. of the treasury.
Jesse Hoyt, esp. collector of the customs, New York.
The following is a copy of the opinion of the attorney general, referred to in said letter:

Attorney general's office, Dec. 19, 1838.

Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge yours of the 7th instant, in which you state that "it frequently happens, especially at the larger ports of entry, on the importation of some particular description of goods, that the importer disputes the duty, to which the collector, acting under the instructions of the comptroller, decides the articles in question to be liable under the tariff laws. But, with the view of getting possession of his goods, the importer pays under protest the amount of duty demanded by the collector, and at the same time gives that officer notice not to pay the money over to government, and immediately institutes a suit against the collector to recover back the amount so paid."

"Under these circumstances, the following question arises, viz: Can a collector legally retain in his hands, beyond the control of the department, and distinct from his other funds arising from duties, moneys so received?"

In answer to this question, I would say that, under the laws of congress in relation to duties on imported articles, the duty of the collector is to carry into execution the instructions of the treasury department, and to conform his acts to them. If, in doing this, he shall collect more money than the judiciary shall afterwards, in an action against the collector by the importer, adjudge to have been due to the government, there can be no doubt that it is the duty of the government to save the collector from injury. But the question you present is of a very different character. It is, whether the collector has the legal right to retain the money so received in his own hands, beyond the control of the department. &c. My opinion is, that no such right exists; and that the collector should, notwithstanding such protest and suit by the importer, pay over to the treasury all money by him received under such circumstances, as though no protest had been made or suit commenced.

I am aware that it may be said that this course would expose the collector to inconvenience and loss. The force of this suggestion is not perceived. Now the collector keeps the money in his possession until the controversy is decided by the judiciary, and then pays over to the government what may be in his hands—that is, the whole collected by him, if the importer has failed in his action; or, if the importer has succeeded, the balance which may be in his hands, after deducting the amount of the law recovered against him. My impression is, that the law never intended that money collected for public purposes should be held by individuals to await the event of lawsuits. If the money be paid into the treasury, and a judgment be fairly obtained against a collector on an overcharge of duties, it would be the duty of the government promptly to discharge such judgment and release the collector from its consequences.

You say a similar point arises under the following circumstances: "On an importation of goods liable to cash duties, some time unavoidably must elapse before the duties thereon can be calculated, and the exact amount payable ascertained. It appears to be the practice in such cases, to receive from the importer a sum of money deemed sufficient to cover the amount when ascertained; and any deficiency is afterwards made up, or the surplus furnished by the collector, as the case may be. These funds the collector designates as money taken and held for unascertained duties."

"The same question as the foregoing is presented in this case."

It seems to me that the intention of those who originally framed our revenue laws, was that the duties should be ascertained and paid, where cash duties are imposed, before the goods are delivered to the owner. But it is understood that in some ports this is wholly impracticable, and therefore a departure in practice from the idea which I have suggested is indispensable.

This state of things could not have been foreseen by those who originally passed the acts of congress under which the revenue is still collected. The vast increase of the commerce of the United States, and its concentration at particular ports, renders that impracticable which at an early period could be easily effected. If the law cannot be executed according to its letter and probable intention, on account of the altered condition of the affairs of the country, congress alone can supply the proper remedy. In the mean time, however, until congress shall act, such treasury regulations should be adopted and enforced as will best secure the objects of the law. It could never have been the intention of congress that a collector should receive money for duties under a private arrangement with the importer, and keep the money in his hands until it was convenient for him to cause the amount of duties to be ascertained. If such a practice were tolerated, it might be the interest of the collector to postpone the ascertainment of the duties, as, in the mean time, he would have the uncontrolled use of the money. It would also increase the danger of faithlessness in the collector, by permitting large amounts of money to remain with him, and under his individual control, instead of being in the treasury of the United States. The tenor and spirit of all our revenue laws seem to inculcate the idea that the intention of congress has at all times been, that money collected for revenue should be promptly placed in the treasury, and not be permitted to remain in the hands of the collector. Therefore, in any regulations you may make upon this subject, that object should be constantly kept in view. I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

FELIX GRUNDY.

The honorable secretary of the treasury.

To which letter of the secretary I wrote to him on the 24th of December as follows:

New York, December 24, 1838.
Sir: I wrote you on Saturday in relation to the form of keeping the account of cash deposited for unascertained duties; since which, I have yours of the 22d, accompanied by a copy of the opinion of the attorney general on this proposition, as well as on the proposition to pay over the money received by me under protest. The reasoning of the attorney general is very sound on both points as to what the law should be; and would be entirely satisfactory as to what it actually was, if the highest judicial tribunal of the land had not decided on one of them contrary to the conclusion at which the attorney general has arrived. He does not seem to have adverted at all to the decision of the supreme court in the case of Elliot against Swartwout, reported in 10 Peters, 137, where the subject was discussed, and substantially settled, and that the collector was not bound to pay over the money to the government when he had received notice not to do it. But he says, what is very true, that "if the money be paid into the treasury, and a judgment be fairly obtained against a collector for an overcharge of duties, it would be the duty of the government promptly to discharge such judgment, and release the collector from its consequences." The duty of the government is one thing; the manner of discharging that duty is another and different thing. It would seem, from his view, that a judgment must not only be obtained against a collector, but it must be "fairly obtained;" and of this the government is to be the judge, as a preliminary step to the performance of an act of justice, which every one who has any experience with the action of our government knows is very often tardy. I do not, in the term government, as used by me, mean the present or any other administration of that government, for the one is but the agent and subordinate to the other.

The question with me is, whether, under the present uncertainty of collector's securities, I ought to do as an act of grace to the government what the law does not compel me to do. That the law ought to be as the attorney general seems to be of opinion that it is, there can be no doubt. But should I, who am already borne down by responsibilities of all kinds, voluntarily add to those from which I cannot escape, at the risk of every thing? or rather should I not look to the language of the court in the case referred to, which I find to be this?

"Any instructions from the treasury department could not change the law, or affect the rights of the plaintiff. He was not bound to take and adopt that construction. He was at liberty to judge for himself, and act accordingly. These instructions from the treasury seem to be thrown into the question for the purpose of showing, beyond all doubt, that the collector acted in good faith. To make the collector answerable after he had paid over the money without any intimation having been given that the duty was not legally charged, cannot be sustained upon any sound principles of policy and law. There can be no hardship in requiring the party to give notice to the collector that he considers the duty claimed illegal, and put him on his guard, by requiring him not to pay over the money. The collector would then be placed in a situation to claim an indemnity from the government."

This "indemnity from the government," alluded to by the court, comes back to the proposition of the attorney general, and leaves me a supplicant to the justice of the government, without the power of enforcing any claim. I propose when I go out of office, that my accounts with the government shall be settled in one hour by Shrewsbury, or some other good clock, whether that going out by death, removal or resignation; and whatever money should be held by me under "protest," I should cause to be deposited to the credit of the treasurer, on the government engaging to satisfy the claims of the parties protesting. The use of the money, in the mean time, I will give you, in any form you choose to have it except the form which may leave me to the tender mercies of congress, or to any change in the views of the administration.

I will report to you weekly in any form you suggest. You can draw for it in like manner.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. HOYT, collector.

I also received from the comptroller of the treasury, on the 1st instant, a letter bearing date the 29th of January, alluding to the same subject; to which I replied, under date of the 1st inst. by letter in the following words:

Custom house, New York, February 1, 1839.

Sir: I have your communication of the 29th January last, in relation to the form of keeping the accounts.

Since the 1st of January, the money deposited for unascertained duties has been passed immediately to the credit of the United States, and has formed a part of the money transferred weekly to the separate credit of the treasurer; all of which has been duly notified to the secretary of the treasury and the treasurer.

I have laid your communication before the cashier and auditor, and, as soon as we have the opportunity to confer together, we will advise you of the time when we shall be able to prepare our books and blank forms of returns to meet the suggestion of the department.

I write now to say, peremptorily, that I will not pass the money I receive under protest to the credit of the United States until congress makes provision for my protection. For the reasons of this course, I beg to refer you to my former communications to the department on the subject. The supreme court of the United States have pronounced on the question; and it is due to the public service, as well as to the officers of the government and the merchants, to have the question definitively settled. If, per severe in the course which the highest judicial tribunal of the land has sanctioned, the duty of congress to interfere is the more striking, and, I should suppose, could not but lead to an early interference by congress.

The money, as the department has been advised, is drawing seven per cent. interest. The fund is fast increasing, and will continue to increase until the litigated points are adjusted by congress.

I will not venture to speak of the delay or inattention to the public business on the part of the representatives of the people, because it would not become me to do so; but if any other class of public servants managed the public business in the same way, I should think they ought to be severely reprimanded. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. HOYT, collector.

CHRONICLE.

A subject for antiquarians. The last Little Rock (Ark.) Times, contains a letter from one of Mr. Sabin's detectors, giving the particulars of an excavation in the earth, near the Rock, where was found, at the depth of four or five feet, a well-set furnace, bits of broken kettles, made of earth, the "conceivably of whose segments indicated a capacity of 20 gallons," besides other little Pompeian relics. "The question now arises, how came these relics here, and how long have they been buried?"

A former world. A fierce controversy exists whether the giant remains of a man in chalk, &c. near the surface, are the remains of a man, or of a low or the highest order of animals. Professor Owen read an account before the London Geological society of some of these fossil remains at Stonesfield quarry. He says they have eleven clavus nails, and the teeth are double rooted, fanged, &c. showing close affinity to the Australian opossum. At the same meeting, we observe presents from our countryman, Silliman.

Mons. Papineau. A Canadian, arrived in Paris, March 9, and attended M. Lafitte's soiree the next evening, where he was a lion of the first water, and introduced to all the liberals. His arrival was deemed opportune for the coalition, as a new excitement for increased agitation.

The Delaware. So great has been the rise of water in the Delaware in consequence of the late rain, that a part of the Woodbury railroad has been washed away, just below Kaighn's point, rendering it impassable for the cars. Many cords of wood have been washed away from the banks of the Delaware; the lower stories of many of the houses between Camden and Kaighn's point have been inundated, articles of domestic furniture floated away, and domestic animals drowned.

Large verdict. At the circuit court held at Catskill, N. Y. last week, an action of assault and battery was tried, in which James Byrne was plaintiff, and A. R. Livingston defendant. It occupied the court two days. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff of $4,000 damages.

The awful plunge! The St. Catharine (U. C.) Journal, of the 6th, states that five men went over the Niagara Falls on the previous Thursday. The Journal says: "The only particulars which we have been able to learn are, that just before the water was discovered in the middle of the river, above the falls, vainly endeavoring to make their way through the ice, with which they were enclosed, to the Canada shore. Their utmost exertions proved unavailing, and in a short time they were seen to enter the cascades, when they disappeared. In half an hour, a boat with two men in it, and three men in it was discovered in the same awful situation, and trying too, to gain the Canada side, but in a few moments shared the melancholy fate of the other. Yesterday the body of a man was picked up in the whirlpool, supposed to be one of these unfortunate men, having about his person two hundred dollars, and a valuable gold watch."

Painful casualty. We are informed that Dennis Dulce, a native of Ireland, was drowned at Mount Morris, on Friday last, while generously engaged in rescuing a boy about ten years of age from the fate that unfortunately became his own. The boy fell into the river above the dam, and owing to the strength of the current, was unable to regain the bank. The man succeeded in the perilous situation of the lad, threw himself into the stream for his rescue. He caught the struggling lad and pushed him forward to the shore. The boy was saved, but his preserver sank to rise no more. Mr. Dulce had made arrangements to return to Ireland the coming autumn. [Rocheater Daily Adv.]

Charles C. De Witt, esq. formerly member of congress from Ulster county, N. Y. made an attempt to commit suicide on board the steamer "Trenton" on Friday instant, which caused his death about an hour after he was landed at Newburgh. He expressed an unwillingness to live on account of pecuniary embarrassments which had occurred during his absence from this country as charge d'affaires at Guatemala.

It is proposed in the Michigan legislature to abandon the project of a ship canal around the point of the strait leading to connect Lake Huron with Lake Superior. During the last session 50,000 dollars were appropriated to it.

Missing vessel. From the Natchez Free Trader of April 24 we learn that the ship "Trenton," capt. Gray, of Natchez, which cleared on the 23th November, and left the Balize on the 1st December, has not been heard of, but is supposed to have sailed on the 25th of November, five days out. The "Trenton" was bound to Liverpool, having on board 1,200 bales of cotton, and was owned by Messrs. T. S. McAllister and D. C. Michie, of Natchez. Capt. Gray's family reside at Boston. Insurance was effected equally at the two offices in Natchez, on vessel and freight, amounting to $25,000. The cargo was insured at Liverpool.

The "Tippecanoe Club" of Philadelphia has issued an address requesting the national living convention as the only legitimate body for the nomination of the wibg candidate for the presidency.

The citizens of Pensacola have tendered a public dinner to captain W. K. Latimer, of the U. S. navy, who has been stationed at the navy yard at that place for some years, in testimony of their regard for his character as an officer and a gentleman. Captain L. is about to leave the station, at his own request, for the north.

The citizens of Apalachicola, Florida, have recently manifested their respect for their late representative, J. M. White, esq. by the presentation of a magnificent silver vase of the most exquisite workmanship. The inscription declares that it is presented "as a testimonial of their respect for the purity of his private character, admiration of his distinguished talents, and gratitude for his eminent services."

The ship General Parkhill has sailed from St. Marks, Florida, for Liverpool, with 1,923 bales of cotton. This is the third vessel this season, making altogether 5,000 bales, chiefly owned by Mr. R. H. Barry. Spite of Indian murders and destruction of her plantations, Florida is doing wonders; where she raises her staple seems to us a mystery.

The cashier of the Framingham bank has offered a reward of $50 for the apprehension of Jubal Harrington, late postmaster at Worcester, who lately absconded from that place, leaving behind him forged papers, on which he had obtained money, particularly a note of $250, on which he had forged the name of Adam Harrington, and which had been discovered at the Framingham bank. One of our slips received from New Orleans a few days since, stated that Harrington was in that place.

Melancholy death. On Monday in Boston, James Freeman Curtis, esq. the highly esteemed superintendent of the Worcester rail road, came to his end in a shocking manner. The ears had just left the depot at Boston, when Mr. Curtis put his head out of a window, and received a severe blow by striking one of the posts of a bridge. He lived but a short time afterwards.

Large cargoes! We were among those who inconsiderately published the article corrected in the following from the Boston Atlas:

North Advertiser. I have noticed the remarks which have travelled all the way from Vicksburg and Grand Gulf, of two cargoes of cotton, one shipped from each place representing each to be worth over one million of dollars. Their accounts have been published in some of the southern papers, and in some of the Boston papers, and in your journal among others. I have been a little surprised that such palpable errors should escape detection by a glance of the eye. The cargo of the Talleyrand is put down at 2,150 bales, or 835,600 lbs. and valued at $1,296,000 00

The cargo of the ship Franklin, 1835	bales, 799,291 lbs. and valued at	1,111,998 00
	Total	$2,417,998 00
The first cargo, at 15 cents per lb.	will amount to	$132,850 00
And the second, at the same price, to		119,995 65
	Total	$252,838 65

Making the trifling over-valuation of only two million one hundred and fifty-five thousand one hundred and fifty-nine dollars and thirty-five cents.

Yours, W.

Honorable Naadhil Johnson, a member of the senate from Delaware county, died at his lodgings in the city of Albany, on the evening of the 4th, inst.

Adaptation of Georgia to the silk culture. The Augusta Sentinel of April 6th says: In the village of Penchfield, Green county, Georgia, in the last week of March 1839, silk worms were feeding on the fresh and green, leaves of the morus multicaulis, planted this present year, and in an open unprotected situation high and dry, weather cool and frosty.

The beef and pork accumulated for the Maine troops, is now selling at auction along the route. The people are enjoying a feast.

Some of the war-hawks in Maine fume terribly at the pacification. They say the state is saddled with near a million of dollars for no earthly purpose.

Export of flour from Alexandria to foreign ports from the first of January, to 8th April, 10,447 barrels.

The corporation of Georgetown has affected a loan, and is now redeeming its notes.

The secretary of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania has given notice that proposals will be received till 6 o'clock, P. M. on Thursday, the 25th of April, for the sum of 570,000 dollars, at 5 per cent. reimbursable after the 1st of July, 1861. One hundred thousand dollars are to be appropriated to the Franklin rail road.

Wisconsin legislature. This body adjourned on Monday the 11th ult. The session, says the Enquirer, had before held in the territory, and important of any ever before held and systematized, and a large amount of important local business transacted.

Wisconsin interest. A law has been passed in the territory, allowing 12 per cent. interest for money, by agreement.

The French minister of marine has sent out $400,000 from the public treasury, to relieve the sufferers by the earthquake at Martinique.

Awful occurrence. The Providence Journal says, that a man called on the post house in Exeter, Rhode Island, and called by Timothy Peckham on Wednesday evening last, about 12 o'clock, and demanded admittance; he was refused. They told him he could go into the barn and sleep, he threatened to have revenge. In a short time after the house was discovered by the neighbors to be on fire. Six of the inmates, the poor of the town, and two persons on a visit to Mr. Peckham's family, perished in the flames. Mr. and Mrs. Peckham barely escaped with their lives, by leaping from the second story window. The person suspected of having set fire to the house was of intemperate habits, Mr. P. was his guardian.

We are requested to state that the price of transporting goods and merchandise to Pittsburg by the way of the Baltimore and Susquehanna railroad and the Pennsylvania canals, is for Dry goods and hardware $2 00 per 100 lbs.
Groceries 1 75 per 100 lbs.

A separate train of burden cars runs daily, exclusively for the accommodation of the Pittsburg trade. Produce arrived yesterday in 11 days from Pittsburg, although accidentally detained two days on the way. [Walt. Pat.]

Effects of vegetables upon animals. The botanical professor, in a lecture delivered at King's college, said that "horses will not touch eruciferous plants, but will eat the root grasses, amidst abundance of which goats have been known to starve, and the latter will eat and grow fat on the water hemlock, which is rank poison to other cattle. In like manner pigs will feed on henbane, while they are destroyed by common pepper and the horse, which avoids the bland turnip, will grow fat on thubarb." [Farmer's Magazine.]

Cabs in Philadelphia. The National Gazette of Wednesday says: Our citizens were gratified this morning with the sight of an elegant cabriolet, a carriage much used in London, but almost unknown in our cities. It has been built for the use of the Merchants' hotel, from a model brought from England by Mr. Sill. It has the advantage over the common hackney coach, that the passengers get in and out without the driver leaving his seat. It will no doubt become a popular vehicle.

White sulphur water. The Lewisburg Enquirer, under the head of "a new article of commerce," says: "We have witnessed at this present week, several wagons loading with water from the White Sulphur Springs for various parts of the United States. About fifty tons, already sold to order, have been and are being forwarded. The proprietors, it is supposed, will be unable the present season to supply the demands. This will be a popular article of commerce, most especially in the sulphur water societies. It is a first rate article to cool off with."

Remains of an officer. The Winchester Va. Republican states the workmen, in excavating a cellar on the site of the old fort, at the north end of that town, on Saturday last, discovered the remains of a man, who was evidently an officer of rank. It appeared from the buttons which were found with the remains, a silver spur and some other articles, that had been interested in his regimentals, that this is the little singular he was had north and east, and west, and has the custom of the present day. There were also with the remains a number of musket balls of lead and iron. The fort was erected by Washington, for the protection of the frontier settlements in 1775, immediately after the disastrous defeat of gen. Braddock, near Pittsburg.

Coal bed on fire. The Wilkesbarre Farmers say: The large coal lands owned by the heirs of the late M. Hellenbach, about two miles in the rear of this borough have been for some time past on fire, in the present time burning with considerable violence. The vein is the largest in the valley, being twenty-five and thirty feet in thickness, and supposed to extend at different elevations and thicknesses throughout the whole extent of the Wyoming coal region. The bed on fire is at so great an elevation above the surrounding country, that the water in any quantity could not be communicated to it. The mouth of the bed and all outlets have been filled up, but fissures continue to open in the range of the fire, caused by the intensity of the heat, and the air thus finds access to the flames and continues its excitement.

The last accounts from Brussels afford a melancholy illustration of the uncertainty of life. M. Baectek, a member of the chamber of deputies, after having concluded his maiden (and last) speech, dropped dead. The consequence of some remarks which he made in reference to the present state of things in Belgium, he was laughed at, which it is said, affected him very much.

MR. WEBSTER. A Boston paper mentions that the son, Daniel Webster is about to visit Europe with his family, and that he will embark from New York about the first of May for Liverpool, returning in the autumn. On this subject the New York Commercial says: "Mr. Webster is desirous of visiting Europe the present season, if he can so arrange his business as to be able to leave it. He does not, however, expect to embark at the time mentioned—certainly not earlier than the 8th."

—We have not yet seen an official statement of the result of the election in Rhode Island.

BANK ROBBERY. The robbery of the bank of the Metropolis of this city by the teller thereof, having caused considerable excitement, we submit the particulars from the Intelligencer of yesterday:

MR. DENNIS G. ORME, a teller in the bank of the Metropolis, was detected in inheriting a handsome patrimony, having not been attending at the bank at the usual hour last Tuesday morning, and from his conduct on the previous day in absenting himself for some time from the counter, and appearing during the morning to be slightly inebriated, suspicion was excited in the mind of Mr. George Thomas, the cashier, and he, on the next night, and in the morning compared with the cashier's hand, it was quickly ascertained that there was a deficit of not less a sum than fifty thousand dollars. Immediately on this discovery being made, it was communicated by the cashier to general Van Ness, the president of the bank, and the directors. The former, though indisposed, went to the house of Mr. Orme (who was said to be sick in bed) and obtained an account in which, after stating to Mr. Orme the deficit in his cash, the president used every argument he could think of to induce Mr. Orme to account for the deficit, and to say what had become of the money. But all in vain, Mr. Orme persisted in denying what had become of it.

After this interview, Mr. Orme accompanied general Van Ness to the residence of the president, and was again closely interrogated by the president and some of the directors, which he still persisted in denying all knowledge of the deficit, and of the way in which the money had been disposed of; until the marshal of the District of Columbia being introduced, and process having been served for the amount of the deficit, the defaulting clerk made a statement to the directors, after which general Van Ness directed that he had the $50,000 given to him by Mr. Orme, and the latter having confirmed this statement, he, (Goodrich), admitted that he had the money, and, taking a large bill of bank notes out of his coat pocket, gave them up saying, "there is the money." Having obtained the money, it was counted by the cashier, who found that it amounted to the sum of $19,300 two hundred dollars less than he had before. After a long conversation between the president of the bank and Mr. Orme and Mr. Goodrich, in order to obtain the $500 still due, the president agreed, at the request of Mr. Goodrich, that the bank, would dismiss all further proceedings for the recovery of the money, and Mr. Orme and Mr. Goodrich were allowed to depart.

Mr. Orme, on being told by general Van Ness, that an affidavit having been made before justice Thompson, warrants were issued in the name of the United States against Dennis G. Orme and A. W. Goodrich, charging the former with feloniously taking and carrying away the sum of $50,000, the property of the bank of the Metropolis, and the latter with receiving that sum of money, he fled to the District of Columbia, but was placed in the hands of H. B. Robertson, who, in a short time, arrested Goodrich; Dennis G. Orme could not be found.

After a long and patient investigation of the charge against A. W. Goodrich, in the presence of the president of the bank and the cashier, who were witnesses in the United States, the district attorney being absent, present, and Mr. J. H. Bradley being counsel for Mr. A. W. Goodrich, the magistrate referred the accused to five bail in the sum of $2,000 for his appearance at the next criminal court for the county of Washington; which bail having been given about 10 o'clock at night, Mr. Goodrich was discharged, after being under examination about five hours.

It is only just to add, that Mr. Goodrich, in his defence, denied that he had received or obtained the money with any criminal intention; that, finding Orme in a frolic, and crazy, and as he could be proved to be, when under the influence of liquor, he had merely kept the money until Orme got out of his frolic; and that he was prevented from returning the money to the bank (which he sincerely regretted), through the fear that he might do Orme some injury with his employers, and in the hope that he would speedily get right again. Goodrich also said he had searched for Orme during the day in his usual haunts, but could not find him.

Two or three witnesses were called, who testified that Dennis G. Orme, when intoxicated, was "almost crazy," and excited in a most unusual and extraordinary manner. One of them swore she saw him on Monday night, somewhat intoxicated, with a large roll of bank notes carelessly in his hat, and acting very strangely at the time.

Since writing the preceding notice, (which we have detailed more fully than usual, to gratify intense public curiosity as to correct erroneous representations of the case), we understand from good authority that Mr. Dennis G. Orme intends to surrender to the civil power and give bail for his appearance to answer to the charge against him.

THE MONEY MARKET. The New York Times, referring to the departure of the Great Western, says: "The Great Western will sail for England to-day, freighted with glad tidings for all on the other side of the Atlantic who have capital invested in our securities or on interest, direct or indirect, in the commercial transactions between the two countries. The effect produced on the market by the specific intimation she has brought out, has been most salutary, as the following statement of the prices, before and after her arrival, of some of our stocks best known in England will sufficiently prove."

Trade in all its branches has received a new impulse. The shipping merchants and commercial men generally who were in a state of suspense while the war question was in abeyance, are throwing their capital, with renewed confidence and activity, into the various channels of transatlantic commerce. Since the opening of the canals, the country merchants have been flocking into our city, and the jobbing houses are doing an active, and we doubt not, a profitable business. In fact the whole mercantile system opens a new and more extensive and we anticipate, both as regards foreign and domestic trade, a prosperous season.

Philadelphia money market. The North American of yesterday says:

If any change in the market is noted, it is a little easier, that is the demand for money is not quite so great as it was a few days since, but the rates are still the same.

CANADA AFFAIRS. The St. Albans (Vermont) Messenger of Thursday last says, that affairs on the frontier are more quiet, no burning having taken place lately, owing to the presence and watchfulness of the militia on guard; some instances have occurred, however, in which the whole of the militia system was not without effect.

The Albany Daily Advertiser publishes a letter from a correspondent at Ogdensburgh, dated the 14th inst. which states that the steamboat United States, was fired upon from the wharf at Prescott, that day, on her first trip this season. Five or six cannon were discharged, she said loaded with ball, three of which were seen to strike the vessel near the boat. As she did not turn about it is not known whether any injury was done. There was a great number of passengers on board, and among them many women and children. This is the same boat that towed the patriots to Prescott, during the attack on that place, and this is supposed to be the cause of the outrage. The part she took in aiding the patriots was done without the consent of the owners, who in consequence discharged the officers then in charge of the boat.

George Saunders one of the persons engaged in the burning of the Caroline, at Schlosser, was recently shot by a sentinel as he was entering the barracks without replying to the challenge. Both parties are said to have been intoxicated.

Gen. McLeod of the patriot army, was arrested at Detroit on the 15th inst. and committed to prison. The next morning he was bailed out by two sureties of 5,000 dollars each.

Of the remaining prisoners in Upper Canada, 18 are to be sent to a penal colony in five to be discharged at the boundary line of Lake Ontario, and fourteen are retained in the jail at London to await the state of affairs on the frontier. Most of those at Quebec are shortly to be liberated.

DEATH OF COL. OGDEN. From the Newark, N. J. Advertiser of the 20th inst. It is our painful duty this afternoon to announce the death of col. Aaron Ogden. The venerable patriot died at his residence in Jersey city last evening, at the advanced age of 83, in the bosom of his family, his children and descendants.

Truly another of the fathers is gone. Among the illustrious men whose reputation constitutes the political treasure of our country, the name of Aaron Ogden deserves an honorable place. From the earliest period of manhood he was engaged in public affairs; and soon took rank among those whose opinions were of most importance, and was in the confidence of those whose patriotism and talents were most distinguished. He was born at Elizabethtown, of an ancient and honorable family, and served with distinguished honor during, we believe, the whole war.

At the close of the war, he prepared himself for a new field of usefulness and honor, and early attained a high rank among the ablest and most eloquent lawyers of the country. It was natural in that day, that talents of such an order should attract public attention and respect, and we accordingly soon find col. Ogden in the senate of the United States, taking equal rank among her honored statesmen, in the presence of the war of his country. About the commencement of the year of 1812, he was chosen governor of his native state.

In all circumstances, and in every emergency, he exhibited that industry and sagacity, that promptness of decision and fertility of resource, that cheerful endurance in difficulty, and that "courage of the cabinet" which were so prominently pronounced in his character, and far less common than the valor of the field, which render his life and example one of the most pleasing and useful to be found in the records of the eventful and illustrious era in which he flourished.

Colonel Ogden was president general of the society of Cincinnati, and we are almost ashamed to say, was obliged by the circumstances to hold the office of collector at Jersey city for the sake of its pecuniary rewards. But he has been gathered to his fathers in peace and quietness, in the serene evening of a good old age, leaving a rich and honorable fame as a proud legacy to his children and descendants.

ANOTHER PATRIOT GONE! General Samuel Smith, of Baltimore, one of the most distinguished soldiers of the revolution, died in that city on Monday afternoon last, in the 87th year of his age. He had been riding in his carriage, and on his return to his dwelling, laid upon the sofa with the view of resting himself, and when he awoke he found himself lying in a bed, and in a few minutes after he expired. His apartment a short time afterwards, he was found dead. His career was glorious and useful, and he has died full of years and honors. On Thursday his remains were interred with every demonstration of respect by the civil and military authorities. We will, in our next, give some account of the funeral procession and other honors to his memory. The following interesting sketch of the leading incidents of his life was prepared by a committee of the city council of Baltimore, appointed to manifest their regard for his services and respect for his memory:

SAMUEL SMITH, the grandfather of the deceased, emigrated from Ireland to Pennsylvania in 1728 at the age of 35. General Smith's father, John Smith, left Carlisle, in Pennsylvania, and settled in Baltimore in September, 1769, was a member of the convention that formed the state constitution, and for many years represented Baltimore in the state senate. General Smith himself was born in Carlisle on the 27th July, 1752—his father, being a merchant, was destined for the same profession, and in early life (about 19) was sent to England to be educated in a counting house, but not satisfied with the restraints imposed upon the clerks in the house in which he lived, he freighted the vessel in which he went out, and sailed for a port in Italy—the vessel being cast away on that coast, he travelled over most of the continent and returned to the United States in the same vessel, with the accomplished but unfortunate major Andre, between whom and himself was formed a friendship which ended only with the life of that lamented victim of Arnold's treason.

General Smith, then a very young man, was solicited by the committee of safety of Baltimore, to command a company sent by water to Annapolis to arrest or capture the provincial governor Eden. The governor made his escape—he engaged in the revolutionary struggle, and at its commencement, entered the service as a captain; he was in the battles of Brandywine, Monmouth, White Plains and Long Island, and his company covered the retreat of the army through the Jerseys—he commanded at Mud Fort, where such gallant and desperate defence was made against the British fleet, blowing up of two of the frigates—in this engagement he was disabled by a spent ball which gave a shock to his frame from which he did not soon recover; after the close of the revolutionary struggle, he entered actively into commercial pursuits and may be said to have been the founder of the commerce of our city, and was the main stay of the commercial interests of the whole country in congress for forty years. He for one year represented the city in the legislature of the state, and afterwards was in one or other house of Congress until the fourth of March, 1833. When Mr. Jefferson came into the presidency, he pressed general Smith to accept the office of secretary of the navy, which he declined, consenting, however, to act in that capacity until some suitable person could be selected to fill it permanently. He served as secretary for six months or more, but would not receive any compensation for his services. He generally, while in congress, filled some high station, being chairman of the committee of ways and means in the house and of that of finance in the senate. When Baltimore was threatened with foreign invasion, he accepted the command of the defending army, and pledged his own private fortune and that of a friend who went before him to his great account. During the whole term of his command here, neither he nor his staff received any pay. His first term of service in congress commenced in 1793, and he continued in the house or senate till the 4th of March, 1833. Congress voted and presented him a sword for his gallant defence of Mud Fort. His last public service was in the capacity of mayor of Baltimore.

BANKS AND BANKING. The Albany Daily Advertiser contains the following statement:

The general banking law. Since the 10th day of July, 1838, there have been filed in the office of the secretary of state 109 certificates of banks under the above law. The amount of capital actually subscribed in these institutions is $25,769,175, and the amount of prospective capital $356,980,000. The banks are distributed as follows, viz:

No. of banks.	Capital subscribed.
In city of New York, 30	$16,028,175
Buffalo, 7	1,000,000
Rochester, 5	880,000
Troy, 3	300,000
Albany, 2	200,000
Utica, 1	100,000
Brooklyn, 1	100,000
Hudson, 1	100,000
Schenectady, 1	100,000

And in the several counties of the state, (exclusive of the cities above named) as follows, viz: In Genesee 8, in Oneida, Saratoga and Tompkins 4 each, in Niagara 3, in Onondaga, Seneca, Wayne, Broome, Steuben, Jefferson and Herkimer 2 each, and in Richmond, Orleans, St. Lawrence, Columbia, Lewis, Orange, Monroe, Montgomery, Greene, Livingston, Ontario, Kings, Yates, Cayuga, Chenango, Chemung, Washington, Albany, Chautauque, Delaware and Erie 1 each.

It will thus be seen that the citizens of 36 counties in every section of the state have availed themselves of the privileges afforded by this law, and have associated their capital and their enterprise in order to promote unitedly the prosperity, which individually they might toil in vain to enhance.

From the New Orleans Courier. The following statement of the condition of one of our banks is particularly satisfactory at the present time, when banking institutions in other states are sinking in public estimation. As regards the Citizens bank, it points out the absurdity of sundry rumors against our moneyed institutions which have lately gone forth, from the manufactory of designing persons: Citizens bank of Louisiana, March 31, 1839.

Illinois State bank. The Springfield, (Ill.) Journal of the 6th instant says: "It is now generally understood that Mr. Woodbury has selected the State Bank for a bank of deposit."

Stock subscription books of the new Southern bank of Kentucky are to be opened on the second Monday of May. The institution is to be devoted to the interests of southern Kentucky, commonly known as the "Green river country."

A New York paper states that the deposits in the banks of that city at this time, amount to $2,000,000 more than is usual at this season of the year.

The bank of New York has declared a dividend of five per cent. for the last six months, payable on the first of May.

By the Vicksburg Whig of April 1st, we learn that the Union bank was to commence discounting on the ensuing Thursday, and was to extend her loans to the amount of $4,000,000.

In Holland, money has become scarce, and so much as 5 to 6 per cent. interest is paid for loans on stock, &c. The bank of Amsterdam raised the rate of discount six weeks ago, from 2 1-2 per cent. to 3, and has now further advanced it to 3 1-2 per cent.

From Florida. Gorey's Ferry, April 6, 1839. General Macomb arrived here on the evening of the 5th. He comes to Florida for a special purpose, and is clothed with special powers. General Taylor remains in command of the army of the south, and general Macomb will not interfere with any arrangements he has made, or may make in future. His visit to this country is of a diplomatic nature.

COM. ELLIOTT. The court of inquiry which assembled at Philadelphia on Monday last to try certain charges against Commodore Elliott, has adjourned to meet on Monday next.

FIFTEEN GALLON LAW. The following is a copy of the much talked of fifteen gallon law of Massachusetts.

An act to regulate the sale of spirituous liquors. Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives in general court assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

SEC. 1. No licensed innholder, retailer, common victualler, or other person, except as herein provided, shall sell any brandy, rum or other spirituous liquors, or any mixed liquor, part of which is spirituous, in a less quantity than fifteen gallons, and that delivered and carried away at one time, or part of forfeiting not more than twenty dollars, nor less than ten dollars, for each offence, to be recovered in the manner and for the use provided in the twenty-sixth section of the forty-seventh chapter of the revised statutes.

SEC. 2. The county commissioners in the several counties, may license for their respective towns, as many apothecaries or practising physicians as they deem necessary to be retailers of spirituous liquors to be used in the arts, or for medicinal purposes only; and the mayor and aldermen of the several cities may, in like manner, and for like purpose, license apothecaries, as retailers for their respective cities and the court of common pleas for the county of Suffolk, in like manner, and for like purposes, may license apothecaries or practising physicians, as retailers in the town of Chelsea; which license shall be granted in the same manner, and under the same restrictions now provided by law for licensing retailers: provided, that the number of persons so licensed shall not exceed one for every two thousand inhabitants, and in towns containing less than two thousand inhabitants, one person may be licensed: and provided, further, that in such cities and towns where there is no apothecary or practising physician, such other person or persons may be appointed aforesaid, as may be deemed proper by said county commissioners; and no person so licensed, shall sell any spirituous liquor to be drunk in or about his premises on pain of the forfeiture provided in the first section of this act.

SEC. 3. All licenses hereafter granted to innholders, retailers and common victuallers, shall be so framed as not to authorise the licensed persons to sell brandy, rum or any other spirituous liquor, and no excise or fee shall be required for such a license.

SEC. 4. The provisions of all laws now in force inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

SEC. 5. This act shall take effect on the first day of July next, but shall have no operation upon any licenses granted previous to that time.

[Approved by the governor, April 10, 1838.]

ASPHALTUM PAVEMENTS. From the New Orleans Advertiser of the 5th instant. One of the warm days of the week, at the foot of the admirable asphaltum pavement in Bourbon street, was so affected by a moist day of the weather, as to be rendered all impassable. Horses left the imprints of their hoof after them in the melted substance, and the marks of wheel carriages, are still plainly discernable. We begin to have some serious apprehensions, of its running away in the dog days, and would advise, as timely preventative, the laying of a thicker coat of bitumen over the bricks, or the bulging of it down to a stiffer consistency. In our opinion, and we have noticed all the experimental modes of paving, both in wood and stone—there is no plan that offers so fair a prospect of durability as that of the round stone paving, when lined with the composition spoken of. It is like to the gluing or grouting of the stones together, and in the course of time, the pavement will become firm as adamant. Indeed, we question it within a few years, it would not be as difficult to sunter the bitumen from the stones to which it adhered, as to break the stones themselves, like to that mode of grouting, used in the construction of the round towers in Ireland, (which now defy every effort at battering or breaking), in a short period would become the asphaltum.

HISTORY OF THE LEHIGH COAL TRADE—OPENING OF THE MINES. The Mauch Chunk mines were actually opened prior to 1800, and small quantities of the coal taken to Philadelphia. A company was organized for the business, but regarded as visionary enthusiasts; some were driven from the enterprise, and have since passed from the stage; others persevered, succeeded, and yet live to witness the complete triumph of their efforts, and the consummation of their most enthusiastic predictions. In 1812, nine wagons were loaded at the Schuylkill mines, and led to Philadelphia, a distance of 106 miles. Two of these were sold for the cost of transportation, to persons who agreed to try the coal in their rolling mill, and the remaining seven were given away, though with difficulty to find individuals to take them. In 1814, twenty-four tons were taken down the Lehigh in Delaware to the same city, being first hauled over a rough road nine miles from the Mauch Chunk to the river; it was conveyed in an ark, at the cost of $14 per ton.

Notwithstanding the difficulty and expense of transporting it, in 1814 and 1815 there began to be a demand for the article. When peace took place, the Lehigh and Richmond coal came in abundantly, and the kindling which had fallen to a low price, in favor of coal shipment. From this time the coal trade was abandoned, until 1820, when the Lehigh navigation was completed, and 365 tons were delivered, in the capital. In 1821, 1,073 tons were brought to market, 15 tons being shipped coastwise, and the rest consumed in Philadelphia. In 1822, 1,400 tons were brought to market, $1 being shipped coastwise. In 1820 may, therefore, be regarded as an era from which we are to date the coal trade of Pennsylvania.—Report of the committee of the senate Pennsylvania, in 1834.

THE NEW VACCINE VIRUS. The last number of the London Medical Gazette, contains a third letter from Mr. Estlin, continuing the account of the re-supply of cow-pox matter from its original source at the present time. It appears that the virus is exclusively used in England, and has been sent to the United States to America. Its activity is described as being diminished by its passage through about thirty human subjects. Mr. Estlin has sent some of it to the national vaccine establishment, in London, to facilitate its being transmitted to those medical practitioners who may wish to use it, as the government grants the privilege to that institution of reviving letters of application, and of forwarding vaccine matter to every part of the kingdom free of charge.

COMMERCE OF NEW ORLEANS. It appears from official statements of the collector of the port of New Orleans, published in the Louisianaian, that the total output of exports of domestic produce from that city in the quarter ending 31st March, was as follows:

Coastwise	$8,357,788 51
Foreign ports, in American vessels	7,860,850 00
ditto, in foreign vessels	2,007,478 00

Total value $18,226,116 51
The shipments up the Mississippi river are not included in the above aggregates.

MADISON PAPERS. Messrs. Langtree & O'Sullivan, Washington, have issued a prospectus for publishing the Madison papers, including a complete and accurate report of the debates in the convention of 1787, which framed the constitution of the United States. A manuscript report of these debates, in the handwriting of the author, who was one of the most distinguished members of the convention, is understood to exist among the papers of Mr. Madison; and is certainly the only full report, one even approaching that character, of the proceedings of that body, which is in existence. The publication of this report alone is therefore a matter of high importance—to say nothing of the many other valuable papers in the same collection. The work will be published in two large volumes, royal octavo, uniform with Sparks' fine editions of Washington and Franklin, and is expected to be issued in the month of July. [Lexandria Gazette.]

SUIT AGAINST GEN. GRATIOT. We learn from the St. Louis papers, that the trial of the suit against Gen. Gratiot was commenced in the U. S. circuit court, holding its sittings in that city, on the 10th inst.—The suit is for money's retained by gen. G. as a claim for extra services rendered by him to the United States, and the dispute about which caused the dismissal, by the president, from the engineer corps.

Before the commencement of the trial of the suit against Gen. Gratiot, a suit against Gen. Eaton, was tried and decided. This suit was also for money retained and which was claimed by lieutenant E. as commissions upon money disbursed by him, as a military distributing agent for Indian affairs, under the act of congress of 1824.—A verdict in this case was returned in favor of the United States for $2,700—the jury believing the claim not to be valid. Although similar in some respects, it is said that Gen. Gratiot's case depends on entirely different grounds.

REMOVAL OF THE DEPOSITES. A volume has been recently put forth by the honorable W. J. Duane, formerly secretary of the treasury, containing a narrative and some correspondence concerning the removal of the deposits, and occurrences connected therewith. Only a limited number of copies have been printed, and these have been circulated chiefly among the friends of the author.

LOUISIANA. We were in error in stating that the nominations of Messrs. Debiginy and Garland to be judges of the supreme court of Louisiana had been confirmed by the senate of that state.—Mr. Debiginy declined the appointment, and the nomination of Mr. Garland was not acted on when the legislature adjourned sine die on the 20th ult. It was not known whether Mr. G. would have accepted, but the non-action of the senate will leave him in the next congress, to which he had been re-elected.

NORTH CAROLINA GOLD MINES. Since our last, we have heard of the discovery of very rich ore at the Lemmon's mine, about fifteen miles southeast from this place. It is believed by gentlemen who have seen the ore that one bushel of the best would be worth at least $5,000, and the poorest about $100 per bushel. This mine is situated on a ridge running from Fox's hill in a southwesterly direction to the Catawba river, and in every instance where the ridge has been penetrated, fine specimens of its richness have been discovered.

A new mine has lately been opened on the land of Mr. Elam Hunter, about five miles east of Charlotte, the ore of which is considered good, some specimens of which we have seen. This land, which would have been considered high at $500, has been increased in value several thousand.

The Rodger's mine, about seventeen miles east of this place, discovered several months ago, is also found to be rich in the precious metal, masses having been found embodied in quartz rock, one piece itself being worth $300.

The Rudsill mine, which has not been worked for some months, has been reopened under the superintendance of Capt. Penman, with a fine prospect of success.

Every indication seems to strengthen former opinions, that the mineral resources of this section of country are almost inexhaustible.

EMIGRATING SEMINOLES. From the Little Rock, Arkansas, Gazette of April 3. About two hundred and sixty Seminoles arrived here yesterday, from New Orleans, on the steambot Buckley, under the charge of captain Morrison, of the U. S. army, on their way to the country assigned them to be west. They are a portion of the band who have been sent, heretofore, to the hammocks of Florida, being led by the negro Abraha, who is with the party. They are all fat and good humored, and look as if they had been living a life of indolent ease, instead of being hunted like wild beasts from fastness to fastness. A good portion of the party is composed of women and children. The Buckley remains here with the Indians on board, waiting for water to convey them to Fort Gibson.

OFFICERS OF OUR NAVY. The following list shows the places of nativity of all the commissioned and warrant officers in the U. S. navy; Virginia, 192; New York, 171; Pennsylvania, 157; Maryland, 124; Massachusetts, 102; New Jersey, 66; South Carolina, 49; District of Columbia, 40; Connecticut, 40; North Carolina, 37; Maine 33; New Hampshire, 30; Rhode Island, 29; Georgia, 24; Kentucky, 25; Delaware, 20, Ohio, 16; Vermont 14; Tennessee, 12; Louisiana, 4; Alabama, 4; Missouri, 4; Illinois, 3; Mississippi, 2; Michigan, 1; Indiana, 1; Florida 1; Ireland, 12; England, 9; West Indies, 5; Germany, 2; Greece, 2; Sweden, 1; Belgium 1; France, 1; Spain, 1; Gibraltar, 1; Italy, 1; Sicily, 1; Canada, 1; at sea, 1.

THE SOUTHERN COMMERCIAL CONVENTION assembled at Charleston on the 15th inst. 208 delegates being present, representing the states of South Carolina, North Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Tennessee, and the territory of Florida. The hon. Asbury Hull, of Georgia, was unanimously elected president, and chancellor Harper, of South Carolina, Mr. King, of North Carolina, Mr. Jarnagin, of Tennessee, col. Hamilton, of Georgia, Mr. Pollard, of Alabama and col. Wm. J. Mills, of Florida, appointed vice presidents.

A committee of twenty-one was appointed to prepare business for the convention. General Hayne, introduced a series of resolutions embracing all the important doctrines of the advocates of the direct trade, and recommending the extension of facilities to merchants, the formation of commercial connections in Europe, the vigorous pursuits of internal improvements, the promotion of commercial education and the establishment of the southern review, all as means contributing more or less to the object of the convention. The resolutions were on his motion referred to the committee of 21.

The hon. F. H. Elmore, introduced the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted, viz:

Resolved, That a committee of nine, to consist principally of merchants from the interior of the states and territory represented in this convention, be appointed to ascertain and report, whether goods have not been imported and sold at southern seaports, upon as good terms, and at as fair rates as they can be procured at the north—and whether the country merchants cannot now procure at the southern seaports as full a supply and as good assortments, upon as fair terms and as favorable periods of payment, as they can be procured elsewhere—and whether there exists any, and what advantage from making purchases from the direct importers at the south.

DOUBTFUL DISTRICT IN ILLINOIS. Mr. Stuart has addressed the following to his competitor in the recent congressional election, Springfield, March 13, 1839.

Stephen A. Douglas, esq. Sir: Your communication under date of March 4th, has been received, and I have bestowed a careful reflection upon the propositions submitted by you. The determination at which I have arrived, I have already given you in a verbal communication, which is, that I decline acceding to either of your propositions.

Your propositions seemed to be based upon the supposition that "there seemed to have been much difficulty in determining which of us was duly elected by the people," and "that by some the result is even yet considered doubtful." It would be very apparent that were I to accede to either of your propositions, that I would thereby acknowledge that I too, had doubts, which would be very far from the truth. I have carefully examined all the facts that have been brought before the public, all the alleged mistakes that have been made against you, and as at present advised, I have not one single doubt, but that I have received a majority of the votes of the people. If you have doubts upon that subject, you can contest the election, and I will prove it even to your satisfaction. Under this state of fact I would prove false to myself, to my friends, to the people who elected me, whose favors I gratefully acknowledge, were I to resign the post with which they have honored me, because you had some doubts. If I were to resign and run the race over and beat you again, you might even then have some doubts.

I acknowledge in all its force the doctrine, that the people should rule, and using your own language, "I would disdain to accept of a seat in congress except by the will and votes of a majority of those I should represent." I bow with gratitude to the people, that they have given me the privilege to say that, I believe I now have that majority. If I believed I had not that majority, I would accede to some one of your propositions; but believing as I do, that I have a clear majority, I decline them all. If the trouble, excitement, delay and expense, of a contested election does happen—if, as some of your friends say, "this large and populous district is to be for a time without a representative, on you shall that responsibility rest. I do not consider your various propositions worthy of a more particular reply, as they are all evidently intended for the public, and not for me.

This will close our correspondence upon this subject. JOHN T. STUART.

CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO CANAL. We learn with great pleasure that the water has been admitted into the twenty-seven miles of this canal lately finished, and that boats are now navigating that, as well as the older portions of the line.

This completes one hundred and thirty-seven miles of this great work, leaving but fifty miles to finish, in order to connect the town of Cumberland with tide-water, by the most perfect canal navigation which this country can boast of.

We may now expect a great increase to the trade of the canal, because the portion in use connects with the national road at Hancock, at which point the descending trade will take the boat. Already several boats, freighted with potatoes, fish, salt and other merchandise, from this District, have passed through this one hundred and thirty-seven miles of canal, to points on the river above the 6th dam, which is at the mouth of Great Cacapon river.

Owing to the unusual low stage of the water at this season of the year, the river navigation between Cumberland and the point to which the canal is finished is very dangerous; so much so, that out of seven coal boats which left Cumberland lately, during a small rise in the river, but three reached the canal, the others being lost. This fact shows how important the completion of the canal is to the people of Maryland, as well as to the advantages which the people of this District may reasonably anticipate, upon the accomplishment of that event. EXPLORING EXPEDITION. Letter from the secretary of the navy, communicating information as to the pay and promotion of officers of the exploring expedition.

Navy department, Feb. 14, 1839.

Sir: In compliance with a resolution of the house of representatives of the 11th instant, directing the secretary of the navy "to inform this house what pay and emoluments are allowed to lieutenant Wilkes and the officers under his command in the South sea exploring expedition, and if any assurances have been given by the department that the acting appointments now held by them will be confirmed on their return to the United States, and whether the expedition is of a naval character or not," I have the honor to state:

That the pay and emoluments of lieutenant Wilkes and the officers under his command have not been increased by an authority derived from this department beyond those established by law.

That no assurances have been given by this department that the acting appointments now held by them will be confirmed on their return to the United States—but that on the contrary, their appointments are expressly limited to the duration of this special service, and cease from the moment the officers are detached from the expedition.

And that the expedition is not of a military character, from the express terms of the law by which it is authorised—it is strictly prohibited by instructions from engaging in hostilities, except in self-defence, and restricted to the peaceful purposes of extending the bounds of geographical knowledge, enlarging the sphere of science, and affording additional facilities to commercial enterprise.

Whether a consideration of the circumstances that most of the officers of the expedition were withdrawn from the coast survey, where they received additional pay; that they are engaged in a service of great exposure and probable hardship and privation, calling for the exercise of more than ordinary fortitude and endurance, shall entitle them to the emoluments which they sacrificed to enter upon this enterprise, when it is successfully accomplished, is for the wisdom and equity of congress to decide. I have the honor to be, with the highest respect, sir, your obedient servant,
J. K. PAULDING,
Hon. speaker of the house of representatives.

ATLANTIC STORMS. The phenomena of storms are recently attracting from the scientific world considerable attention. Very important developments of the laws which govern their progress and character have lately been made, especially by Mr. William C. Redfield, of New York. The results of this gentleman's investigations, as published in a late volume of Sillman's well known American Journal of science and arts, have been noticed, with the most flattering commendations, in the principal scientific journals in England, and by various learned societies beyond the Atlantic. This adds another item to the credit of philosophic mind in America.

By comparing numerous data, Mr. Redfield has traced both the form and the progress of several storms which have lately agitated the bosom of the old Atlantic. Their form is that of a great whirlwind of hundreds of miles in circuit. This whirl moves round its centre, in a direction opposite to the sun's apparent motion, and the centre, together with the whole body of the whirl, has a progressive motion onward towards the west and north, in one vast curve. This curve Mr. R. has traced from a region in the eastern Atlantic towards the coast of Africa, and a few degrees north of the equator, thence, at first nearly west, but veering constantly more and more to the north as it approaches the American coast, until it arrives opposite New England, where its course is nearly north; and in its further progress it is still more towards the east.

It is by no means yet certain that these characters belong to all the Atlantic storms. The results, however, already attained, may be of vast importance to the interests of navigation, and thereby to the world generally. [Boston Advertiser]

ABOLITION IN THE FRENCH COLONIES. It is anticipated that the abolition of French negro slavery which is connected with the sugar question, will occupy the legislature. The Paris abolitionists have not been idle since last spring. They have constantly corresponded with British societies and expect success from the occurrence in the British West Indies. The French, generally, question the philanthropy of England in the abolition of slavery. They attribute the measure to calculations of interest alone, "the manufacture of beet root sugar in Europe, and other events, having taught her that slaves and sugar islands would ere long become unprofitable in the commercial sense." [Salem Gazette]

THE LORILLARD ESTATE. On Saturday the gentlemen who were appointed to make a fair division of the real estate of the late George Lorillard, finished their labors. The property consisted of upward of four hundred houses, stores and blocks of property in the city, and is valued at upwards of three millions of dollars. After the same was completed, the five heirs drew by lot for their parcels. The estate of Jacob Lorillard took one part—Peter Lorillard one—Mrs. Robert Barstow and niece one—Mrs. John G. Coster and brother, one—and the other to a sister, the name we did not hear.

It will be recollected that Mr. Lorillard died a bachelor, leaving his property to his nephews and nieces. Some of the heirs being dissatisfied, they contested the validity of the will, which was declared void by the court of errors. By this decision this immense property will now come into use in much more advantageous manner for the public than if the will had been sustained. [N. Y. Exp.]

DINNER TO MR. RIVES. A public dinner was given to Mr. Rives by his fellow citizens of Albemarle county, on the 24th inst. The following is a copy of his letter of acceptance:

Castle Hill, April 5th, 1839.

GENTLEMEN: I have received, with the liveliest sensibility, your communication of the 2d inst.

The testimony it conveys to me of your approbation of my public conduct is most dear to me. It comes from those, of whom a large majority have been close and near observers of my conduct, ever since I have been called, by the confidence of my fellow-citizens, to take any part whatever in public affairs. Coming, too, from men, whose uniform and consistent attachment to the illustrious founders and cherished principles of the republican party, is well known, and who were ardent friends to the election of the present chief magistrate, (in the hope and belief that he would faithfully carry out those principles), it is a cheering indication that the spirit of party subserviency has not, in this ancient and venerable commonwealth, extinguished the sentiments of manly independence and of public virtue, which recognises the good of the country as the sole legitimate end of party co-operation, and the only rightful test by which to try the actions of public men. It is in obedience to this principle, that I have felt myself called on by every obligation of patriotism and fidelity; to oppose, to the best of my ability, those measures of the administration, which, with you, I believe to be pernicious to the interests, and dangerous to the free republican institutions of our country.

Profoundly grateful, gentlemen, for the approbation you have so cordially expressed of my conduct in this and other instances, since I have been in the public service, I accept, with pleasure your kind invitation, and shall be most happy to meet you at the time and place you have indicated. Accept, I pray you, the sentiments of warm regard and fellow-esteem with which I am your friend and fellow-citizen.
W. C. RIVES.

To Messrs. Higginbotham, Craven, Durrell, Kinsolving and others.

GENERAL SCOTT. In connection with the name of general Scott, we copy from a recent publication, by Dr. Channing, this noble tribute to "the pacificator"

To this distinguished man belongs the rare honor of uniting, with military energy and daring, the spirit of a philanthropist. His exploits in the field, which placed him in the first rank of our soldiers, have been obscured by the purer and more lasting glory of a pacificator, and of a friend of mankind. In the whole history of the intercourse of civilized with barbarous or half-civilized communities, we doubt whether a brighter page can be found than that which records his agency in the removal of the Cherokees. As far as the wrongs done to this race can be atoned for, general Scott has made the expiation. In his recent mission to the disturbed borders of our country, he has succeeded, not so much by policy as by the nobleness and generosity of his character, by moral influences, by the earnest conviction with which he has enforced on all with whom he has had to do, the obligations of patriotism, justice, humanity and religion. It would not be easy to find among us a man who has won a more favor, and I am happy to offer this tribute, because I would do something, no matter how little to hasten the time, when the spirit of Christian humanity shall be accounted an essential attribute, and the brightest ornament in a public man.

STEAM MAIL PACKETS. A contract had been made by the British government, with the honorable S. Cunard, for the conveyance of the mails from England to Halifax, and from Halifax to Boston, also from Halifax by Pictou to Quebec, twice-monthly, for the sum of £55,000 sterling per annum. The contract is for seven years. The first boat is to leave Liverpool, May 1, 1840. The boats from Halifax to Boston and from Pictou to Quebec, to run along the navigation continues open between the two latter ports, are to be of 150 horse power. The boat from Liverpool to Halifax 300 horse power. To carry these arrangements into effect, it is stated that seven or eight boats will be required. Mr. Cunard intends that the boats shall be built in Scotland, letter received in Halifax, stating these facts, recommends that there shall be no delay in building the long talked of hotel at Halifax.

ATLANTIC STEAM NAVIGATION. An interesting letter on this subject, from an American citizen in London, is contained in the New York Courier. The writer furnishes the following list of steam vessels now employed in navigating the Atlantic, as also those which are being built for that purpose: Great Western—1,250 tons, 450 horse power, built in Bristol.

British Queen—1,800 tons, 600 horse power, built in London.

Liverpool—1,050 tons, 464 horse power, built Liverpool.

President, (American)—2,400 tons, 600 horse power, built in London.

United States—1,250 tons, 420 horse power, built in Liverpool.

United Kingdom—1,250 tons, 420 horse power, built in Liverpool.

Atlanta—1,250 tons, 350 horse power, (iron built) in Liverpool.

New York—to be built in Bristol, of iron.

Thus, in the course of two years, there will be employed between England and the United States no less than eight British steam ships; and allowing each to perform eight voyages per annum, we shall have a steam conveyance at intervals of every 5 days.

LAW CASE. An important decision to American merchants was made in Boston, by chief justice Shaw, last week. It was on an action brought against a commission merchant to recover the difference between the price at which a lot of goods were sold, and the price limited by the owner—an advance having been made upon the consignee by the commission merchant. It was ruled by the court, says the Boston Times, that "a commission merchant having received goods to sell at a limit price, and made advances on the same, has a right to reimburse himself by selling said goods at a market price, if the consignee refuses upon application, and after reasonable time, to repay the advances."

IMPORTANT DECISION. The supreme court of mysylvania, it is said, have recently decided that pay and emoluments of officers in the revenue (the United States are subject to taxation for count and it may be inferred for corporation purposes. opinion was expressed as to naval and military officers, as they may be employed and spend their money abroad. If settled here, they seem to count in the decision. The answer to the objection is that they are officers of the superior government, and that the principle on which the decision was made is the same as that on which the stock of the United States bank, held by a resident, was declared able, as of a state institution. If the officers of the United States have not heretofore been taxed, this decision is one of importance to the country, especially to the city, where the great body of officers of the general government is located, and whose salaries, even including judges, are now considered rateable; the same court having decided that the office of a president judge of the common pleas subject to taxation. Although his salary cannot constitutionally be reduced, the court said there was more reason to exempt a judge from contribution than the public burthen, than any other person. On referring to the blue book, we find, on a rough estimate, that there are at least one hundred customs officers, with aggregate salaries of from 110,000 to 112,000 dollars. If to these salaries are added salaries of all the officers in the post office and army, with many connected with the war and navy departments, salaries to the amount of at least 3,000,000 dollars become rateable to the county and city tax. [Phila. U. S. Gaz.]

MONTEVIDEO AND BUENOS AYRES. By the arrival of the bark Col. Howard, at New York, from Montevideo, letters have been received from that city to the 9th February, which state the continuance of the blockade of Buenos Ayres, without any prospect of its being raised. A portion of the French squadron were in the river Parana, probably for the purpose of preventing government Rosas sending troops to the province of Entre Rios. Gen. Rivera was still leaving Montevideo to take the command of forces raised by the province for the purpose of operating against Rosas in Entre Rios. The declaration of war by Montevideo against Buenos Ayres is about being proclaimed.

FROM SMYRNA. We have received our files of yria papers to January 2d. They contain some details of information from the east, which we had before received. Mehemet Ali, the pacha of Egypt, had published a circular announcing his safe return to Karlowa, and detailing his travels to that city. Under the head of Alexandria, Dec. 22, we find the following: A protestation of the consuls of Egypt against the pacha Abbas, governor of this city, was yesterday the prevailing subject of conversation. The protest relates to an insult offered this governor to M. Thibet, French consul, in using the pipe to be offered to general Ventura, whom he had gone to present, without offering him. The pacha has sometimes also the rudeness to have a pipe brought to himself without giving it to the consuls who are visiting him. The protest, which rests principally on these grievances, signed by the English, French, Sardinian, Austrian and American consuls.

Under the date of Constantinople, Jan. 2, we find the following: on last Wednesday, the palace of the sultana Atie, the youngest daughter of the sultan, whose marriage is to be celebrated this spring, was destroyed by fire. This palace is situated on the European shore of the Bosphorus, near the palace of the sultan's sister. The fire is thought by the carelessness of a workman, who discovered the quantity of spirits of turpentine remaining in a vessel, brought a light near it; the fire took immediately, and spread with incredible rapidity, so that a great number of workmen found it impossible to escape; the number who perished is placed as high as twenty. The Seraskier Pacha had a great number of distinguished persons collected on the spot, but notwithstanding the promptness and efficiency of the assistance, it was impossible to save the palace, which was wholly consumed in a few hours. The loss is estimated at five million piasters. It is determined not to rebuild the palace on the same ground, and that the sultan's residence shall have for its permanent or temporary residence the palace of Said Pacha, situated at the Arnaut-Kouy, and which was last occupied by the sultana Mihrima. [Boston Daily Adv.]

FROM CHINA. We are indebted to a friend for a copy of the Canton Register to October 30th. Their news is anticipated. We glean some items:

China. The army. The Mandshoors, with the Mongolians and Chinese, who accompanied them upon their first invasion of China, constitute a distinct military community, which is divided into "standards." Every standard is sub-divided into three sections, each section or division into companies, and every company consists of one hundred and fifty men.

The Mandshoors quartered at Pekin are one hundred and two thousand; the Mongolians in the same city thirty thousand; the Chinese thirty-nine thousand; the Mandshoors in the provinces one hundred and twenty-six thousand; to these add the "wild hunters" fourteen thousand—total three hundred and thirteen thousand troops.

There is a prince at the head of every standard, who is styled a "Dshasak," a term denoting a ruler; immediately under him are the "Tosolakishi," his adjutant or aide-de-camp, and the "Chosho dshangin," his aid or adjutant; and next we have the "Dshalandshagin," or colonel, and the "Somo-dshangin," or heads of squadrons and companies.

The Chinese troops form two separate classes; the one consisting of the Mandshoors, Mongolians and Manshoors, Chinese, and the other of native born troops. The first named class is selected from the different standards, and thence denominated exclusively "Standard Troops;" the last named class bear green standards whence they are termed the "Troop of the Green Standard;" the former garrison the principal cities and towns of the empire, while the latter do the ordinary duty of ports, as well within as beyond the frontiers of China. The standard troops amount to two hundred and sixty-six thousand, and the troops of the green standard to six hundred and sixty-six thousand three hundred; forming a total force of nine hundred and thirty-nine thousand three hundred men. The government maintains three thousand regular troops in Thibet, besides a number of irregulars.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE CANALS OF ENGLAND. The following calculation will show the immense wealth created in England by the spirit of association and of enterprise, which is developed with so much difficulty amongst other nations. It presents a comparison between the first cost of shares in each respective canal and of the profit realized on stock, according to the actual returns:

Canal	First cost	Value of stock
Canal of Coventry, sterling	£ 100	£ 750
of Mersey	100	720
of Oxford	100	410
of Leeds and Liverpool	100	470
of Monmouthshire	100	195
of Trent and Mersey, one-quarter of part 50	500	650
d'Oxford	100	550
of Longborough	142	2,200
of Clomorganshire	172	290
of Warwick & Hampton 100	215
of Stroudwater	150	500
of Heat	107	289
of Shrewsbury	125	250
of Birmingham	17	240
of Stafford & Worcester	140	550

The capital employed in the prosecution of these canals increased, as their utility and the benefits to be derived from them were made known, to the surprising point at which they are at the present day, being a quintuple profit. One hundred pounds sterling invested in this stock, yields to its proprietor an interest of more than five times that amount, and a revenue in proportion. [Not. Int.]

SWIFTNES OF BIRDS. The smallest bird, says M. Virey, can fly several leagues in an hour; the hawk goes commonly at the rate of a league in four minutes, or above forty miles an hour. A falcon of Henry II. was flown from Fontainebleau, and found, by its ring, at Malta next day. One, sent from Canaries to Andalusia, returned to Tenerife in sixteen hours, a distance of near seven hundred miles, which it must have gone at the average rate of twenty-four miles an hour. Gulls go seven hundred miles out to sea and return daily; and frigate birds have been found at twelve hundred miles from any land. Upon their migration, he states as a known fact, that cranes go and return at the same date, without the least regard to the state of the weather, which shows, no doubt, if true, a most peculiar instinct; but these, and indeed, all facts which we find stated by a writer so much addicted to painting and coloring, may be received with a degree of suspicion for which no one but M. Virey is to be blamed. The accounts, however, of the swiftness of birds, I can well credit, from an experiment which I made when travelling on a railway. While going at the rate of thirty miles an hour, I let fly a bee; it made its circles as usual, and surrounded us easily. Now, if there was no current of air or draft to bear it along, this indicated a rate of ninety miles an hour; and even allowing for a current, the swiftness must have been great. I should, however, wish to repeat the experiment before being quite sure of so great a swiftness in so small an insect. [Lord Brougham.]

PITCAIRN'S ISLAND. This small and remote spot, so well known and interesting, from its having been the retreat of a portion of the mutineers of the British government brig Bounty, commanded by lieutenant Bligh, was recently touched at by the bark Kent, on her passage from California to this port. It may be remembered, that some years since, Alexander Smith alias John Adams, one of the crew of the Bounty, and the patriarch of the island, contemplating the increasing population, with the limited means of support, deemed it advisable to remove with the inhabitants for Otaheite; but after a short residence, being disgusted with the licentious conduct of the natives, they were reconveyed to their own little paradise in the midst of the South Pacific. It is not a little singular that, with the exception of two or three of their number who died, the whole body should have returned without leaving one of their company behind. When the Bounty last left the island of Otaheite she had on board nine of the mutineers, six men and twelve women of Tabonai and Otaheite. Of these there are but two of the women now living. Adams died in 1829. The whole number of the inhabitants, at the time of the Kent's visit, was ninety-nine, one having died a day or two before her arrival. They are represented to be the same simple hearted, happy and religious people described by captain Beechy of the Blossom, and others, and living without any chief or governor. Whalers frequently visit them for supplies of vegetables, of which there is an abundance of various kinds. Pigs and goats are scarce, and seldom killed by the natives, with a view of increasing their stock. It may be interesting to the curious, to know that a piece of the bell of the Bounty was brought home by captain Steele. A highly interesting account of the mutiny and a description of Pitcairn's island, may be found in the 31st number of Harper's Family Library

THE "FIRST IRON STEAMBOAT." We have twice or three times, within the past year endeavored to "set history right," in regard to the place at which steamboat was built in America. The steamboat "Codorus" was the first iron steamboat built in the United States, as has been repeatedly stated in this and other papers; and that boat was built some twelve or fourteen years since, at York, Pa. by Messrs. Davis, Gartner & Webb and Mr. John Elgar. The boat was intended to ply on the Susquehanna river, and with that especial object in view, was so constructed, as to draw about twelve inches of water, with all her machinery on board. It was built at York, (the hull altogether of iron), mounted upon wheels and thus transported by horse power to the river, and there launched, opposite Marietta. It made one or two voyages under "captain Elgar" to the head waters of the Susquehanna; but small as was its draft of water, it was found to be too great at certain seasons for the bars and shallows of the river, and the enterprise was abandoned. The first iron steamboat, was afterwards brought to this city, where after remaining sometime, it was taken farther south, to ply on some small river. Of its after destinies, we have no information.

All this, we think, has been stated, at least in substance, once or twice before, in this paper. Yet, in the Patriot of Wednesday, a short paragraph, from another paper some how found place, which states that "the first iron steamboat in this country, is now building at Pittsburgh!" How are we to credit, or accredit, the truths of history, if the record of passing events, regarding a matter of which there is no doubt, becomes so early vitiated? [Balt. Pat.]

THE LAKES. The extent of the great lakes is stated in the report of the Michigan state geologist, as follows:

	Mean length.	Mean breadth.	Area, sq. mls.
Superior	400	70	32,000
Michigan	200	80	20,000
Huron	210	80	20,000
Green Bay	100	20	2,000
Eric	240	40	0,600
Ontario	150	25	6,300
St. Clair	20	14	260
			80,060

The same tabular statement exhibits also the depth of each and the elevation of each above the water—

	Mean depth.	Elevation.
Superior	400	596
Michigan	1,000	578
Huron	1,000	578
St. Clair	20	570
Erie	84	565
Ontario	500	232

It is computed that the lakes contain more than 14,000 cubic miles of water, a quantity more than half of all the fresh water on the earth.

The extent of country drained by the lakes, from Niagara to the northwestern angle of Superior, including also the area of the lakes themselves, is estimated at 335,315 square miles.

The rise of water at Detroit from June, 1830, to August, 1838, is said to have been 5 feet 3 inches. The water fell from August, 1838, to February, 1839, 3 feet 8 inches, so that it is 1 foot 7 inches above the mark of 1830. [Ohio Transcript.]

The average size of farms 105 acres. Of barley 178 acres were raised in the county. Corn averaged 33 bushels per acre. Potatoes 170 bushels per acre. The county has a surplus of oats, corn and potatoes. 193,783 lbs. of maple sugar were made, averaging 3 lbs. to a tree. The best crop of ruta baga on record in the United States was raised in Chocorot township, averaging on 3 acres more than 1,200 bushels per acre. 342 tons of plaster were sown. Dr. Rose, of Silver Lake, has a large number of merino sheep, and sold 18,000 lbs. of wool at 44 cents per pound. Susquehanna county, in Pennsylvania, adjoins the county of Broome, New York; and in its general characteristics of soil, productions, &c. much resembles that.

The following statement of the number of bushels of wheat and corn raised in the state of Maine the last year is from the Maine Farmer. It shows what Maine can do, and that she is able to raise a sufficient quantity of grain on land already under a state of cultivation to fully supply her own citizens.

"PERLS OF THE SEA." The schooner Pearl, which left New York, on the 29th ultimo for Newbern, N. C. was run ashore on the 31st, about four miles from Hatteras, for the purpose of saving the lives of those on board. She had previously shipped a sea, which washed a sailor, (William Bird, of New Jersey), overboard, broke the captain's leg, and bruised the mate and one of the men so severely that the former had to be carried below. The same sea stove both boats, carried away the main boom, stove the lee bulwarks, weather quarter, &c. leaving the vessel a complete wreck.

At this time the condition of all on board was indeed perilous—the vessel on a dangerous lee shore, almost unmanageable, with but one man of the whole crew left capable of duty. Remembering the old adage, that "while there is life there is hope" and trusting in the assisting mercy of an all ruling Providence, the passengers, after consulting the officers and crew, exerted themselves to run the vessel on shore as a last and desperate chance for escape. This was happily accomplished about half past eight o'clock at night, under the encouragement of the captain and directions of the mate, who, bruised and injured as they were, exerted themselves to the utmost of their power. At day break they found they were near Cape Hatteras, and soon afterwards all reached the land in safety. [Bald. American.]

TRADE OF PITTSBURG. The following article from the Pittsburg Gazette indicates what the folks at the western end of the Pennsylvania chain of canals are doing in the way of trade:

"We have never witnessed such a display of business as is this day made at our landing along the Monongohela river. The whole extent of the landing, from the bridge to Ferry street, appears to be covered with packages of merchandise, bales of cotton, bacon in casks, flour, corn, hemp, lead, pig metal and a variety of other articles; while the drays, carts, &c. keep up a continued bustle, passing and repassing between the river and the canal basin. The river however, is falling, and unless we have rain very soon, the boats will be compelled to take lighter loads down the river.

We are pleased to learn, as is stated in the annexed paragraph, from the Advocate, that adequate means of conveyance on the canal are provided.

The short time required to transport goods from Philadelphia to Pittsburg the present season—eight days, or thereabouts—is a subject of general remark. This is in part owing to the excellent condition of the canals and railroads, and in part to the greater perfection in the arrangements of our enterprising and indefatigable transporters. We occasionally look into the warehouses at the basin, and have been surprised to find them comparatively clear, when, judging from the long lines of heavy laden drays which, from morning till night may be seen wending their way to that point, we expected to see them crowded. Great as the trade is, the means of conveyance are adequate to it."

EXPEDITION TO OREGON. The St. Louis Republican, of the 5th instants, says:

"The steamer Antelope, owned by Pierre Chouteau, jr. and commanded by De Chenet, both of this city, left yesterday, with several scientific gentlemen; among whom are Mons. Nicolet, of the academy of sciences of Paris, and lieutenant Fremore, of the topographical engineer department at Washington; also, about 12 clerks, and 120 hands; laden with articles for the supply of the trade. The corps will be conveyed some distance above the mouth of the Yellow Stone river, as far as the water will enable the boat to ascend, probably a distance exceeding 2,000 miles above the mouth of the Missouri. The boat is expected back in about three months. The company left in good spirits, and we trust the fatigues, trials and sufferings attendant on such an expedition will not be endured without a fair recompense. This whole company is in the service of the American for company, which sends a like number to the mountains about once in two years, the time usually required for the excursion."

FREDERICK THE GREAT AND THE UNITED STATES. Frederick was never doubtful as to the issue of the revolutionary war between this country and Great Britain, and openly declared his sentiments in a treaty which he concluded with Russia in 1781, of armed neutrality. Franklin, Adams and Jefferson, valued the friendly disposition of the great monarch so highly, whose influence over his age was great, that they invited him before any other power to a treaty of amity and commerce, which was concluded at the Hague, 20th September, 1785, and which was the last national act to which the king annexed his signature. Part of this treaty reads thus: "If one of the two powers be at war with a third party, the commercial intercourse between the said two powers shall thereby suffer no interruption, and their respective flags shall protect even the property of the enemy; and in case this property be amonitions of war, it shall be simply kept in deposit, without being seized. If ever there should be any difficulty between the two countries themselves, the contest shall be confined to the armies, and commerce shall go on un molested, and no letters of marque shall be issued. The prisoners of war shall be treated in the most humane manner, and have the same pay, and enjoy the same treatment, as their own soldiers of the countries according to their respective ranks."

[Augusta Chronicle.]

THE GREAT TREE. From the Boston Transcript April 12. We observed, on crossing the common on Wednesday, that the Great Elm was laden with buds, which the imprisoned foliage seemed panting to burst, and set itself free from thralldom. The noble tree appeared in vigorous condition, and as young and as graceful, with all its majesty, as the little striplings around it. We were reminded, by our accidental and early notice of the tree, of an article which appeared about eighteen years ago. We have sought for it, and make from it the following extract.

"The great tree did not, as has often been supposed, spring from the soil, on which it now stands, but was set out there, probably more than one hundred and fifty years ago. Madam Scott, formerly the widow of governor Hancock, now an octogenarian, or near it—a lady whose retentive memory and general information is only surpassed by the polish of her manners and her knowledge of the elegant courtesies of life—has stated to the writer of this article, that Mrs. Hancock, wife of Thomas Hancock, who was uncle to the governor, and a merchant of Boston, used frequently to repeat the current tradition in her family, that her grandfather, a gentleman by the name of Henchman, brought this tree from the North-End, and planted it in the place where it now stands, in the moist lands of the common—a proper place for an elm.

"The good lady who spoke of this act of her grandfather, was born in the early part of the last century, and of course the tree could not have been brought in her infancy. Twenty-five years ago the tree had a large hollow in it, and bore marks of rapid decay; but by the treatment recommended by Forsyth, it was revived, and is now as vigorous a tree about us, without any appearance of the hollow, which was once large enough for a boy to hide in. The tree is a native elm, which are the most hardy sort. Several of the large trees in the mall are what is called the English elms. This species have less extended roots and branches than the American elm, and are more liable to be uprooted by violent winds. In the September gale of 1811 several of the English elms were blown down, while the American elms by their side bore the blast with only a slight laceration."

THE DAGUERROTYPÉ. The following is an extract from a private letter of professor S. F. J. Morse to the editor of the Observer, dated Paris March 9th.

"You have perhaps heard of the Daguerrotypé, a called from the discoverer, M. Daguerre. It is one of the most beautiful discoveries of the age. I don't know if you recollect some experiments of mine in New Haven, many years ago, when I had my painting room next to professor Silliman's, experiment to ascertain if it were possible to fix the image of the Camera Obscura. I was able to produce different degrees of shade on paper, dipped into a solution of nitrate of silver, by means of different degrees of light but finding that light produced dark, and dark light I presumed the production of a true image to be impracticable, and gave up the attempt. M. Daguerre has realised in the most exquisite manner this idea.

"A few days ago I addressed a note to M. D. requesting, as a stranger, the favor to see his results at an evening, in my turn to see my photograph. I was politely invited to see them under these circumstances, for he had determined not to show them again, until the chambers had passed definitely on a proposition for the government to purchase the secret of the discovery, and make it public. The day before yesterday, the 7th, I called on M. Daguerre at his rooms in the diorama, to see these admirable results.

"They are produced on a metallic surface, the principal pieces about 7 inches by 5, and they resemble aquatint engravings, for they are in simple chiaro oscuro and not in colors. But the exquisite minuteness of the delineation cannot be conceived. No painting or engraving ever approached it. For example: In a view up the street, a distant sign would be perceived and the eye could just discern that there were lines of letters upon it, but so minute as not to be read with the naked eye. By the assistance of a powerful lens, which magnified fifty times applied to the delineation, every letter was clearly and distinctly legible, and so also were the minutes breaks and lines in the walls of the buildings, and the pavements of the streets. The effect of the lens upon the picture was in a great degree like that of the telescope in nature.

"Objects moving are not impressed. The Boulevard, so constantly filled with a moving throng of edestrians and carriages, was perfectly solitary, except an individual who was having his boots polished. His feet were compelled, of course, to be stationary for some time, on being on the box of the boot-black, and the other on the ground, consequently his boots and legs are well defined, but he without body or head, because these were in motion.

* In the report it was put No. of acres instead of trees tapped, which was clearly an error.

"The impressions of interior views are Breamrandant perfected. One of Mr. D.'s plates is an appresio of a spider. The spider was not bigger than the head of a large pin, but the image, magnified by the solar microscope to the size of the palm of the hand, having been impressed on the plate, and examined through a lens, was further magnified, and showed a minuteness of organization hitherto not seen to exist. You perceive how this discovery is, therefore, about to open a new field of research in the depths of microscopic nature. We are soon to see if the minute has discoverable limits. The naturalist is to have a new kingdom to explore, as such beyond the microscope as the microscope is beyond the naked eye.

A RED INDIAN DANCE. In the afternoon, Mr. Johnson informed me that the Indians were preparing to dance for my particular amusement. I was, of course, most thankful and delighted. Almost in the same moment, I heard their yells and shrieks resounding along the shore, mingled with the measured monotonous drum. We had taken our place on an elevated platform behind the house—a kind of little lawn on the hill side—the precipitous rocks, clothed with trees and bushes, rose high like a wall above us; the glorious sunshine of a cloudless summer's day was over our heads—the dazzling blue lake and its islands at our feet. Soft and elysian in its beauty was all around. And when these wild and more than half-naked figures came up, leaping, whooping, running, shrieking, hideously painted, and doing such things as, to our eyes, jangled it was like a masque of fiends breaking into paradise! The rables of Comus might have hoisted themselves comely in comparison, even though no self-deluding poison had bleered their eyes and intellect. It was a grotesque and horrible phantasmagoria. Of their style of clothing, I say nothing—for, as it is wisely said, nothing can come of nothing—only if "all symbols be clothes," according to our great modern philosopher—my Indian friends were thrown aside, all the resources of the Indian toilette, all their store of leathers, and bears' claws, hawks' bills, vermilion, root and verdigris, were brought into requisition as decorations; and no two were alike. One man wore three or four heads of hair, composed of the manes of a pair of animals, wore a pair of deer's horns; another was "coiffed" with the skin and feathers of a crane or some such bird—its long bill projecting from his forehead; another had the shell of a small turtle suspended from his back, and dangling behind; another used the skin of a polecat for the same purpose. One had painted his right leg with red bars, and his left leg with green lines; parti-colored eyes and faces, green noses, and blue chins, or vice versa, were general. I observed that in this grotesque deformity, in the care with which every thing like symmetry or harmony in form or colors was avoided, there was something evidently studied and artificial. The orchestra was composed of two drums and two rattles, and a chorus of voices. The song was without melody—a perpetual repetition of three or four notes, melancholy, harsh and monotonous.

A flag was then stuck in the ground, and around this they began their dance—it dance it could be called—the movements consisting of the alternately rising of one foot, then the other, and swinging the body to and fro. Every now and then they paused, and sent forth that dreadful, prolonged tremulous yell, which re-echoed from the cliffs, and pierced my ears and thrilled long my nerves. The whole exhibition was that of finished barbarism, that it was at least complete in its way, and for a time I looked on with curiosity and interest. But that inane loathing which dwells within me for all that is discordant and deformed, rendered it any thing but pleasant to witness.

RUFNER AGAINST CROCKETT. On Thursday night last, Mr. John Ruffner, who lives just at the foot of the fort Mountain, and on the banks of the Beamanohad river, heard his dogs in pursuit of what he supposed to be a deer. He followed them to a point, not far from the river, where he supposed the game, whatever it was, would cross a small ridge on its way back to the mountain. The dogs, however, continued running along the river bank, and at last uttered the loud sounding bark, as if they had treed. This was about 10 o'clock at night. Mr. Ruffner supposed that the deer had taken to the water, and the dogs were baying it. He immediately cut for the river—but had no gun, nor other weapon offensive or defensive. When he got to the river, he saw by the light of the broad full moon, a large, dark looking animal, standing in the edge of the water, the dog just beyond in the water, and two others on the beach within a few feet of it. Without stopping a moment, down the bank he went, when the animal and the dog immediately struck for the other shore. They happened to be just opposite the mouth of Mill run, and for that point the game seemed to aim. Mr. Ruffner plunged into the river after the dogs, and with some difficulty reached the opposite bank, and came up to them, where, as the animal made repeated efforts to climb the steep bank just under a high cliff of rocks, the dogs would catch hold of it and they would all tumble back into the river. He now, for the first time, was warned of his danger, and perceived what sort of a "critter" he had to do with. The terrible snap of his enormous jaws; and the haughty way he was making with the dogs, showed him that it was a terocious he wof the largest of his tribe.

Here then was a case. The dogs—though brave as lions, and the idols of their master's affections, were manifestly getting the worst of it; and must ere long, yield to the terrible gashes, which at every crash of his iron jaws, the wolf was making in their bodies. He, however, with a steady eye, watched the moment when the wolf and dogs tumbled down the bank into the water, caught the wolf by the hind legs, and raised him up at arm's length. This was a moment of imminent peril. For the wolf doubly aroused by his new enemy, and the dogs stimulated by the assistance of their newly ally, a flight took place in the water, that utterly defied all description. As the wolf would turn to snap the dogs, Mr. R. would by raising the hind legs, plunge his head under water; and when a dog would raise himself to seize him, the wolf would lay hold for a moment and prevent it. Thus the terrible fight went on for some minutes, till at last Mr. Ruffner perceived the point of a rock near the water's edge, and within a few feet of him, he then, watching the favorable moment, by one powerful muscular effort, swung the wolf entirely over, and thrashed its head and back against the rock, with such force as to stun, if not to kill it. But to render the work complete he still held on with one hand, whilst with the other he grasped a stone, with which he effectually broke his skull.

Mr. Ruffner then threw the wolf over his shoulder, and returned home with his bloody victim and wounded dogs, but without himself receiving a single scratch, in his unheated of, naked, hand to teeth, snap and smash, wolf fight.

He brought the skin to Luray, the next day, where I saw it spread out on the floor, and heard him with his peculiar and inimitable phrase and gesture, recollect the particulars of that exciting scene. Generous, brave and powerful as a lion—may he long live to fight his own and his country's battles, and to kill be wolf or she bear, whenever and wherever he can find them.

SWARTWOUT DEFALCATIONS.

Report of the committee of investigation, chosen by ballot, by the house of representatives, January 17 and 19, 1899, on the subject of the defalcations of Samuel Swartwout and others, and the correctness of the returns of collectors and receivers of the public money; also, the report of the minority of the committee.

On the 4th instant I received a letter from the secretary of the treasury, under date of 2d inst. of which the following is a copy:

Treasury department, February 2, 1899.

Sir: I have to request that you will deposit the sum of two hundred thousand dollars in the bank of America, at New York, to the special credit of the treasurer of the United States, and transmit the certificate of deposit to this department.

It is done in order to reduce treasury notes. I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,

LEVY WOODBURY, sec. of the treasury.

To Jesse Hoyt, esq. collector.

To which I made the following answer:

Custom house, New York, Feb 5, 1899.

Sir: Your letter of the 2d instant did not reach me until after business hours of yesterday. By this letter you request me to deposit the sum of $200,000 in the bank of America, to the special credit of the treasurer of the United States." You omit to state to me out of what fund this deposit is to be made. By previous instruction, I was directed to transfer, on the Saturday of each week, to my separate credit of the treasurer, all the moneys in my hands, to be applied to the drafts of that officer. I have continued to do so since the receipt of those instructions. I accordingly transferred, on Saturday last, $130,000, which by my weekly returns transmitted yesterday, you will perceive left in my hands the sum of $8,296 85 to the credit of the United States, to be accounted for in the next returns, part of which had been actually disbursed for the benefit of the United States, and charged in my cash book to suspense account; the regular vouchers for the expenditure not having been rendered.

You may have intended this deposit of $200,000 to be applied to the moneys received by me under protest and for deposit for unascertained duties prior to 1st of January last. If that be your intention I have to observe:

1. It will appear by the weekly returns transmitted yesterday, that the fund under protest amounted to $124,443 95
2. That the deposits by the same return amounted to the sum of 54,906 40
3. Making together the sum of $179,350 35
3. My net receipts yesterday were $23,013 94
4. Balance on hand yesterday 8,296 85

31,310 79
$210,661 14

The sum of $31,310 79 is the only sum in my hands to the credit of the United States for the general balance of receipts from customs. But in relation to the two first items, amounting to $179,350 35, I have to say:

1. Concerning the money received under protest, I will say, on the 19th October last, that I had made an arrangement with the bank of the State of New York, in which bank I kept an account, to receive 7 per cent, interest for that fund. I sent you a copy of my correspondence with that bank, as evidence of the agreement, which you have not, as I believe, dissented from, except by inference from the fact that you forwarded me a copy of an opinion of the attorney general of the United States, in a communication under date of December 22, which attempted to show that I was bound to pay over that fund to the credit of the United States. On the receipt of which opinion I availed myself of the first leisure moment, on the 4th of January, to dissent from it; and gave you to understand that I would not consent, under any circumstances, to be bound by it, for the reason that the supreme court had decided that I was not bound to pay over money under such circumstances. Subsequent to this, I noticed an article in the Washington Globe of January 23, taking the same ground that I took, in an essay in vindication of the department for neglecting to call on Mr. Swartwout to pay over the money which he had received under protest and which article alluded to the decision of the supreme court of the United States to which I also referred.

2. I wrote to the comptroller on the 1st inst. in answer to his instructions under date of the 29th of January, that I peremptorily refused, to pay over the money, for the reasons assigned in my previous communication to the department.

3. Under this state of things, and especially as the United States was deriving from the fund a larger interest than it was paying for the money it borrowed on treasury notes, and in my judgment was securely placed beyond a possibility of doubt, I did not think the department would draw for it, though I had frequently written that it might, provided it was drawn in such a manner as to afford me protection.

4. In regard to the deposits for unascertained duties, although I have, since the 1st of January, passed the money immediately to the credit of the United States, yet I have serious doubts whether I ought to do so; and I have serious doubts, also, whether I will continue to do so after the present quarter, unless congress legislate upon the subject. Recent investigations and developments upon the subject, render it of the importance of assuming no more responsibilities than are thrown upon me by positive enactments of law. The receipts I give for deposits for unascertained duties, make me personally responsible for the difference between the duties actually accruing and the sum deposited; and which sum deposited I immediately pass to the credit of the United States, without any positive guaranty that the United States will refund the difference in discharge of my personal liability.

I go into this discussion now for the purpose of suggesting the expediency of your asking the committee of ways and means to embrace this question as a kindred one to the protest subject, and that a section should be introduced to obviate the difficulty on this as well as the protest question.

I have given you now the substance of the pecuniary condition of my official affairs. I have deposited the $200,000 as you request. If the treasurer draws for all that stands to his credit, I may be compelled to enter the agreement with the State Bank, without your direct authority, unless you intended to anticipate the receipts of all this week the probable amount of which I have not had the leisure to ascertain from investigation. Our cash duties yesterday were short of $10,000, which is a falling off. We have been somewhat busy since the committee have been here, as you may well imagine; and it has been with difficulty I have been able to get off my ordinary accounts. The auditor has been before it most of the time for the last ten days.

In your future directions for the deposit of money, I will be glad of a designation of the fund from which the deposit is to be made. I desire only to have matters of this kind distinctly understood. I endeavor to give you, from time to time, such minute details of our business at this port as to keep you well informed on the subject; and I do not fail to object in time to any proposed arrangement which strikes me to be objectionable; and to this end I have made this communication. I have apprised the treasurer of the deposit, and sent him a duplicate receipt. I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant, J. HOYT, collector.

Hon. Levi Woodbury, secretary, &c.

Under this state of things, it is a matter of doubt, in my own mind, whether by implication I have or not paid the protest fund into the treasury.

I omitted to state, in the proper place, another reason for the accumulation of protests; which was, as I supposed, owing to the fact of the department having decided, in June last, that it could not refund money received by Mr. Swartwout, except it was paid to him under protest, and that in all other cases application must be made to congress. This, in my judgment, tended to an accumulation of protests.

In reference to that part of the letter last referred to, which adverts to the deposits for unascertained duties, it will be seen that I raise a doubt as to the right of the government to have the moneys deposited for unascertained to its credit at the time the deposit is made. That doubt is now again referred to, from the fact that a claim was made, a few days since, for a deposit on a certificate therefor alleged to be lost. I refused payment, on the ground that the certificate was negotiable, and it must be surrendered up on payment; when a suit was threatened, which led me to examine the terms of such kind of certificates, and I came to the conclusion that the collector was personally responsible; and in the event of the whole deposit being placed to the credit of the United States, the collector would be compelled to refund from his own means, in case of a recovery, and that, therefore, the money so deposited for unascertained duties depends upon the same question as that involved in the money paid under protest.

It has been repeatedly considered at this port, as I have understood, and always believed, that the deposits for unascertained duties were not public moneys; and the various collectors heretofore occupying the place have not considered them as such. The importers have a right to deposit portions of their invoices as security for duties on the remainder, which does not operate as a change of property in the thing deposited, but remains as a pledge in the hands of the pledgee, who is the person holding the office of collector, and he alone is responsible for the forthcoming of that pledge.

Having heretofore yielded to the suggestions of the department in relation to this fund, from the 1st of January last, without raising a question on this point of legal right, or the necessity of legislative protection, but assenting to what might be deemed a sacrifice to public opinion, as connected with recent developments, I now raise the question before those who can, by their public situations, do much to remove those doubts by the enactment of laws.

Since writing most of the preceding answer, I have received a letter from the secretary of the treasury, under date of February 4, in the words following, which seems to be a reply to my letter to the comptroller of the 1st of February:

Treasury department, February 4, 1859.

Sir: Finding from a report just made to me by the comptroller, that new difficulties have arisen between that officer and yourself, in regard to the disposition of the funds received "for duties paid under protest," I propose, with a view to obviate those difficulties, to have a weekly statement furnished to this department by the bank holding the fund paid for duties under protest; and to have a stipulation from the bank to the United States, that it be held solely to be drawn out to pay refunded duties on your part, and, in all cases when not refunded, the amount on deposit to be carried to the credit of the treasurer of the United States, and to be drawn out by him.

I have to request that you will submit this proposition to the bank, if acceptable to you; and if acceded to on its part, you will be pleased to forward a stipulation from the bank to the United States to that effect.

You will be required to forward monthly statements of your transactions under this arrangement, until congress legislate, or a further opinion is obtained from the attorney general.

By this arrangement you and the government will both be secure. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

LEVI WOODBURY,

Secretary of the treasury.

Jesse Hoyt, esq. collector of the customs, New York.

Question 17. Are the letters and correspondence already presented in your answers all the communications from the secretary of the treasury to you, or from you to him, or from the banks to you, or from you to them, addressed to and from you as collector or individually, in relation to your duties as collector, and to the funds in your hands under protest or otherwise?

Answer. I sent to the committee on the 30th of January all the official letters up to the 17th of January, from the treasury department to me, in relation to the collection and disbursement of the public moneys, so far as I was able to discover them in my possession, and so far as I now recollect. I have alluded to all that I have since received in my former answers; and, I also believe, have given you copies of all my letters to the department on that subject, bearing date since the 17th of January. I have given you, also, copies of all my correspondence with the banks in relation to matters inquired about. I have received at various times private and unofficial letters from the several officers of the treasury department, which I do not feel myself at liberty to surrender or lay before the committee, without the consent of the writers. I have never been requested, without those letters, or any other information whatever, but as the committee have the power to call for copies of such letters from the writers thereof, I would prefer that the writers should take the responsibility, if any there be, in relation to the revelation of a private correspondence.

It will readily be perceived from the preceding testimony, that nothing definite or satisfactory could be gathered by the committee as to the amount of public money actually on hand in bank to the credit of Mr. Hoyt, either derived under protest, or otherwise, however explicit the testimony may be considered in its designation of the only banks employed by him as depositors, or of the terms upon which they are acting as his depositors. How much of these same deposits have been, from time to time, drawn out and used by Mr. Hoyt for purposes of speculation, expected to yield for him the seven per cent. interest he had arranged for in relation to a part of it; or whether it has been more frequently drawn out, or for other purposes used, than has been demanded by his official duties; or whether the amount of his deposits now on hand, either of protest money, or of other money collected by him for the government, corresponds with the amount which should be on hand; and whether or not, by the transfers in the books of his banks, the government appears to have actually received any of the protest money or not, about which Mr. Hoyt affects to be in doubt, is in no satisfactory degree disclosed by Mr. Hoyt. Only allusion being made to some of his answers from the department, without furnishing copies of more than it answered his own purpose to select, and a refusal to disclose the originals, or the import of others, being also made on the ground of their being "private and unofficial," although relating to the public moneys. It is obvious that the relations of Mr. Hoyt to the public moneys, and the correctness of his returns, could not be ascertained by the estimation of the committee, a most suspicious aspect; and that neither the duty which the committee owed to itself, or to the house and country, would justify them in leaving untried other sources of positive and record information on the subject of this inquiry.

But, beyond and paramount to the considerations just adverted to, which cast shadows over Mr. Hoyt's possession and official returns in relation to the public money, however correct these may be in form, the committee could not but feel new admonitions to persevere in reaching the true state of the accounts, from the disclosure in the correspondence of Mr. Hoyt with the treasury department in his foregoing testimony, wherein he sets up absolute control over large and accumulating sums of the public money, not only against the advice and instructions of the comptroller of the treasury, and of the secretary of the treasury, but also against the official decision of the attorney general, and in the spirit and the language of contemptuous disregard of them all! If any thing was left to add alarm to the minds of the committee, on discovering such to be the condition of the public moneys at a port where nearly two-thirds of the whole revenue is collected, it is to be found in the tameness with which the accounting officers of the treasury, and the secretary of the treasury, have submitted to so dangerous an assumption of power in a subordinate executive officer. In the judicial authority upon which this collector falls back and hurls defiance, if not contempt, at the instructions and opinions of the whole corps of superior executive officers to whom he is accountable, nothing is to be found to justify the one for asserting, or to excuse the other for submitting to a practice, which the attorney general has justly characterized in his decision as calculated to infringe the collector in postponing the ascertainment of duties, that he may in the mean time have the use of the money; and to "increase the danger of faithlessness in the collector, by permitting large amounts of money to remain with him, and under his individual control, instead of being in the treasury of the United States."

The judicial decision cited by the collector conveys no authority to the collector for refusing to take and adopt the construction of law in regard to duties paid under protest, which the accounting officers of the treasury enjoin upon the observance of the collector. The opinion of the attorney general, on the other hand, expressly declares, "it is the duty of the collector to carry into execution the instructions of the treasury department, and to conform his acts to them." Nor does the court indicate that the collector is at liberty to "judge for himself, and act accordingly." These attributes are only accorded, by the decision of the court cited, to the party paying the duties, and not to the collector who receives them; to the individual plaintiff, and not to the defendant officer. And the language of the court, that the collector is by the protest "placed in a situation to claim an indemnity from the government," clearly indicates that this indemnity of the collector is to be sought rightfully after, and not before, the duties paid have been adjudged by the competent tribunal to be a wrongful exaction.

It may be added, that even in the libertinism of Mr. Swartwout's control and use of the public money is to be found no precedent, until his retirement from office, and his actual defalcations must otherwise be exposed, for the course thus pursued by the present collector in relation to moneys under protest. This course originated only with the latter. The testimony that follows is explicit on this point.

Mr. Fleming, auditor of the customs, examined by Mr. Owens.

Question 58. From your position in the custom house at New York, and your knowledge of the manner of transacting its business and keeping the accounts, say whether one of the principal causes of the defalcations was not the practice of the collector retaining large sums of money in his hands to meet suits or protests for duties overpaid. State how long such practice has been in existence; whether it was established by the department at Washington; or whether, under the decisions of the courts of justice, the collector is not considered personally responsible for such claims, and therefore authorised by the same decisions to retain in his hands the money of the United States to meet them?

Answer. Mr. Swartwout, on his retirement from office, retained the sum of about $201,000; and assigned as a reason to the secretary of the treasury, that it was to protect himself against judgments upon suits at law for duties alleged to have been wrongfully exacted, and paid under protest; but he was not in the practice, during his collectorship, of retaining moneys for such purposes. When duties were paid, the amounts were placed to the credit of the treasury of the United States at once; and in the event of a decision being obtained against the collector upon any suit at law, it was his practice to write to the comptroller of the treasury upon the subject, to obtain his authority for the payment of the judgment. The collector is considered personally responsible for all such claims, and execution issues against his private property.

Impelled, therefore, by the strongest sense of duty, to obtain the fullest information on the subject of Mr. Hoyt's deposit and use of the public money, as the only test of the correctness of the returns he has made to the treasury department since he has been in office, the committee, on the 6th of February, commenced the examination of the two cashiers mentioned by Mr. Hoyt. The following, from the committee's journal, illustrates this proceeding:

Gorham A. Worth was sworn as a witness.

Examined by Mr. Smith.

Question 1. Are you cashier of the City bank of New York, and are you in charge of the books of record and accounts, and the official papers of said bank? Has said bank been a deposit bank of the government of the United States? If not, has it been a deposit bank of the present collector of the port of New York? If yes, when did his first deposit as collector commence? And has he kept an individual deposit in your bank, apart from his account as collector?

Answer. I am cashier of the City bank, and have charge of the books, &c. The City bank has not been a government deposit bank at any time. It has been a deposit bank of the present collector of this port. The account was, in the first place, opened with Mr. Hoyt, as collector—say on the 14th of April last. That account, however, was closed after a short time—some 30 days—and the account then opened with Mr. Hoyt in his individual capacity, and so remains at this time.

Question 2. In Mr. Hoyt's individual account, referred to in your last answer, has there been made any designation by Mr. Hoyt of the sources from which any portion of his funds thus deposited are, or have been, derived? What agreement, if any, has existed, and what agreement still exists, between said bank and Mr. Hoyt, relative to said deposits? Please state, in detail, when it commenced, and whether any that now exists is the substitute of any previous agreement; and also what such previous agreement was and when made.

Answer. Mr. Hoyt's deposits were made, like all other deposits in bank, by simply leaving the money to be placed to his account, without any designation other than the amount, at the time of deposit. The only agreement made with Mr. Hoyt was, that his deposits should be considered as gold and silver, and that his checks should, at all times, if required, be paid in gold and silver. This agreement was made at the time of his first deposit.

Question 3. What has been the aggregate monthly balance of said deposits since the agreement to which you allude?

[The witness was permitted to take this question away with him, in order to obtain the details of the answer required.]

On the 7th of February, Mr. Worth appeared and answered as follows: (Extract from committee's journal.)

Examination of Mr. Worth resumed.

Examined by Mr. Smith.

Question 3. [This question the witness had been permitted to take away with him yesterday. See journal.]

3. What has been the aggregate monthly balance of said deposits since the agreement to which you allude?

Answer. In reply to the above interrogatory, propounded to me yesterday, (6th February,) I answer, that I decline answering it: not deeming myself at liberty, by the rules and regulations of the bank, to expose the details of an individual depositor's account.

Question 8. Have you, since the above interrogatory was propounded to you, had a consultation with Mr. Hoyt on the subject of the said interrogatory? If yes, please state the substance of such consultation.

Answer. I must decline answering the question.

Mr. Withers was also called again on the same day, and examined as follows:

Examination of Reuben Withers.

Examined by Mr. Smith.

Question 1. Are you cashier of the bank of the State of New York, in the city of New York; and are you in charge of the books of records and accounts, and the official papers in said bank? Has said bank been a deposit bank of the United States? Has it been, or is it now, a deposit bank of the present collector of New York? If yes, when did his first deposit as collector commence? Has Jesse Hoyt kept an individual account and deposit in your bank, apart from his account as collector?

Answer. I am cashier of the bank of the State of New York, and have charge of the books of records and accounts, and official papers of said bank.

Said bank has not been a deposit bank of the United States.

I beg leave to answer by giving a copy of a letter from the collector, dated June 12, 1838, on which day a deposit was made by Mr. Hoyt in his own name, and the account has been so continued to the present time; which is the only account kept by this bank with Mr. Hoyt.

[The letter of June 12th, exhibited by witness, as also the other letters subsequently alluded to in his testimony, are the same as heretofore given in conjunction with Mr. Hoyt's testimony.]

Question 2. Mr. Hoyt's account in your bank, though in his individual name, being represented in your answer to the foregoing interrogatory, and in the letter of Mr. Hoyt of the 12th June last, to be an account of public money, you are asked what agreement, if any, was made between you and Mr. Hoyt, either verbal or written, in respect to his account on deposit of money in your bank. Was there any, and what agreement or understanding that the bank should pay interest on deposit, or any part of the deposit, and what part, and what rate of interest?

Answer. From the 12th June, 1838, to the 19th of October, no agreement, either written or verbal, was made with Mr. Hoyt in regard to his account, except that his checks should be paid in the legal currency of the United States when required by the holder. On the 19th of October I received a letter from him, a copy of which I now enclose, with a copy of my answer. Since that time I have been furnished with a weekly statement of the amount held by him under protest, subject to that agreement.

Question 3. What has been the aggregate weekly balance of said deposits in your bank since the commencement of Mr. Hoyt's account in your bank as collector, and since his deposit of public money in his own name with your bank commence?

Answer. I do not feel warranted in answering this question without the authority of the board of directors.

At the foregoing examinations Mr. Hoyt was present, and heard the refusal of each cashier to furnish the committee with the information desired. They took place at the day session of the committee, at the custom house, on the 7th of February. At the evening session of the same day, the examination of Mr. Hoyt was continued as follows:

Examined by Mr. Smith.

Question 23. Please state what have been the aggregate weekly balances of your deposit accounts in the bank of the State of New York and the City bank of New York, respectively, since you commenced making deposits of the public money as collector, or in your individual name, in said banks respectively.

Answer. I cannot state what has been that aggregate balance. My role is to have the bank book balanced on the last day of each month; but I cannot state from memory what the aggregate monthly balance is. It varies very much. I do not make up weekly balances, and it is only when the bank book is balanced that the true balance in bank appears upon the examination of both parties—that is, the drawer and payer of the check. It has frequently happened that the treasurer has drawn on me for more money than appeared by my weekly returns to be to his credit; but such drafts have always been met and paid, and are drawn on anticipated weekly receipts; and it frequently happens that drafts are drawn on me that are not presented for payment in 20, 30 or 40 days; and often drafts are protested in consequence of the regulations of the rail road line between this and Washington, before any notice of the same having been drawn; but such drafts have also always been paid.

Question 24. Will you explain how drafts or warrants on you can affect your bank account of deposits, so as to alter the balance thereof, until after such drafts or warrants have been presented to you, or you are called on to meet the same?

Answer. The drafts on me are paid generally by my checks on banks, and the amount of checks drawn for such drafts materially affects the balance I have in bank; which balance grows out of deposits made and checks drawn. I do not recollect that any "warrants" have been presented to me for payment, and, therefore, I do not refer to any such transactions; therefore they do not affect my balance in bank, nor does any draft on me affect my balance in bank until I have checked for that draft.

Question 25. Do you or not keep, or cause to be kept, by a clerk, a book into which is entered every deposit in bank of the public money which you make, and also every check you draw upon such deposits; and if yes, can you not by such book tell the balance you have on deposit at any desired period?

Answer. I keep no official bank account, nor have I any authority to keep such accounts. I employ the banks as my own agents, and not as agents of the government. I make no distinction in such deposits between my own money, and the money for which I am responsible to others. I keep no separate book of deposits for money of my own, and money for which I am responsible to others. I deposit money, if I have any, belonging to professional clients, in the same banks, to the same account that I deposit other money; and the banks know no distinction as to the persons who may have a claim upon me for that money, except the bank of the State of New York, as to a portion (as before stated) of that deposited relating to money paid under protest. I could, by an examination of my bank book, tell the amount of deposit and the balances weekly; but for the amount of money I am answerable for to the United States, I can only tell by an examination of the books of the collector's office, which I will submit to the committee, when it will have the opportunity of seeing whether I have a sufficient sum in bank to pay the government all the money I have ever received, and not disbursed according to law, for the use, behoof or benefit of the government.

Question 26. Can you or not, by your own book of deposits in bank, ascertain the balance which you have had in bank at the end of every week, derived from payments under protest? If yes, please state what such weekly balances have been since you came into office.

Answer. No. The amount deposited for no money under protest is made up from my own book, and upon my own responsibility. It does not appear daily, weekly or monthly, by the book of deposits, what portion of such deposits is under protest. The bank I believe, is willing to take a copy of my return to the department as evidence of the truth of the amount of money received and deposited under protest. When it expresses any doubts as to the truth of the statement, they will notify me, and I will endeavor to satisfy them on the subject.

Question 27. Will you state what distinction you make between "your own book of deposits in bank," as you have understood it in my last interrogatory, and "your own book," to which you allude in your last answer?

Answer. The book of deposit is understood to mean the book on which the bank credits the amount deposited; or, in other words, it would be called a "pass-book" between the dealer and the bank; or, to be more specific, it is a book in which the bank makes an acknowledgment that the individual depositing has deposited on a given day a given sum of money. The person depositing does not keep what he calls a "book of deposits," but he does not, as he pleases, make a charge on some book against the bank for the sum deposited. Some keep one kind of book, and some another. Some enter the amount of deposit on the margin of their check-book, others make no entry at all, but carry the amount in their memories. I debit the amount of deposit on the margin of the check-book; but this is held to be but a memorandum for the person drawing the check, and not account deposited. I do not keep any book called my own book of deposits in bank. My account of moneys received under protest is entered as it is received in what is called the protest book. Sometimes more or less entries for the day are made in that book, and the money is deposited in bank. At the end of the week I make up, in the form of an account, the gross amount deposited for the week. A copy of that amount I forward to the treasurer and secretary of the treasury on Monday of each week, and a like copy leave with the bank on the same day. The book of protest is resorted to, and not the "bank book" or "book of deposits in bank" for the correctness of that account.

Question 28. Can you or not, by your "protest book," mentioned in your last answer, ascertain the balance which you have had in bank at the end of every week, derived from payment of such deposits? If yes, please state what such weekly balances have been since you came into office.

Answer. I can, and have already filed that account, in answer to a question put by Mr. Wise, one of the committee.

The indisposition of Mr. Hoyt to furnish the committee with full information on the subject of his deposits of public money in bank, so as to enable it to understand what sums had been drawn out, when, and for what purposes, as well as what sums had been deposited, induced one more effort on the following morning to derive the information from his deposit banks; accordingly, on the next morning, at the opening of the session, Mr. Withers was sent for, appeared, and, in the presence of Mr. Hoyt, was examined as follows:

The examination of Mr. Withers was resumed.

Examined by Mr. Smith.

Question 4. Have you had any consultation or other intercourse with Mr. Hoyt, the collector, since you were summoned as a witness before this committee, on the subject of answering interrogatories relating to Mr. Hoyt's deposits in your bank? If yes, state the substance of such conversation.

Answer. I have not.

Question 5. Has the board of directors of your bank been consulted by yourself, or any other person within your knowledge, to either make or prevent a disclosure of the state of Mr. Hoyt's deposits in said bank, as sought for in the third interrogatory above?

Answer. The board of directors have not been consulted, to my knowledge, on the subject of Mr. Hoyt's account. In my answer to the third interrogatory I was governed by the by-laws of the bank.

When the last answer of Mr. Withers was given, Mr. Smith, by leave of the committee, propounded the following interrogatory to Mr. Hoyt; to which the latter gave the answer thereto subjoined:

The examination of Mr. Hoyt was resumed.

Examined by Mr. Smith.

Question 29. Are you or not willing for the cashiers of the bank of the State of New York and of the City bank to furnish this committee with a statement of the weekly or monthly balances of your deposits in said banks since your term of office as collector commenced? If nay, please state your reasons in full.

Answer. From an occurrence that took place in the committee room last evening, I made up my mind that it was necessary to make a communication in writing to the committee. I stated to the committee, before I commenced this answer, what I desired, and that the letter would be before the committee in about two minutes; and, since commencing the writing of this answer, said communication was brought to the committee, and handed by me to the chairman thereof; and, until an answer is made to that communication in some form or manner to indicate to me the sense of the committee upon the same, I decline answering the interrogatory.

The following extract from the journal of the committee exhibits the continuation of the committee's proceedings in relation to Mr. Hoyt:

Mr. Smith offered the following resolution:

In consideration that Reuben Withers, esq. has testified to this committee that he is cashier of the bank of the State of New York, and has charge of the books of records and accounts, and official papers of said bank, and has also communicated in his testimony to this committee the copy of a letter from Jesse Hoyt, esq. collector of the port of New York, to the said Withers, in his said capacity as cashier, under date of June 12, 1833, informing said cashier that said collector had deputed said bank his "agent to aid him in safely keeping of the public moneys which come into his hands by virtue of the office he holds;"

And in consideration that said Withers has declined, when called upon for the purpose, to furnish this committee with information of the aggregate weekly balance of said Hoyt's deposits in said bank "without the authority of the board of directors" of said bank, and subsequently on the ground that in such refusal he "was governed by the by-laws of the bank;"

And in consideration that said Hoyt has been subsequently asked, by an interrogatory propounded to him in committee, to give his own consent for said cashier to furnish this committee with the information thus sought by this committee respecting the public money deposited by said collector in said bank for safe keeping, or to give any reason satisfactory to this committee for withholding such consent:

Be it resolved, That the chairman of this committee be directed to issue a subpoena duces tecum, summoning said Reuben Withers to appear forthwith before this committee, and to bring with him either the original book of the deposit account of Jesse Hoyt, kept by said Withers as cashier of the bank of the State of New York, or, in lieu of such book, a true copy of said Hoyt's account of deposit, as the same appears on the books of said bank, since the 1st day of March last past.

Be it further resolved, That, from like and similar considerations as are stated above, a similar subpoena duces tecum be issued by the chairman of this committee to Gorham A. Worth, esq. cashier of the City bank in the city of New York.

Mr. Foster moved to amend the resolution, by striking out all before the words "be it resolved;" and insert, instead thereof: "whereas Mr. Hoyt has declined to answer the above interrogatory, except as above stated, therefore:"

Mr. Foster called for the yeas and nays, and the amendment was rejected.

YEAS—Messrs. Foster, Owens, Wagener—3.

NAYS—Messrs. Curtis, Dawson, Harlan, Hopkins, Smith, Wise—6.

The question was then put on Mr. Smith's resolution, the yeas and nays having been called by Mr. Owens, and the resolution was adopted:

YEAS—Messrs. Curtis, Dawson, Foster, Harlan, Hopkins, Owens, Smith, Wagener, Wise—9.

NAYS—None.
Mr. Owens moved that the written communication of Jesse Hoyt, collector, to this committee, be now read.

Mr. Curtis moved the following amendment to Mr. Owen's proposition:

Resolved, That Mr. Hoyt be informed by the chairman that his answer to the last interrogatory propounded by Mr. Smith is not definitive to the question, and that the committee cannot allow him to dictate the order of his proceedings, or the terms upon which he will respond to its inquiries; and that if said answer of Mr. Hoyt be retracted, and a pertinent answer given, the committee will receive and act upon his written communication, and not be before.

Mr. Owens called for the yeas and nays; and the amendment was adopted:

YEAS—Messrs. Curtis, Dawson, Harlan, Hopkins, Smith, Wise—6.

NAYS—Messrs. Foster, Owens, Wagener—3.
The question on the proposition as amended was then put, and decided in the affirmative; the yeas and nays having been called by Mr. Owens.

YEAS—Messrs. Curtis, Dawson, Harlan, Hopkins, Smith, Wise—6.

NAYS—Messrs. Foster, Owens, Wagener—3

Mr. Wise offered the following resolution:
Resolved, That this committee will not receive any communications from Mr. Hoyt until he answers the interrogatories which have been propounded to him.

Mr. Owens called for the yeas and nays, and the resolution was adopted:

YEAS—Messrs. Curtis, Dawson, Harlan, Hopkins, Smith, Wise—6.

NAYS—Messrs. Foster, Owens, Wagener—3.

Reuben Withers appeared before the committee under a subpoena duces tecum, issued this morning, and his examination was resumed by Mr. Smith.

Examination of Mr. Withers resumed.

Examined by Mr. Smith.

Question 6. Have you been served with a subpoena from this committee, directing you to bring the books of the bank of the State of New York containing the account of the deposits made in said bank by Jesse Hoyt since March last, or, in lieu thereof, to bring a true copy of such account? If yes, do you produce said books or copy? and if not, please state your reason for omitting so to do.

Answer. I have been served with a notice to produce the books of the bank of the State of New York relating to Mr. Hoyt's account, or a copy thereof; which I decline producing, for reason given in my previous answers.

Mr. Foster called up for consideration the resolution offered by Mr. Hopkins last night, for adjournment to meet in Washington city; and moved to amend it, by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting the following:

Whereas, in the course of the investigations of this committee, witnesses have been introduced and sworn, whose testimony has tended to charge the present collector of the port of New York with official misconduct; and whereas the said collector has applied to this committee for permission to be heard in relation thereto, and to go into a full investigation thereof, by witnesses to be produced by him, and requesting that such full investigation may be had here, (in the city of New York), where he alleges that the witnesses which he wishes to introduce be residing and whereas it is due to the fair and full administration of justice that the said collector should have a full opportunity to rebut the charges thus made against him; and whereas several witnesses are now under examination before this committee, the testimony of whom is not yet closed; and whereas, from the fact that several witnesses have been under examination at the same time, the testimony of several of whom is not now before the committee, either in manuscript or in print, (a portion of the manuscript being in the hands of the printer), the committee have not at this time the means of ascertaining the effect to be given to that testimony, or the nature thereof; and individual members of the committee are consequently unable (until a better opportunity shall be afforded to examine said testimony) to determine how much further the examination of those witnesses should proceed, or what other witnesses ought to be examined in this case in order to a full understanding thereof; and whereas we are satisfied that a full investigation of the facts connected with the defalcations charged can be better examined into here than elsewhere; therefore,

Resolved, That this committee will not fix upon a time for closing the testimony in New York until the testimony is at an end; and that the fixing the time for adjourning to Washington, by resolution passed before the testimony is ended, will be calculated to deprive the said collector of the right, which every man when charged has, of showing that those charges are unfounded, and of protecting his character from aspersion; will prevent the individuals of the committee from examining and cross-examining such witnesses as they may believe ought to be examined; will set a precedent entirely new and arbitrary in the administration of justice, dangerous to the rights and privileges of persons who may be charged with misconduct; will be deciding a question, the propriety of which the committee cannot possibly know; and will be well calculated to destroy in the public mind all confidence in the results to which this committee may arrive.

Resolved, That, hereafter, the time during which the committee will be in session shall be from ten o'clock, A. M. till half-past four, P. M.; and from seven o'clock, P. M. till half-past ten, P. M.

Mr. Curtis moved to lay the resolution and amendment on the table.

Mr. Foster called for the yeas and nays, and the motion was decided in the affirmative.

YEAS—Messrs. Curtis, Dawson, Harlan, Smith, Wise—5.

NAYS—Messrs. Foster, Hopkins, Owens, Wagener—4.

Mr. Worth, the other cashier, did not obey the subpoena issued pursuant to the resolution of the committee. And the power of the committee over the witnesses and their papers, connected with Mr. Hoyt's accounts of the public money, being thus exhausted in the pursuit of information deemed essential and indispensable to the formation of a correct judgment in relation to his returns, and the certainty that the late period in the session of congress would preclude any successful appeal from the committee to the house for further aid, the following resolution was offered by Mr. Wise, at the close of the morning session of the committee during which the foregoing proceedings were had, viz:

Resolved, That this committee having accomplished its principal object, to inspect the books and papers in the custom house, in coming to the city of New York, and, desiring to inspect the books and papers in the treasury department at the city of Washington during the short period of time now left to the further prosecution of its inquiries, will adjourn this day at ten o'clock, P. M., to meet at twelve o'clock, M. on Tuesday the 12th instant, at the room of the committee on commerce in the capitol; and that the witnesses heretofore summoned to appear at that place, until further ordered.

Mr. Foster moved to amend the resolution, by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting the following:

Whereas, in the course of the investigations of this committee, witnesses have been introduced and sworn, whose testimony has tended to charge the present collector of the port of New York with official misconduct; and whereas the said collector has applied to this committee for permission to be heard in relation thereto, and to go into a full investigation thereof, by witnesses to be produced by him; and requesting that such full investigation may be had here, (in the city of New York), where he alleges that the witnesses which he wishes to introduce reside; and whereas it is due to the full and fair administration of justice that the said collector should have a full opportunity to rebut the charges thus made against him; and whereas several witnesses are now under examination before this committee, the testimony of whom is not yet closed; and whereas, from the fact that several witnesses have been under examination at the same time, the testimony of several of whom is not now before the committee, either in manuscript or in print, (a portion of the manuscript being in the hands of the printer), the committee have not at this time the means of ascertaining the effect to be given to that testimony, or the nature thereof; and individual members of the committee are consequently unable (until a better opportunity shall be afforded to examine said testimony) to determine how much further the examination of those witnesses should proceed, or what other witnesses ought to be examined in this case, in order to a full understanding thereof; and whereas we are satisfied that a full investigation of the facts connected with the defalcations charged can be better examined into here than elsewhere; therefore,

Resolved, That this committee will not fix upon a time for closing the testimony in New York, until the testimony is at an end; and that the fixing the time for adjourning to Washington, by a resolution passed before the testimony is ended, will be calculated to deprive the said collector of the right (which every man when charged has) of allowing that those charges are unfounded, and of protecting his character from aspersion; will prevent the individuals of the committee from examining and cross-examining such witnesses as they may believe ought to be examined; will set a precedent entirely new and arbitrary in the administration of justice, dangerous to the rights and privileges of persons who may be charged with misconduct; will be deciding a question, the propriety of which the committee cannot possibly know, and will be well calculated to destroy in the public mind all confidence in the results to which this committee may arrive.

Resolved, That hereafter, the time during which the committee will be in session, shall be from ten o'clock, A. M. till half past four o'clock, P. M.; and from seven o'clock, P. M. till half past ten, P. M.

Mr. Foster called for the yeas and nays on the amendment, and it was decided in the negative:

YEAS—Messrs. Curtis, Dawson, Harlan, Hopkins, Smith, Wise—6.

Mr. Wagener moved an adjournment, and called for the yeas and nays. Motion lost:

YEAS—Messrs. Foster, Hopkins, Wagener—3.
NAYS—Messrs. Curtis, Dawson, Harlan, Smith, Wise—5.

The question was then taken on Mr. Wise's resolution, and decided in the affirmative; the yeas and nays having been called for by Mr. Foster:

YEAS—Messrs. Curtis, Dawson, Harlan, Hopkins, Smith, Wise—6.

NAYS—Messrs. Foster, Wagener—2.
The committee then, at half past four o'clock, P. M. took a recess till seven o'clock, P. M. to meet then at the Astor House.

During the evening session of the committee, and not forty minutes previous to the expiration of the hour appointed by the resolution of the morning for the adjournment of the committee to meet at the capitol in Washington, the chairman received and submitted two letters from Mr. Hoyt.

On motion of Mr. Owens,
Resolved, That the last communication from Mr. Hoyt, collector, be read.

Whereupon, the following letters were read:
Friday evening, 7 o'clock, Feb. 8, 1839.

Sir: I have the honor to enclose you a communication retracting my former answer to the question of Mr. Smith, and make a new answer to the same. Respectfully,
J. HOYT, collector.

Hon. James Harlan, chairman.

Friday evening, Feb. 8, 1839, 7 o'clock, P. M.
Sir: If I correctly understand what is demanded of me by the committee of which you are chairman, it is substantially this: that, as a condition precedent to the receiving and acting on a communication addressed by me this morning to the committee, and placed by me personally in your hands, as its chairman, at 11 o'clock this morning, I must retract the answer made by me to a question put by Mr. Smith, about two minutes before that communication was delivered to you, (although not until after it was written), which question was in the following words, as appears from a copy thereof since sent to me by the committee:

"Are you or not willing for the cashiers of the bank of the State of New York and of the City bank to furnish this committee with a statement of the weekly or monthly balances of your deposits in the said banks, since your term of office as collector commenced? If nay, please state your reasons in full." And to which question I made the following answer: "From an occurrence that took place in the committee room last evening, I made up my mind that it was necessary to make a communication in writing to the committee. I stated to the committee, before I commenced this answer, what I desired, and that that letter would be before the committee in about two minutes; and since commencing the writing of this answer, the said communication was brought to the committee, and handed by me to the chairman thereof; and until an answer is made to that communication in some form or manner, to indicate to me the sense of the committee upon the same, I decline answering the interrogatory."

"As I think it of vital importance to myself, (and not only to me, but to truth and justice), that the communication referred to should be received and acted on by the committee; and as I am reduced by the course which has been taken by the committee to the alternative either of withdrawing what I conceived to be a proper answer, under the extraordinary circumstances in which I was placed, to the question put to me, or of submitting to the rejection of my communication without its being acted on, read, or even received; I feel myself compelled, by a paramount regard to the personal and public interest involved in this case, to submit to the direction of the committee, and I do therefore hereby withdraw the answer above stated to have been given to the question of Mr. Smith. But, before I proceed to answer that question, I think it proper to remind the committee of the circumstances under which it was given, and to state the motives which prompted it, to the end that the object and propriety of the course adopted by me may be clearly seen. When I parted from the committee at half past 11 o'clock last night, I informed the committee that I would make a communication in writing, this morning, touching Mr. Lyon's testimony, and the posture in which it placed me before the committee; which communication, as I understood, the committee agreed to receive. In conformity with this understanding, I prepared the proposed communication at as early an hour as practicable, and as above stated, delivered it to you, personally, at about 11 o'clock this morning.

Being exceedingly desirous that this communication should be received, and promptly acted on by the committee, for reasons which will readily appear by perusal thereof; and being unwilling to enter upon any new subject of inquiry until I should be distinctly informed by the committee, as requested in that communication, what were the charges preferred against me, and by what evidence they were supported; I felt it to be my right to withhold a reply to the new question proposed by Mr. Smith, especially as the mode of trying a public officer by compelling him to furnish evidence against himself, to which he had patiently submitted several days, and, at least, to deserve this modification, I was also induced to take the course I did, by the fact that I apprehended, from an informal conversation had with the committee just as I was about to leave the committee room last evening, in regard to the time I should require to disprove the statements of Mr. Lyon, that the committee might possibly adjourn before I could have the opportunity of introducing the necessary testimony; and this was the occurrence alluded to in my answer to the interrogatory propounded by Mr. Smith. Proceeding now to answer that question, I reply, that I am perfectly willing that the cashiers of the bank of the State of New York, and the City bank, should render you any and all of my accounts inquired about in the interrogatory, in any form or manner required by the committee. I have at all times been willing that such accounts should be rendered, and I have not requested or advised either of the said cashiers to withhold them, nor have I any wish to conceal or suppress the same; but, as I was desirous, as I formerly stated in my letter to the committee, under date of the 29th of January last, to have a full investigation of my accounts, and that the committee might state to the house of representatives, and through them to the people, whether or not I am a public defaulter. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. HOYT, collector.

Hon. James Harlan, chairman, &c.

Mr. Owens offered the following resolution:
Resolved, That Jesse Hoyt, the collector, be furnished with a copy of the printed journal of this committee, so far as the same has relation to charges, direct or indirect, against him as collector.

Mr. Curtis moved to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting the following words:

"That Jesse Hoyt being called on an opportunity, on Wednesday morning last, to read the testimony of David S. Lyon, at the time it was received, so far as the same related to the official conduct of Mr. Hoyt, it is inexpedient to make out and send copies of any testimony taken before the committee to him.

Mr. Dawson moved to lay the resolution and amendment on the table till Tuesday next.

Mr. Owens called for the yeas and nays, and the motion was carried:

YEAS—Messrs. Curtis, Dawson, Harlan, Smith—4.

NAYS—Messrs. Foster, Owens, Wagener—3.

Mr. Foster offered a resolution, which the chairman decided to be out of order.

Mr. Post appealed from the decision of the chair, and called for the yeas and nays.

The question, shall the decision of the chair stand? was then put and decided in the affirmative:

YEAS—Messrs. Curtis, Dawson, Harlan, Hopkins, Smith, Wise—6.

NAYS—Messrs. Foster, Owens, Wagener—3.

Mr. Foster then offered a second resolution.

The chair decided the resolution to be out of order.

Mr. Foster appealed from the decision of the chair, and called for the yeas and nays.

The question, shall the decision of the chair stand? was put and decided in the affirmative:

YEAS—Messrs. Curtis, Dawson, Harlan, Hopkins, Smith, Wise—6.

NAYS—Messrs. Foster, Owens, Wagener—3.

Mr. Hopkins offered the following resolution:
Resolved, That the chairman return to Mr. J. Hoyt his communication of this morning, which was received about 11 o'clock.

Mr. Foster moved to amend the resolution, by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting the following words:

"That the chairman now present to the committee and that the committee receive the communication made to the committee at about 11 o'clock, A. M. this day, and that the said communication be now read."

Mr. Owens called for the yeas and nays, and the amendment was rejected:

YEAS—Messrs. Foster, Owens, Wagener—3
NAYS—Messrs. Curtis, Dawson, Harlan, Hopkins, Smith, Wise—6.

The question was then put on the original resolution, and carried in the affirmative:

YEAS—Messrs. Curtis, Harlan, Hopkins, Smith, Wise—5.

NAYS—Messrs. Dawson, Foster, Owens, Wagener—4.

The committee, having thus furnished the house with a faithful and connected detail from the record of the proceedings of the committee, in relation to the collectors of New York, need only add, that the repeated and continued evasions and interrogatories, for information respecting his official conduct with the public money, and of his accounts of that money, and the constant falsification by him of the professions made to the committee in his letter of the 29th of January, of his anxiety to give every facility to the investigation of his accounts and unwillingness to rest for a moment under any imputation implied by a previous resolution of the committee, and of his readiness to submit to the committee all his official correspondence with the treasury, and his books and papers relating to the receipt and disbursement of the public money, and to the particulars and state of his accounts since entering upon the collectorship, and also that it would give him pleasure to communicate, either orally or in writing, any other information on the subject which the committee might desire; the evasion and falsification of these plain professions and assurances which he had made, clearly but in accordance with the duty imposed upon him by his station; and especially Mr. Hoyt's neglect to appear in person to enter a retrahit of his previous refusal to answer to the interrogatory propounded to him by Mr. Smith, and to submit himself to further examination, forbade the committee to indulge any confidence in the hope of a successful prosecution of their inquiries respecting his official proceedings within the short time remaining for their investigation. The committee could not but feel that already too much time had been spent in endeavors to surmount the obstacles and equivocations which had been thrown in their way by the collector, where openness, directness, and plain dealing only were to have been anticipated. To rescind their previous resolution for their return to Washington, under any assurance of the collector of a different line of conduct towards the committee from that which he had been pursuing with the probability thereby of defeating the purposes of an early return of the committee to Washington, appeared to the committee not to be warranted by a sound exercise of discretion. Equally incompatible with the time and duties assigned them by the house appeared every proposition for the committee, under any pretext of wounded sensibility on the part of the collector, to be drawn aside to investigate or to adjudicate either actual or fictitious charges of misconduct that might be brought by the collector against any individual who had preceded him in the custom house, but who was not any longer an officer of government, or amenable to the committee or the house. At the stage indicated the committee were therefore compelled to abandon all hope of reporting in full upon the correctness of the returns that have been made by this officer.

Reviewing the evidence obtained, the committee report to the house the following facts as established:

1st. That the returns of the collector of the customs at the port of New York have not been correct, as they have not at all times embraced, as paid into the public treasury, the moneys received by him for unascertained duties, and at no time for duties paid under protest.

2d. That said collector, in his returns, has violated the instructions of the treasury department; has put at defiance the duties assigned him by the secretary of the treasury; has repudiated the official decision of the responsible law officer of the executive department; and is guilty of illegal retention and use of the public money, in the amount thus held by him under protest and for unascertained duties.

3d. That the committee have been prevented from ascertaining what is the extent of the illegal retention and use of the public moneys by the present collector of the port of New York, either in funds collected under protest, or for unascertained duties, or in other funds collected by him, because of his refusal to exhibit his own book of cash deposits in a bank, or to permit the banks used by him as depositories to exhibit their accounts of his deposits.

4th. That the public moneys received by said collector are mingled with his own moneys on deposit, and are not kept by him, nor by his banks of deposit, distinct and separate from the individual moneys of the collector and of his "professional clients;" and his returns cannot, therefore, be founded upon them as a separate and independent fund belonging to government, though in his keeping.

5th. That, as appears by the letter of Gorham A. Worth, the cashier of the City bank, the present collector has deposited the public moneys in his hands, with a bank which could not, under the law prohibiting the selection of any bank as a depository which has issued notes under the denomination of five dollars, be selected by the secretary of the treasury himself as a depository of moneys carried to the credit of the treasurer of the United States.

6th. That the mode adopted and practised by the said collector, of keeping and making returns of the public money collected by him for unascertained duties and under protest, in the language of the present attorney general of the United States, "could never have been the intention of congress;" and being "tolerated," it has made it, in the language of the same high officer, "the interest of the collector to postpone the ascertainment of duties, as, in the mean time, he would have the uncontrolled use of the money;" it has also, in fulfillment of the reasoning of the attorney general, increased the danger of faithlessness of the collector, by permitting large amounts of money to remain with him, and under his individual control, instead of being in the treasury of the United States.

7th. That, in the language of the attorney general, "the tenor and spirit of all our revenue laws seem to inculcate the idea that the intention of congress has at all times been, that money collected for revenue should be promptly placed in the treasury, and not be permitted to remain in the hands of the collector."

8th. That the returns of the naval officer at New York have not been correct, as it is found, in the testimony of the present deputy naval officer, "that the naval office, under its existing system, is not enabled either to determine what amount of bonds has been taken by the collector for duties in any quarter, or who are the parties to said bonds, or the dates of said bonds, or when they are payable, or when such bonds are paid, or whether the collector does or does not account truly for such bonds."

PART IV.

DEFALCATION AMONG RECEIVERS OF PUBLIC MONEYS.

The committee, in fulfillment of that portion of the duty assigned them by which they were directed to inquire into "any defalcations among receivers," &c. "which may now exist," report to the house that the limited period which they had for a thorough investigation of the subjects with which they were charged, and the time necessarily consumed in the examination of the cases of the late collector and district attorney of New York, have prevented a minute investigation of the extent, nature and causes of the defalcations of receivers of public moneys arising from the sales of the public lands. The committee have, however, prepared, from reports made by the secretary of the treasury at the last and present sessions of congress, a tabular statement exhibiting the names of such defaulters, the amount due from each, when due, and the penalties of their official bonds, respectively; also, the correspondence had between the treasury department and fifteen of the individuals whose names appear in said statement. The committee having called for and been furnished by the department with the answers of the receivers to the letters of the secretary of the treasury, as contained in house document No. 297, these fifteen cases are reported specially as examples merely of the manner in which the president of the United States and the secretary of the treasury have executed the laws in respect to the public money, and other property of the United States, in the hands of this class of public officers, and in respect to their own official duty.

The law provides for the appointment by the executive, with the concurrence of the senate, of a receiver of public moneys at each of the places, respectively, where the public and private sales of the lands are to be made, who shall give bond, with approved security, for the faithful discharge of his trust; who shall transmit within thirty days in case of public sale, and quarterly in case of private sale, an account of all the public moneys by him received to the secretary of the treasury, and to the register of the land office, as the case may be. He is allowed a salary of five hundred dollars per annum, and a commission of one per centum on the moneys received; but his salary for one year shall not exceed $3,000. The secretary of the treasury may allow to the several receivers of the public moneys at the several land offices a reasonable compensation for transporting to, and depositing such moneys in any bank or any other place of deposit that may, from time to time, be designated by the secretary of the treasury for that purpose. He is also authorized to prescribe such further regulations, in the manner of keeping books and accounts by the several officers in the land offices, as to him may appear necessary and proper. It is made his duty at least once in every year, to cause the books of the officers of the land offices to be examined, and the balance of public moneys in the hands of the several receivers to be ascertained.

The foregoing synopsis of the law relative to land receivers, and the correspondence with a portion of those who have proved defaulters and faithless to their trusts, are submitted without further comment than that the facts and circumstances here exhibited show such a dereliction of duty, on the part of the executive department, as calls loudly for searching examination into this branch of the public service, and for a thorough reform.

The practice which the foregoing correspondence exhibits, of retaining men in office after gross and repeated violations of law, in keeping and using the public moneys for private speculation, and the character of the correspondence itself, but too clearly point to the inference that such officers were tolerated in place because they possessed extensive political influence, and were useful and active partisans.

Whether such mal-administration constitutes official corruption in those superior officers of the executive departments who know of and permitted in their subordinates the conduct which has been referred to, is a question which the committee submit to the house and the country to decide.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY AND CERTAIN RECEIVERS OF PUBLIC MONEY.

2.—Correspondence with R. H. Sterling, receiver of Choctawma.

Receiver's office, Choctawma (Miss.) November 26, 1838.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter dated on the 8th ultimo, authorising me to receive, in payment for public lands, the bills of the specie paying banks of Louisiana, Mississippi, Tennessee and Alabama.

The public sales were well attended, and the press of private entries after the sales closed was immense. At this time I cannot say to you the amount of the sales, but I think they are not much short of $300,000.

The labors of the office, from the moment the sales commenced, have been very severe—so much so, that the register and myself have scarcely slept for many nights in succession; and, under these considerations, I trust that you will allow us clerk hire for at least a clerk apiece during the sales, and after that period for one clerk, which would enable us to get along.

I will leave here in a short time for the purpose of making a deposit at Natchez, and return here before the 1st of January, so as to make out my quarterly account up to that time. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. H. STERLING, receiver.
Hon. R. B. Taney, sec. of the treasury, Washington.

Treasury department, Jan. 16, 1834.

SIR: I have received your letter of the 26th November last, and have looked with some anxiety for further advice as to the disposition of the money in your possession, arising from the recent public sales in your district. Returns from the bank of deposit to the 24th ultimo contain no evidence of any credit to the treasurer by you; and as, from your letter, there was reason to expect the public money would not be retained beyond that period, I am the more concerned at the omission. Under these circumstances, it becomes my duty to require that you will proceed to deposit the whole amount of public money in your hands forthwith, in case it has not been already deposited. I will only further add, that the obligations to deposit the public money promptly, and to render your returns and accounts punctually, are imperative, and must, in future, be regarded as paramount to all other duties. I am, &c.

R. H. Sterling, Choctawma, receiver of the public money.

Treasury department, Feb. 7, 1834.

SIR: It has been represented to this department that some of the receivers of public money in Mississippi have been engaged in trading on the bank notes they receive in payment of public lands, by exchanging them for bank notes of inferior value. I hope that there may be some mistake in this business, as it is my duty to state to you that such conduct would be regarded by this department as a gross violation of official duty, and be treated accordingly. But, as such a statement has been made from the most respectable authority, I must ask whether you have engaged in any such use of the public money received by you, and request a prompt answer to this inquiry. I am, &c.

To the receivers of public money at Augusta, Mount Salus, Washington, Choctawma and Columbus.

Receiver's office, N. W. district, Choctawma. (Miss.) April 16, 1834.

SIR: I have not, until this day, received your letter of the 7th February ultimo, in reference to receivers of the several land offices in this state trading in bank notes; and I embrace the earliest opportunity of communicating to you an answer to your inquiry, as far as concerns myself.

I occasionally, to accommodate persons who call upon me for that purpose, have given them in exchange bank paper for notes of other banks, but I have not, except in one solitary instance, given, or received in exchange, bank paper of any description, but such as I have received instructions from the treasury department to receive for public lands.

I proceed now to state the circumstances attending the case referred to above. During the land sales, the honorable John Bell, at this time a representative in congress from Tennessee, inquired of me if I felt authorized to receive, in payment of lands, the paper of Yeatman, Woods & Co. and that of the Union bank of Tennessee. I informed him I did not feel so authorized; but as I felt perfectly satisfied of the soundness of the banking house of Yeatman, Woods & Co. and the Union bank also, as well as a disposition to oblige him, I would take time to reflect upon the subject, and advise with my friends touching the matter. The result of my consultations with the mutual friends of Mr. Bell and myself, induced me to receive the paper offered by that gentleman at a small discount, with an assurance from him that he held himself responsible to me for any loss that might accrue on the paper received from him, should the bank of deposit refuse to receive the same on account of the government.

Subsequently, I offered that paper to the Planters' bank, which was readily placed to the credit of the treasurer of the United States at par.

I beg leave further to state, that, up to this date, all the money I have offered to the Planter bank for deposit has been received and placed to the credit of the treasurer of the United States. I should be pleased if a communication be addressed to the cashier of the Planters' bank by the secretary of the treasury upon the subject, as I feel confident an immediate and satisfactory answer would be given to any inquiries made of him.

I have the pleasure to state to you, that, out of about $350,000 deposited, I have not received one dollar of counterfeit money—a heavy responsibility, that I very much apprehended might ruin me, as there was considerable spurious money offered during the public sales, particularly on the United States bank and its branches; and that, too, at a time when I was very much hurried in the discharge of my official duties.

In my instructions from the treasury department, I find nothing disapproving my conduct as above stated; however, should it not meet the views of the secretary of the treasury, I hope to receive timely notice of it. Respectfully, I am, sir, your most obedient servant,

R. H. STERLING, receiver.

SIR: The department having received no monthly returns, exhibiting the transactions of your office from its establishment, it is proper to call your immediate attention to this duty, and to say to you that a strict compliance with this duty will be insisted on; and that, to enforce its due performance, the department will not hesitate to report the omission, for the action of the executive. Some time since, I transmitted to you this account, which showed the balance to be $10,014.39, which is short by eleven cents of the actual balance. The account here enclosed you will please receive, and return the other one to me. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant.

Sir: I have this day received yours of the 19th ultimo, covering a copy of your letter to me of 23th March, in answer to which, I have the honor to inform you that some time previous to the receipt of the letter, (received April 30th), I had transmitted all my monthly accounts up to that time to the treasury department, and also duplicates of the same to the general land office; and in the event of their having been lost, I now enclose copies of them to you. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

Hon. R. B. Taney, sec. treasury, Washington city.
P. S. The vouchers and accounts explanatory of the charges in the accounts, have been forwarded to the general land office with my quarterly accounts.

Treasury department, January 21, 1835.

Sir: Your letter of the 10th of February last, transmitting an account for certain advances and services, was duly received, and referred to the commissioner of the general land office; a like disposition has been made of the copies of that letter and accounts referred through the hands of the honorable F. E. Pluimier. I would observe, in reference to the subject, that all such claims should be charged in the quarterly accounts rendered by you to the accounting officer for settlement, to whom it properly belongs to admit or reject them, as the law or usage of the department may authorize. I am, &c.

LEVI WOODBURY,

Secretary of the treasury.

R. H. Sterling, esq.

Receiver of public money, Chocchuma, Miss.

CIRCULAR.

Treasury department, February 28, 1835.

Sir: It has been intimated to the department that a practice prevails at some of the land offices, of permitting entries and issuing certificates of purchase, without the payment of the purchase money at the time of the entry. Such a practice being unauthorized, and highly reprehensible, I have deemed it proper to make known to you, that if it has been tolerated by you, it must immediately cease; and any repetition of it hereafter, coming to the knowledge of the department, will receive prompt and exemplary notice.

I cannot omit the occasion to impress upon you the necessity of a strict attention to, and punctual compliance with, the duties required of you in regard to the prompt deposit of the public moneys, and transmission of your accounts and returns; and to say to you that the performance of those duties must be regarded as paramount to all other in your official station. I am, &c.

LEVI WOODBURY, sec. of the treasury.

To receivers of public money at Cuba, Huntsville, Montgomery, St. Stephen's, Augusta, Chocchuma, New Orleans, Ouachita, Demopolis, Mardisville, Sparta, Tuscaloosa, Columbus, Washington, Opelousas, and St. Helena.

Treasury department, March 17, 1835.

Sir: Having received no monthly duplicate return of the transactions of your office since that for the month of October last, it becomes my unpleasant duty to call your immediate attention to the omission. Allow me to express a hope that there may be no further occasion to remind you of the importance of punctuality in the transmission of these returns. I am, &c.

LEVI WOODBURY, sec. of the treasury.

To the receivers of public money: W. P. Harris, Columbus, Mississippi; R. H. Sterling, Chocchuma, Mississippi; B. K. Rodgers, Opelousas, Louisiana; and Demopolis, Alabama.

[November for October to the two last named.]

P. S. To the receiver at Opelousas: Having received no evidence of your compliance with the requirements of my letter of the 1st November last, I take occasion to apprise you that, unless you exhibit satisfactory evidence of your having deposited the whole of the public money in your hands at the time of such deposit, on or before the 1st of April next, I shall be under the disagreeable necessity, in the discharge of my duty, to report your neglect for the action of the executive.

Receiver's office, N. W. district,
Chocchuma, (Miss.) April 22, 1835.

Sir: On this day I return to you a note, where I had been for the purpose of making a deposit, and found in my office your letter of the 17th ultimo, notifying me that none of my monthly accounts had been received since that of November last. It is true that some time had elapsed after the accounts for December and January were due, before they were despatched, because I left here in the latter part of December for Natchez, to make a deposit; I did not get back until late in January, and then it took me some time to prepare them for transmission, and I hope they have all safely arrived ere this; and, if they have not, I am prepared to prove that they were sent in due form, and can furnish copies of them at a moment's warning.

There is no receiver in this state that has the difficulties which I have to encounter, in performing the duty of making deposits. At Columbus, there is a branch of the Planters' bank, in which the receiver makes his deposits; I have to travel a distance of two hundred and thirty miles, partly through a newly settled country, where the accommodations are wretched, and worse roads than you have any idea of: there are but few creeks bridged, and frequently swimming, particularly at this season of the year. Since my appointment to this office, I have done but little else than to use my best exertions to discharge the duties required of me, and will continue to do so. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. H. STERLING, receiver.

Hon. Levi Woodbury, sec. treasury, Washington city.

P. S. There have frequently, during the past winter and spring, several weeks at a time passed off without the arrival or departure of a mail from this place; and, under such circumstances, it could not be expected that my accounts, admitting that they were mailed the moment they were due, could arrive in season. At this time, the tributaries of the Yazoo are very high; consequently we have had no mail from the north for near two weeks. My return and account current for the month of March are now waiting for the departure of the first northern mail. It is with this country as with all new settled regions—the people must first build their houses and clear their lands, and then open the roads; I think that twelve months to come will put the roads in a situation so as to ensure the regular transportation of the mail. Very respectfully,

R. H. S.

NOTE. Duplicates of my monthly accounts were transmitted to the general land office at the same time that the originals were despatched to the treasury department; and I have received no advice of their not having reached there.

Treasury department, February 4, 1836.

Sir: Your returns for the months of October, November and December, have not been received. I regret that there should be any occasion to notice the neglect or accident, as the case may be, in this important duty; and avail myself of the occasion to inform you, that unless your future returns are received at the department within the month next succeeding that for which the return is rendered, it will place me under the disagreeable necessity of reporting the fact to the executive, in order to comply with the general rule in this class of cases. I am, &c.

LEVI WOODBURY,

Secretary of the treasury.

To receivers at Palmyra, Missouri, October, November and December; Eastonville, Illinois, November and December; Quincy, Illinois, November and December; Shawmout, Illinois, October, November and December; Cahaba, Alabama, November and December; St. Stephen's, Alabama, November and December; Columbus, Mississippi, November and December; Mount Salms, Mississippi, November and December; Helena, Arkansas, December; Washington, Arkansas, December; Zanesville, Ohio, November and December; Diana, December; Chicago, Illinois, December; Galena, Illinois, December; Vandalia, Illinois, December; Tuscaloosa, Alabama, December; Augusta, Mississippi, December; Chocchuma, Mississippi, December; New Orleans, Ouzita and St. Helena, Louisiana, December; Green Bay, Michigan, December; Batesville, Arkansas, December.

Receiver's office, N. W. district,
Chocchuma, (Miss.) March 7, 1836.

Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter under date of the 4th ultimo, on the subject of my "returns" for the month of December last. In answer to which, I assure you that my returns for that month; my monthly account for the same; my account current for the fourth quarter of 1835; my returns and monthly account for January last, were all sent off; but, I admit, not so soon as I wished, owing to my absence in making deposits, which occupied about fifteen days of my time, viz: from the 23d of December to the 7th of January. I think it very probable that my returns are frequently delayed on the route between here and Washington; and, if so, it would be injustice to hold me accountable; and in future I intend to take the postmaster's certificates of the time that my returns, &c. are deposited in the post office. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. H. STERLING, receiver.

Hon. Levi Woodbury, sec. treasury, Washington city.

Treasury department, July 6, 1836.

Sir: I have to request your explanation of the complaint made in the enclosed copy of a letter addressed to the department by John Caperton, in which he alleges that you refused to receive, in payment of public lands, a $20 note on the bank of Virginia, unless he first paid you $2 discount on the same. I am, &c. LEVI WOODBURY.

Sec. of the treasury.

Receiver of public money, Chocchuma, Miss.

Receiver's office, N. W. district,
Chocchuma, (Miss.) July 20, 1836.

Sir: Your letter of the 6th instant, on the subject of John Caperton's complaint, has been received. He applied on the 13th of June last to enter an eighty acre tract of land, and offered, in part payment for it, a twenty dollar note on the bank of Virginia, which is not receivable, as will appear by a copy of a letter herewith enclosed from the cashier of the deposit bank for this state.

I informed Mr. Caperton that such money was not receivable for the public land, and not current in the country. He insisted on my taking it. I told him that I could not do so at par, inasmuch as I could not offer it at the deposit bank in the face of instructions; but advised him to go out amongst the merchants and other persons in the place, and get it changed on the best terms he could. He did so, but could not succeed, and returned to my office, saying that it would subject him to much inconvenience if I did not take it. I then told him that I would not take a small note on my own account on a distant bank, for less than 10 per cent. discount; he readily agreed to allow it, and expressed his thanks for the favor, which I thought was the last of the subject; and I consider it very mean and niggardly in him, after the favor which I extended, to present me at the treasury department as a pettish shaver. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. H. STERLING, receiver.

Hon. Levi Woodbury, secretary of the treasury.

[R. H. Sterling stands indebted to the government in the sum of ten thousand seven hundred and thirty-three dollars and seventy cents, ($10,733 70). See preceding statement of balances.]

3.—Correspondence with J. T. Pollock, receiver of Crawfordville.

Land office, Crawfordville, (Indiana),

December 21, 1833.

Sir: The circular of your predecessor (Mr. McLane) of the 12th April last, has been received some time since. I have to state that, agreeably to the instructions contained in it, there is but a small share of duty resting upon me, not having been an officer of the government until a short time before the conflagration occurred; but all the letters and communications of my predecessors, addressed to the secretary of the treasury, as well as those written by him, being in my possession, I have deemed it necessary, in order that his request may be fulfilled, to copy them, as well as those written by myself and those addressed to me by the secretary of the treasury. I have procured an additional clerk for that purpose. The work is in operation, and will be completed in a short time.

To comply with the last clause of his instructions, I have herewith enclosed the date and object of some circulars written by the secretary of the treasury, that the wishes of the department on these subjects may be ascertained. Very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

JAMES T. POLLOCK, receiver.

Hon. R. B. Taney, secretary of the treasury.

Treasury department, March 14, 1837.

Sir: Complaint has been made to the department that your family do not reside at the place where your office is located. It will be necessary that you should reside at the place where the land office is kept, in order to give due attention to its business, and ensure public satisfaction. I am, &c.

LEVI WOODBURY, sec. of the treasury.

James T. Pollock, esq. receiver of public money, Crawfordville, Indiana.

Land office, Crawfordville, April 13, 1837.

Sir: In answer to your communication of the 14th of March, I have to say, that for more than two years while my family resided at this place, the physician was our daily and nightly visitor; that my oldest daughter, fifteen years of age, died; that our infant died for us likewise; that our only surviving daughter had four several and severe attacks of fever; that my wife was, during the above named period, so sorely diseased and afflicted that I was advised by medical men here to take her where her health could be restored; that all our other children, being three in number, were torn to pieces by fevers and agues; that I never intended otherwise than to return my family to this place as soon as my wife's health and the state of the roads will allow me to do so; that I reside here myself, as I am not absent only when I have leave, or making my deposit; and that I am now, and always have been, disposed to give particular attention to business entrusted to me. The complainant, of whom you speak, knows these facts, or he knows nothing at all of my business. In conclusion, sir, I am conscious I have done nothing but what would have been done by any man who has any regard to the lives and comforts of those heaven hath placed under his particular guardianship. Yours, with respect,

JAMES T. POLLOCK, receiver.
Hon. Levi Woodbury, secretary of the treasury.

Treasury department, November 11, 1837.
Sir: Your monthly return for the month of August last has not been received; and you are requested to transmit a duplicate thereof without delay. I am, &c.
LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the treasury.

[The above circular was addressed to the receivers at Quincy, Illinois; Fayette, Jackson and Lexington, Mississippi; Green Bay and Monroe Michigan, July and August; Mineral Point, Michigan; Crawfordsville, Indiana, September; Galena, Illinois, September; Fayetteville, Arkansas, September; Tallahassee, Florida, September.]

Treasury department, January 9, 1838.
Sir: The complaint of your non-residence at the site of the land office having been renewed, it becomes my duty again to call your attention to this matter, and to ask such explanations as you may be able to give for your supposed continued violation of the regulation requiring you to reside at Crawfordsville. I am, &c.

LEVI WOODBURY, sec. of the treasury.
Receiver of public money, Crawfordsville, Indiana.

Treasury department, February 22, 1838.
Sir: It appearing from your last return that the public money has accumulated in your hands to the sum of $54,033, although you have been directed to deposit the same on the 6th November last, and on the 26th ultimo; and as no explanation of your neglect has been received, I have to require the sales to be suspended until the money in your hands shall be deposited as directed. According to your last return, the balance in your hands was $54,089. Deducting from this sum $15,084 for outstanding warrants drawn upon you by the treasurer, and there would remain the sum of $39,005 subject to deposit. Referring also to the charge of non-residence at the land office, communicated in my letter of the 9th January last, to which no answer has been received, I will only add, that, if no satisfactory answer to the subjects of this letter be soon received, I must lay all the facts before the president for his final decision. I am, &c.

LEVI WOODBURY, sec. of the treasury.
Receiver of public money, Crawfordsville, Indiana.
P. S. I trust that the deposit of the balance will be made at Louisville, (if not done already under my previous directions), without a day's delay.

Treasury department, April 14, 1838.
Sir: Having received no evidence of your having deposited the public moneys which have come to your hands, and the balance appearing to be due exceeding $30,000, I have thought it proper, before resorting to any measure of harshness, again to call your immediate attention to the subject, and to express a hope that you will be enabled to furnish satisfactory evidence, by return of mail, that you have deposited all the moneys with which you are chargeable, as heretofore directed. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the treasury.
J. T. Pollock, esq. Crawfordsville, Indiana.

Dearborn county, May 3, 1838.
Sir: A gentleman residing in Cranfordsville, and in whose care are the moneys (or at least part of them), the other part being left in the bank at Indianapolis) for the drafts on me, (Ogden's), has this day informed me of your communication in relation to my business, dated the 14th of the past month. In answering this, I must tell of matters which I did not intend to name, and of matters which a part of my earnings must go to account for. And what are they? The practitioner, Mr. Tyler, has, time out of mind, been practising on the people a course of business, to suit his own convenience, at my expense; and this has been the way it was done. When, at

I suppose, it was convenient for the register to want money, and an applicant presented himself in his office, ten to one but there was some difficulty between the person wanting land, and the plats and numbers, &c. which would be an inducement for him to leave his money, with the assurance that his duplicate would be forwarded to him by mail in a short time, and, in the mean time, no other person should have his land. In this way the Lord only knows how much money has been deposited with Mr. Tyler; and it was none of my business if the entire wealth of the world had been left with him, so as I should not have felt any thing of his ingenuity. But so it was; the time would come when the fellow who had deposited the money would get uneasy about his duplicate, and bear down on the old fellow for the same; the next thing there was to come to me, to have the amount charged to Tyler; and I have, for the sake of peace, granted him accommodation, (relying greatly on his word that he would pay the same when wanted), to a considerable amount, and fully intended to keep the matter within myself; and should have done so, had not yours of the 14th been received. These are sent in to be proven by how many evidences, shall I say? It is not necessary to enumerate them; they can be made very many, as I have all the numbers recorded in a memorandum book. And again, in my absence, a month or two ago, from Crawfordsville, there was one thousand dollars let go out of the office, for accommodation sake, by a man in my charge, that should not have gone had I been there; this, with Mr. Tyler's money, I then had to gather from my own resources, which I did gather several weeks ago, and took to Louisville, with other moneys, expecting to get silver for it, and have the whole affairs settled, and, behold, when I got there, there was not a dollar in market, for high or low premium; but I had assurances that it would be kept for me on my return, which will be to-morrow. In the mean while I deposited moneys in the Savings institution, intending to take but one receipt on the final amount being placed there. If you doubt my having moneys in that institution, will you please to write the treasurer as to the facts? As to the Ogden money, I have requested the bank at Terre Haute to go to Crawfordsville and Indianapolis and get it, until I am tired out, and shall give them another pressing notice this day to go and get their money. I cannot force them to go and get their money; and I have written to them and urged them to it until I am tired out. In short, sir, if they do not go and get their money, I shall take it to the Savings institution at Louisville, and terminate the matter, and have no more noise about it. These are the reasons why the amount I have received has not been accounted for before this. And, in conclusion, the remark you made "before resorting to any measure of harshness," has given me an assurance that you have studied the maxim that a gentle hand will lead an elephant with a hair. These very few thousand dollars that I have above alluded to, I am bound for, although friend Tyler's account to me, unless he pays it, will be laid before you as secretary of the treasury of the United States; and if you will only reflect a moment that the men whose names are on my official bonds are worth in cash not less than one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, you will say, at once, it never will be necessary to resort to any harsh measures whatever. One word more about the Ogden drafts. I was certain, when I left Crawfordsville, that the bank at Terre Haute, which held those drafts, would call and have them settled; and it was on the 21st ultimo that I told that they (the bank) had been near a failure; and I must again repeat, that all the moneys I owe the government will be paid instantly by me, without any difficulty whatever. My residence is in Dearborn county; the most convenient post office to me is Murray's mills, where you will please direct your communications to me, if you should have any; while I shall remain your obedient servant,
JAMES T. POLLOCK.
Hon. Levi Woodbury, secretary of the treasury.

[OFFICIAL.]
Receiver's office, Crawfordsville, (Indiana), May 4, 1838.
Sir: Your favor of the 14th ultimo came to hand the 21st ultimo. Colonel Pollock left here the 3d day of March to deposit public moneys at Louisville, and has not yet returned. Since his departure, I have taken in draft No. 2,746 on war warrant, in favor of captain Ogden, for $5,000; and draft No. 1,932, on treasury warrant, in favor of J. F. Farley, for $31. I would forward them to the department, but I do not feel myself properly authorized to do so.

There is on hand, in silver, about $7,500, which I hold ready for any draft drawn by the treasury department, or the refunding to individuals, agreeably to directions from the commissioner of the general land office. Colonel Pollock I expect back shortly. Marks Craue, esq. has not yet arrived. The $10,000 draft has not yet been presented for payment. I am, respectfully, sir, your obedient servant, TAYLOR W. WEBSTER.

Hon. Levi Woodbury, sec. treasury, Washington city.

Treasury department, May 10, 1838.
Sir: I regret to inform you, in reply to your letter of the 3d instant, that after the liberal delay which has occurred, it will be necessary to make a deposit forthwith of the balance due by you at the Savings institution at Louisville, in order to prevent the district attorney from instituting legal proceedings on your bond.
I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
LEVI WOODBURY, sec. of the treasury.
James T. Pollock, esq. Dearborn county, Indiana.

4.—Correspondence with William Linn, receiver at Galena.

Treasury department, June 25, 1834.
Sir: I regret to be under the necessity of calling your attention to that provision of the regulations for the deposit of the public money which requires that each deposit should embrace the whole amount in the possession of receivers. According to your returns, there was in your hands on the 31st of March last, the sum of $10,613 49; on the 30th of April, the sum of $12,453 32; on the 31st of May, the sum of $13,505 10; yet it appears that its transfer to the bank of deposit was deferred until the 31st of May, and that the sum then deposited amounted to no more than $8,000. Under these circumstances, it becomes my duty to direct that the whole amount of public moneys in your hands at the time of the receipt of this letter be forthwith deposited, and to apprise you that strict and punctual attention to the regulation in relation to the deposit of the public money is indispensable.
I am, &c.
R. B. TANNEY,
Secretary of the treasury.
Wm. Linn, esq. receiver of public money, Vandalia.

Receiver's office, Vandalia, September 30, 1834.
Sir: Agreeably to your circular, directing the payment to be made to the creditors of the government, I have come on to pay to explain A. C. Ogden, superintendent of the Cumberland road, in Indiana and Illinois, which saves the transportation of the government funds from this place to Louisville, as well as transporting them from Louisville to this place. This is of importance to the superintendent as well as myself, and a saving to the government.

Captain A. C. Ogden will apprise you of this arrangement, and request a draft on me. He is now at Terre Haute. I have the honor to remain, with great respect, your obedient servant,

WM. LINN, receiver.
Hon. Levi Woodbury, secretary of the treasury.

Treasury department, October 23, 1834.
Sir: I would remark, in reply to your letter of the 30th ultimo, that you are not authorized to retain the public money in your hands, to meet anticipated demands arising under the circular of August last, contrary to the regulations which the department has prescribed for the periodical deposit thereof.
